The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for £1,000, while £500 may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for £1,500 a complete Statue of "STONEWALL" JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for "General JACKSON'S Statue," at Messrs. COUTTS and Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. B. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool, or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17, Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6, Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24, Rue Lord Byron.

AMERICA.

THE threatened attack upon Mobile has not yet been made, and the Northern public is impatient and disappointed. It was stated that General Sherman had reached Quitman on the railroad about 109 miles from Mobile with 30,000 men, but an official despatch gives the Federal force at Quitman as 1,000 men. It was also reported that General Sherman had defeated the Confederates near Bandon and captured 12,000 prisoners. Even the Northern papers had the grace to describe this story as 'a doubtful rumour.' That the Federals had been repulsed at Grand Pass, thirty-five miles from Mobile, is authentic. Admiral Farragut is waiting for good weather. Meanwhile Mobile is ready for the foe, and prepared to make a gallant struggle to save the city. The statement we made last week upon Northern authority, that General Sherman had occupied Jackson, Mississippi, is contradicted. The only news of importance from Tennessee is that the Confederates have blockaded the Tennessee River against steamers for Chattanooga; and we learn from the Northern reports that they have cut off the communication between Knoxville and Cumberland Gap. General Gilmore has returned to Port Royal. He reports officially that in Florida he captured eight guns—he does not say whether they were worn out cannon—and 100 prisoners. It is reported that the Federals were repulsed at Lake City, Florida, but that will not prevent the expedition answering Mr. Lincoln's electioneering purpose. It is said that two unsuccessful attacks have been made on the Federals opposite Natchez, Mississippi.

THE Presidential election interests the North more than the war in the South. Mr. Lincoln is opposed by Mr. Chase, and it is assumed that the latter gentleman will retire from the Cabinet. Mr. Lincoln has been able to vex and harrass his opponent. As Mr. Chase determined to go in for the Presidency, Mr. Lincoln's Congress would not authorise him to sell his reserve of gold. Our New York correspondent narrates the progress of the election campaign.

ELSEWHERE we publish the first of a series of papers on 'Slavery and President Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation,' from the pen of Hon. C. S. Morehead, of Kentucky. If an experience in public affairs combining a period longer than the span of a generation can give weight to opinions and testimony, no one from either section of the late Union can speak with greater authority than Governor Morehead. Entering on the arena of politics in early youth, he has successively filled nearly ever station of trust and honour in his native State, has represented it in the Congress of the United States, and was its chief magistrate up to the very moment of the disruption of the Federal tie. The contemporary of the great statesman of a happier and purer period in American history, he was from education, from long habit, and from conviction, devotedly and even enthusiastically attached to the Union. As a member of the Border States Convention, no man made more strenuous efforts to prevent separation, and his own graphic account of his interview with President Lincoln, for the purpose of making a last appeal, may still be in the recollection of many of our readers. To this day he prides himself upon having never done an act or said a word contrary to the laws of Kentucky and the constitution of the United States. Yet for no crime than that he opposed the unconstitutional measures of the Washington Administration he was one of the earliest victims of Mr. Seward's despotic usurpation. In the summer of 1861, his house was surrounded by a party of soldiers, who dragged him from the bosom of his family at midnight, and hurried him across the Ohio river into Indiana, thence without even the form of trial, he was sent to Fort Warren, and consigned to a long and painful imprisonment, until the general release of State prisoners on the temporary ascendency of the Democratic party, since which he has remained an exile in Europe.

The first paper of the series gives a rapid but graphic picture of the sufferings, drawn almost exclusively from Northern sources, of the negroes 'emancipated' by Federal violence. As one of the largest planters in the South-west before the war stripped him of home and property, he knows the negro character well, and feels for them a genuine tenderness which unfortunately seldom underlies the so-called philanthropy of those who do not hate the slave the less, but the master the more. It is proper remark that this paper was written before the intelligence of General Banks' proclamation, remanding negroes to compulsory labour, had reached Europe.

So the English Government is already tired of the policy of non-intercourse, and desires direct communication with the Confederate Government. How the matter is to be managed we know not, but Earl Russell, who according to Lord Palmerston is a man of expedients, will no doubt hit upon a plan to undo his former work. The ministry being very weak it is necessary to throw a bone to the small but hungry Anglo-Federal faction by promising to remonstrate with the Richmond Government about the purchase of war vessels from British ship-builders. It would be great fun to permit Messrs. Lefevre, Taylor, and Foster to prepare the bill of indictment. An angry partisan is not usually scrupulous or logical, but Mr. Lefevre's reckless assertions and absurd deductions are unprecedented. Contrary to facts, law, and reason, he insisted upon calling the Confederate cruisers 'British privateers.' If that be so what on earth has the Confederate Government to do with them? If the cruisers are Confederate war vessels and not British privateers, what business has the British Government to interfere with the damage they inflict upon Yankee commerce? Mr. Lefevre and his comrades seemed rather to pride themselves on their forbearance is not asking for an immediate declaration of war against the Confederates. Certainly we should feel deeply humiliated if British soldiers were helping Generals Butler and Banks to plunder Southern towns, and maltreat Southern women, and it would be very degrading for English naval officers to cooperate with Admiral Wilkes, and to associate with the ruffian who murdered the mate of the Saxon; but we can assure the Anglo-Federals that though the Confederates are anxious to cultivate friendly relations with this country the threat of hostilities will not induce them to submit to insult and injustice without a protest. We would suggest to Earl Russell that he should send out with the remonstrance a copy of Mr. Seward's despatch in reference to Federal violations of British sovereignty in the case of the Chesapeake, so that if the Confederate Government should think that any of its agents have at any time transgressed the law, they may know that the only reparation required by the British Government, is an apology, accompanied by loud praise of the zeal and patriotism of the offending officers. The papers in the Tuscaloosa case might also afford some useful hints.

THE diplomatic correspondence about the Mersey steamrams was published last night, and we now understand why Earl Russell shrank from producing it. On the 19th of January, Mr. Adams forwarded to our Foreign Secretary a copy of 'The Report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy'—a document which the Confederate agents in Europe declare to be a Northern forgery,—and asked for 'some measures of greater stringency than have yet been taken, as necessary on the part of Her Majesty's Government,' against the Confederate agents. Mr. Adams has the audacity to propose to a British Minister that England should exclude the citizens of the Confederacy from her dominions. Mr. Adams writes: 'I am further directed respectfully to represent that the toleration of these avowed enemies of the United States, whilst known to be carrying on these hostile practices, now fully revealed, within the British realm and its dependencies, without restraint of any kind, cannot be regarded as an exercise of the unquestioned right of sheltering political exiles, but rather as equivalent to permitting them to abuse that right for the purpose of more effectually availing themselves of British aid and cooperation, now notoriously given them in waging war with a country with which Great Britain is at peace.' Earl Russell could not promise to oblige the Federal Government in this particular, but his refusal is couched in the mildest terms. He writes: 'In reply to this allegation, Her Majesty's Government think it right to state that Her Majesty's dominions must necessarily continue to be open to the subjects of both belligerents as long as Her Majesty is at peace with both of them; but that Her Majesty's Government will, at the same time, continue to put in force, as they have hitherto done, to the full extent of the means in their power, the laws of this country against those subjects of either of the belligerents who may be found by transgressing those laws to have abused the rights of hospitality and to have offended against the authority of the Crown.'

WE publish a letter from our Richmond correspondent, dated January 11, which, though so long in reaching us, has not lost its interest. It relates chiefly to the internal affairs of the Confederacy, and is an instructive commentary on the reports of 'Southern despair' that appeared in the Federal newspapers at the beginning of the year.

AN official report received by the Federal Navy Department shows that the captains of blockade runners are determined that the enemy shall not gain much prize money. According to the despatch of Admiral Lee, the Wild Dayrell, Nutfield, Dee, Emily, and the Farmyard Jennie were in every case destroyed by their crews, or left in such a state that the captors could not get them off, and could do nothing else but complete the work of destruction.

The British steamship Cumberland lately fell into the hands of the Federals, owing to the treachery of the mate, who was in the pay of the United States Consul.

THE Federal Government has recommended to Congress an appropriation of 141,000 francs as compensation to the owners of the La Manche for the illegal capture of that vessel in August last. The ship was owned by a French firm.

A LETTER published in the New York World, dated 16th of February, testifies to the inefficiency of the Federal navy. It states that since the beginning of the war, 866 vessels of all classes have been captured, and of these 170 were steamers. Of these steamers, 150 were taken by private-built vessels, and only 20 by the entire naval force.

IT was reported last week that the steamer Denbigh, with a cargo of cotton, paid by the Confederate Government in redemption of Cotton Loan 7 per cent. bonds, had been destroyed. We learn, however, from the Mobile Register of the 4th ult., that, in attempting to run the blockade at that port, the Denbigh got aground, and was fired upon, but that she was little injured by the enemy, and has since got afloat and returned to port.

IN the Legislative Assembly at Halifax, Mr. Bourinot moved for the documents relating to the Chesapeake. He complained that the Confederates had been unjustly shut out from the privilege of asserting and supporting their rights; that a special messenger was dispatched to Richmond, but had not returned; and in the meantime the Judge had delivered a final decree. The Government replied that all the communications were strictly confidential and could not be produced.

It is reported in the Northern papers that the Alabama is in dock at Amoy, China; and that the Federal vessels Wyoming and Jamestown are keeping watch over her movements. This is not the first announcement of the Alabama being 'nearly captured.'

Advices from San Francisco state that Mr. Greathouse, who was imprisoned for assisting in fitting out the 'privateer' Chapman has been released on taking the oath of allegiance; Judge Hoffman having decided that President Lincoln's amnesty proclamation applies to the case. Another person committed for the same offence refuses to take the oath and remains in prison.

It appears that General Halleck was rather surprised at General Gilmore going from Charleston to Florida, but he now knows why the movement was made without orders from his Department. Mr. John Hay, the Private Secretary of President Lincoln, has been appointed with the rank of Assistant Adjutant-General to conduct the enterprise. The expedition is of course a mere electioneering manœuvre. As Florida at the last presidential election polled only 10,359 votes, it follows that, under the terms of the amnesty proclamation, but 1,036 votes in that State will give its three electoral ballots to Mr. Lincoln next November. It is calculated the expedition will cost about $1,000,000.

The Confederate Congress adjourned on the 18th February.

General Butler has ordered the Provost-Marshals in Portsmouth and Norfolk to take charge of the churches, and to replace the present clergymen by others of known 'loyalty.'

The price of gold in New York on the 23rd February was 57½ per cent. prem.

ENGLAND.

The Fenian Brotherhood has been denounced by a malediction despatched from the western shores of the Atlantic, and the fulminator is no less a person than the Roman Catholic Bishop of Chicago. He, an Irishman by birth, deeply sympathising with the people of his own race and creed, has, after due deliberation, and after consultation with his episcopal brethren in America, publicly and solemnly condemned the Brotherhood, and has refused to administer the sacraments to any of the Society. By him that body of persons is declared to be turbulent, illegal, and fraudulent. Their secret is known, and the object of their confederation is to wrest Ireland from England by violence, force of arms, and bloodshed. To him their success in so wild an attempt would appear to be fraught with the greatest misfortune that has ever befallen Ireland. The testimony of Mr. Smith O'Brien declares that the leaders of these men are intent merely on acquiring salaries, and that men of no note make handsome incomes by such traffic in the sympathies of their countrymen. The 'National Brotherhood,' or 'the Brotherhood of St. Patrick,' is, in the eyes of the Bishop of Chicago, equally to be condemned. As for the American Fenians, heavy denunciation is pronounced on such men by Dr. Duggan. 'An appeal,' he says, 'is made to your sympathies to encourage what I believe to be a delusion and a fraud. These men have no thought of being able to reach Ireland, but in the meantime your kindly sympathies are appealed to, your purses are drawn open, and all is abused. I do not think, and cannot believe, from what I know of the power of England and the weakness of Ireland, that any serious attempt is likely to be made to free Ireland.'

We are confident that the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland, in their unswerving patriotism and love of their country, entertain sentiments on this subject similar to those of Dr. Duggan, and that in their eyes all such enterprises are condemned as fraught with enormous evil to the deluded people who are made the victims of interested agitators. The efforts of the latter are contemptible, but through their machinations foolish men are led blindfold into acts which can only result in ruin and misery.

If there is any one among our readers who is amazed at the present unhappy state of Ireland, we beg to recommend the following case to his most serious consideration. The neighbourhood of Belfast has hitherto been free from agrarian outrages, and in and around the town dwells a busy and peaceful community, immensely superior in wealth and intelligence to many thousands of the people of Ireland. At no great distance from Belfast lies the Ballymorphy estate, which was purchased before the year 1836 by a Mr. Hamilton. On the estate the purchaser found two joint tenants, holding a farm of twenty acres at a yearly rent of about 28*l*. The lease expired in 1839. Mr. Hamilton renewed it to Duncan, one of the tenants, at the fair rent of 39*l*. 6*s*. Duncan fell deeply into arrears, and in 1851 he owed his landlord 160*l*. Thereupon Mr. Hamilton forgave him the debt, and reduced the rent to 26*l*. per annum. At that reduced rental Duncan, in November 1863, owed his landlord 70*l*., so that, in fact, Mr. Hamilton lost some 300*l*. or 400*l*. On the same estate was another man, Coates, who was always deeply in arrear. Of course the property in such hands was going to ruin. At length the landlord ejected these men, but he showed every kindness to their families, and rendered the process as merciful as possible. However, his conduct was held up to reprobation in true 'sensation' style by a local journal. Shortly afterwards Mr. Hamilton received a threatening letter. On it was the picture of a coffin, with the letters H. H. on the lid, the words 'Herdman's fate,' with a large splash of red ink. The agent also received a letter with a coffin thereon pictured, and his name on the lid, with the warning, 'Prepaire (sic) for hell.' Both coffins were illustrated with death's-head and crossbones. Mr. Herdman was shot in open day near his house some time since, but the outrage was not of an agrarian character. At the assizes, two judges, in charging the grand jury, have adverted strongly to the prevalence of the crime of writing threatening letters, and have remarked how very rarely the infamous authors are brought to trial.

It will be in the recollection of our readers that, at a meeting held last summer at London House, it was resolved by the clergy and laity of the metropolis to endeavour to raise one million sterling in the course of ten years, and to apply that sum to the relief of spiritual destitution within the diocese of London, at the discretion of the Bishop and an Executive Committee of subscribers to the fund. The Committee has been organised, and has entered on its labours. In furtherance of these objects the Bishop of London held a meeting at Willis's Rooms on Thursday last, to which the clergy of the diocese were invited. About 700 of that body attended. After a few words from His Lordship, the report of the Committee was read. It appeared that attention had been directed to two principal points—the proportion of clergy to population, and the proportion of church room to population. It was assumed—first, that one clergyman could not minister to more than 2,000 souls; secondly, that 58 per cent. of the population could attend religious worship, and, therefore, that accommodation should be provided by the Church and by Dissenters for that proportion. It was found then that there was a population of very nearly 1,000,000 souls for whom a further provision of 500 clergy would be required, and that there was an equal number for whom the Church should provide accommodation after the rate of 25 in every hundred persons. Moreover, 600 paid lay agents were required, an increase of mission stations was recommended, with mission-rooms attached to the parsonage houses.

The Bishop of London then addressed the meeting. He freely confessed that to carry out all their objects they would require about 6,000,000*l*. But suppose they only did half, and so required but 3,000,000*l*., could that sum be obtained within ten years? In the year ending October 1863, the Ecclesiastical Commission had appropriated to the diocese of London a capital sum of 120,000*l*. If such grants were continued, that would give more than a million sterling in ten years. He expected one million sterling in ten years to result from their exertions and their appeal to the public; and having thus got 2,000,000*l*., he would place confidence in the exertions of private individuals to raise, in one way or other, another million. The great point was to do an entirely new work, and not in any way to interfere with existing societies. They desired to reach the hearts of the poor; they wished for suggestions on the questions of increase of building and increase of men, on the best methods of raising money, and on other matters. The Bishop concluded with an earnest appeal for the cooperation of the clergy.

Last week Miss Burdett Coutts laid the foundation-stone of a new church at Carlisle. After service in the Cathedral, the Mayor and Corporation of the town, the Bishops of Carlisle, Ripon, and Melbourne, and many Church dignitaries went in procession to the site of the new church. The crew of the life-boat, which Miss Coutts presented to the National Association a short time ago, accompanied the procession. After the presentation of several addresses, Miss Coutts spoke a few words to the assembled multitude. The ceremony concluded with the usual prayers and hymns. The church will be erected at the sole cost of Miss Burdett Coutts, and the expense will be not less than 5,000*l*.

We have at length received the details of the mission of Sir Moses Montefiore to the Sultan of Morocco on behalf of the Jews dwelling in that empire. The party, on their journey up to Morocco, left Mogador on the 17th of January, with a Moorish escort of cavalry and infantry, 21 camels, 25 baggage mules, and a numerous retinue of attendants. On the second day's journey they sighted the snow-capped chain of Atlas. Sir Moses was carried in a kind of palanquin, but at his age the journey was one of no ordinary difficulty. The governor of each district traversed by the party furnished the requisite provisions, by order of the Sultan. Sheep, poultry, eggs, milk, tea, sugar, &c., were duly levied on the inhabitants, who deducted the value of their contributions from their taxes. At Morocco the travellers were lodged in the Sultan's palace, called Sidi Ben Dris, situated in the midst of an orange garden. Six days were allowed by the Sultan for the recovery of his guests from fatigue. Audiences are by him always granted on horseback, and the colour of the charger indicates the temper of the monarch. Sir Moses, on the seventh day, awaited His Majesty in a spacious courtyard lined with thousands of troops, and hailed with pleasure the appearance of the Sultan on a charger of spotless white. His Majesty welcomed the English visitors with great courtesy, declared that the fame of Sir Moses and his benevolence had reached the imperial ears, that to him the friendship of England was dear, and the English uniforms of the naval officers present a sight of pleasure. Then Sir Moses presented his petition, praying for a removal of the grievances under which the Jews were suffering.

Four days afterwards a firman was delivered, granting the prayer of the petition. The commencement thereof was as follows: 'In the name of God, the Merciful and Gracious. There is no power but in God, the High and Mighty. Be it known by this our Royal Edict—may God exalt and bless its purport and elevate the same to the high heavens, as He does the sun and moon!' The firman then declared that it was the imperial pleasure that all Jews residing within the Empire should be placed in a position of perfect equality with other people in the administration of justice, that they should suffer no wrong, should receive the just recompense of their toil, and that injustice to them should be severely punished. The concluding words were: 'This decree blessed by God is promulgated on this 26th of Shaban of the year 1280. Peace!'

Mr. Reade, Her Majesty's Consul at Tangier, Captain Armytage, and other officers of H. M. S. Magicienne, accompanied the expedition.

The Government has appointed a Committee, with General Sabine as Chairman, to sit at Burlington House, to examine into the merits of gun-cotton as an explosive substance.

His Majesty the King of the Belgians arrived at Dover on Wednesday evening, March 2, and was received, on landing, by M. Van de Weyer, the Belgian Ambassador, and by Lord Cremorne, Colonel Ponsonby, Colonel Maclean, and other officers. The pier was lined by a guard of honour of the 78th Highlanders. The guns from Fort George fired a royal salute. His Majesty slept at the Lord Warden Hotel, and on the following day proceeded to Windsor. The King was met in London by the Prince of Wales. Her Majesty the Queen, with the Princess Helena, received His Majesty at the railway station at Windsor, and accompanied him to the Castle.

The two Universities, on Friday last, offered their congratulations on the birth of a Prince to their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales. The reception took place at Marlborough House. The deputation from Oxford consisted of the Chancellor (the Earl of Derby), the Vice-Chancellor (Dr. Lightfoot), the President of St. John's, the Wardens of Merton and All Souls, the Proctors, and many other officials, and was accompanied by the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone and Sir W. Heathcote, the representatives of the University in Parliament, many noblemen, Doctors in Divinity, Law, and Medicine, Masters of Arts, and Bachelors in Civil Law. The deputation from Cambridge consisted of the Chancellor (the Duke of Devonshire), the Vice-Chancellor, Drs. Whewell, Okes, Jeremie, and Adams, the Public Orator, the Proctors, and Registrar. It was further accompanied by the Earl of Powis (High Steward), and by a large body of noblemen, learned Doctors, and Masters of Arts. The Princess was present at the reception.

On Saturday last Oxford afforded to the visitor a spectacle calculated to inspire with delight all those who believe that the greatness of a country depends on the nobility of her youth. The two Universities of Cambridge and Oxford, who have for a long period of years contested the superiority in the gay cricket-field and at the laborious oar, did on that day for the first time measure their strength in athletic sports. The excitement, the crowd, the prizes, and the struggles were worthy of the auspicious occasion. The success of the first meeting presages a long series of annual games.

In the result the victories were evenly balanced, for of the eight prizes four were won by Oxford and four by Cambridge. But it is worthy of remark, that while the former University shone supreme in the more artistic feats, the latter bore the palm in those struggles which required endurance. The flat race of 100 yards was won by Mr. Darbyshire, of Wadham College, Oxford, who ran the distance in 10½ seconds. The same gentleman won the race of a quarter of a mile on the flat, and occupied but 53 seconds in the performance. Similarly the high jump went to Oxford, the winner being Mr. Gooch, of Merton College, who topped 5 feet 5 inches, while the same gentleman cleared no less than 18 feet of ground, and thereby won the prize for the long jump. Such were the victories of Oxford. To Cambridge went the hurdle race of 120 yards over 10 flights of hurdles, and Mr. Daniel, of Trinity College, accomplished the feat in 17¾ seconds. Next the hurdle race over 200 yards and 10 flights was won by Mr. Wynne Finch, of Trinity College, the time being 26¾ seconds. Then Mr. Lawes, of Trinity College, won a flat race of a mile, and did the distance in 4 minutes and 56 seconds with consummate ease. Lastly, Mr. Garnett, also of the renowned Trinity College, won the steeple chase over about two miles of fair hunting country.

About 12,000 persons were present to witness the sport.

The tide at Birkenhead docks, owing to the violence of the south-easterly wind, rose to an extraordinary height on Sunday last. At night the 170 feet of the old North Wall in the Morpeth Basin, which has long been in a tottering condition, gave way. Repairs to a considerable extent were at the time in course of execution. Part of the wall fell forward into the basin and part into the excavations, while 50 feet of the masonry were lifted bodily up, carried across 20 feet of excavations, and deposited in one mass against the splendid granite of the new Morpeth Lock. The gates of the lock were closed, and fortunately withstood the shock. All the vessels in the Morpeth Dock broke their chains and ropes, and some drifted into the Egerton Dock, but few sustained any damage of importance. No lives were lost. The vessels were removed, and everything was put in a proper condition before the next tide.

News has been received of the total loss of the steamer 'Bohemian,' 2,000 tons, Captain Borland, from Liverpool. She is supposed to have struck on the rock off Portland during a snow-storm, and there filled and sank. All the officers and crew saved themselves. There were about 120 passengers on board, of whom 20 or 30 were cabin passengers. All the persons who are missing were steerage passengers.

The great annual race on the River Thames between the crews of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge is fixed for the 19th day of March. The Oxford crew will make their first appearance for practice on the Thames this day, having already, of course, been many weeks in training on the Isis. The Cambridge men are unusually heavy and powerful; but the Oxford style and regularity of rowing so far exceed that of their opponents, that at present the chances, as tested by the state of the betting, are strongly in favour of the oarsmen of the Isis.

THE CONTINENT.

The statement made by Mr. Disraeli in Parliament, and received with some derision by his opponents, that spring is fast coming on, may be a natural truism, but is a most important political fact. The genial influence of the season has possibly some stirring efficacy on the tough rind of the diplomatic intellect as well as on the material chains of ice in which it is restrained during the winter; and to these agencies combined we must attribute the fact that large military movements are taking place throughout the whole of Central Europe. To begin from the East, Russia is massing the Imperial Guard upon the Prussian frontier, while it has withdrawn a corps d'armée from the interior to strengthen the hands of its paternal government over the unfortunate but still unconquered Poles; Austria has proclaimed a state of siege in Galicia, which it is to be feared that she will sustain by military reinforcements; she is further securing her position in the Venetian territory by a skilful 'echelonnage' of troops in and about the Quadrilateral; large depôts of warlike munitions are being formed at Verona, Peschiera, Rovigo, and other fortresses, 360 pieces of cannon are reported to be lying ready for disposition at Venice, whose old Darsena or naval arsenal awakes once more after the death-sleep of a century, under the strenuous efforts of the Austrian Rear-Admiral von Wallerstorf to assemble a competent squadron. The Italians are no less alive to the rumours of wars than their neighbours; indeed, unless we are much mistaken, they have every reason to appreciate the situation, as having been the first to take the aggressive attitude which has been so quickly responded to by their old foes in Venetia.

The situation in Denmark is rapidly passing into a more distinct, if less satisfactory phase; the Austro-Prussian troops have occupied Kolding within the boundaries of Jutland, i. e. of Denmark Proper; and the Austrians have further orders to invest the town of Fredericia; in the face of such actions it will be difficult for the two great German Powers to assert much longer the pacific nature of their occupation; there is a plain rough logic in the Northern races which tells them clearly enough that invasion means war—a logic too practical, or call it thick-headed, to appreciate the distinction between war localised, or killing them for their good, and war generalised, or killing them simply. Straw-splitting of this nature is undignified on all occasions; but between a great and a small power it is contemptible; when the lamb rebutted the wolf's accusation that he had fouled his water by pointing out that the flow of the stream made such a thing impossible, the wolf declined to argue the point, but ate him on another pretext. We submit the fable to the attention of the German Governments.

The dearth of military news of any importance from the seat of war in Denmark, has been but partially supplied by the official Prussian account of a cavalry skirmish that took place near Fredericia, between a squadron of Danish dragoons and two squadrons of Prussian hussars, on the 29th of February. The Prussian account substantially acknowledges the loss of 33 men and 1 officer, but attributes it partly to an inferiority of numbers, partly to the amount of snow in the ditches, which appears to have been so great as to swallow up divers men and horses, who were reported missing, but were then turning up here and there from their moist hiding-places; they moreover claim to have inflicted at least equal loss on their antagonists. The Danish account of the same skirmish reports a loss of nine wounded and missing (three of whom were taken prisoners), and the capture of 1 Prussian officer and 28 hussars; a simple subtraction sum gives us for the losses of the Prussians in the snow ditches five men. The attention paid to this little affair is noteworthy; it must be remembered that the Prussians have complained that their allies have swallowed up all the fighting, and consequently all the glory: it is, therefore, unfortunate for them that on one of the first occasions offered to their troops they should be obliged to confess a failure, and to allege excuses which are not exactly borne out by the facts; and that, too, where an arm of the service is concerned, for which their allies have ever been famous. We say this without prejudice to the Prussian army, whose reputation is too well established to require further proofs.

The political situation is sufficiently complicated to satisfy the most enthusiastic admirer of political chess-playing. First, with regard to the Conference, without cessation of hostilities, proposed by England: all the Powers have given their assent to the theory of it, France with some coldness, Russia with heartiness, Prussia and Austria with the good-natured easiness of a man who gives a thing worth nothing; Denmark after some deliberation has agreed to the principle, but made the evacuation of Jutland a condition sine quâ non. The Austrian answer to this is contained in the order to advance upon Fredericia; a step which must be attributed partly to the successful arguments of the Prussian envoy, Manteuffel, partly to the umbrage which the Emperor has taken at the unsubmissive tone of Denmark. Of the determination of the Danes to die fighting there can be no doubt; Copenhagen has returned all fighting deputies to the Volksthing; and there is a report of the return of M. Hall to the ministry in the place of M. Quaade. Next as to the relations between the two great German Powers and the Federal diet; a most important resolution has been passed by the latter body, refusing to comply with the request of the Austro-Prussians, to have confided to them the command of the Federal Corps of Execution now in possession of Holstein; the object of the allies was to take into their own hands the entire authority over the two Duchies, and thus, if possible, to avoid the complications arising from the notorious favour given by the Federal authorities to the claims of the Duke of Augustenburg. The refusal of concessions on the same point, and is accepted in that light by the Austrian press, which scornfully asks what the small German Courts intend to do if the great Powers refuse to acknowledge their protegé? what advantage will they have gained by creating another Frederick Lackland? It is remarked, on the other hand, that the Crown Prince of Prussia, in answer to an address from Apenrade (Sleswig), dwelt much on his own personal friendship with the Duke of Augustenburg, and on the relationship between the two families. It is evident that Prussia has still a very strong card to play, from the use of which Austria has precluded herself by her decisive statements; she might disengage herself from Austria, accept the leadership of the pro-Augustenburg States, and thus acquire a temporary popularity. But in the first place there is honour among thieves, an adage which is not wholly inapplicable to the case; and secondly, there is probably now in existence a counter-attraction which will far outweigh the brilliant but empty fascinations of such a leadership, in the shape of a new Holy Alliance between Russia, Austria, and Prussia, for mutual support generally, and in the matter of Poland especially. The movement of Russian troops mentioned above simultaneously with the proclamation of the state of siege in Galicia, make the existence of such a treaty extremely probable, as far as regards Russia and Austria; while in all matters that concern Poland, we may be sure that Prussia is little likely to adopt a course divergent from that of the other two Powers. The latest despatches on the relations between the great and small German Powers point to a decided change in the policy of the latter. The Bavarian representative at the last moment withdrew his motion in favour of the Duke of Augustenburg. It appears that a telegraphic despatch from his government reached him at the moment that he was entering the Federal palace. It is generally believed on the Continent that the part taken by England in the whole Danish affair has been much more decided than our ministers are willing to confess. One story goes that the English minister has orders to inform the Danish Government that, in case of a continued resistance to his advice, this country would not be unfavourable to the extinction of Denmark and the formation of a Scandinavian confederacy. Another just received appears to be as fine a specimen of the lusus naturæ called 'mare's nest' as any we have yet seen: according to it England, at the request of Austria, was about to send a fleet to Copenhagen to force the Danish Ministry into accepting the Conference. The project, however, was divined by the sharp-nosed politicians of the Tuileries, and an immediate order sent to Cherbourg to prepare the iron-clad squadron for immediate service. The combination has consequently failed, and with it the last effort of England in that direction.

It would be doing an injustice to Prussian ingenuity to omit mention of a scheme devised by the Ost-Preussische Zeitung, whereby that country is to demand of Denmark the cession of all its African possessions as an indemnity for the expenses of the war, and then convert them into a Cayenne to which all the Progressist party may be transported when convenient. We need not say that the journal in question is Feudalist.

The Italian press, in commenting on the new Holy Alliance, asserts that the only hope of Europe now rests in a strong counter-alliance of France, Italy, and England. The persistent efforts made by the kingdom of Italy to take a place in the European 'society' are deserving of all commendation; Victor Emmanuel must feel the irksomeness of a crown which he wears less by the grace of God than by the permission of Western Europe. While we acquit Austria of any desire wantonly to add another to the two wars now on her hands, we must allow that the warlike eagerness of Italy is not without excuse. What the base will be of the next campaign between these ancient foes is by no means clear; but the collection of military stores and munitions at Bologna, and the assembly of an Italian squadron at Ancona, lead to the suspicion that the Quadrilateral will be attacked at its south-eastern angle, while the Austrian navy will be challenged for the possession of the mouths of the Po, if not of Venice itself.

The ancient Roman Forum has revived to unwonted sounds of strife; but 'quantum mutatus ab illo.' For togaed senators, and fiery tribunes, for Rienzi of the white robe and his knightly guard, we have substituted red and blue-breeched Frenchmen, and outlandishly dressed, outlandish speaking, Pontifical Zouaves. These worthies appear to have had a regular pitched battle on the classic ground, to the intense delight of the Roman populace, who, with much good sense, pelted both sides indiscriminately with stones. Heaven knows there was no want of the necessary missiles in that ruin-strown wilderness; we can fancy a thrill of ecstasy passing through even the cold stone on which a Gracchus once trod, on finding itself in violent contact with the thick skull of a Papal defender.

There is undoubtedly a sympathy, or rather identity of thought in the minds of the Russian and Yankee, which goes far to account for the fulsome adoration of the great Autocrat displayed by the latter people. Such a sympathy can alone account for the fact that we find the abolition of serfdom, begun on the most honourable motives, now prostituted to be a political weapon to enforce obedience in a rebellious province. By four decrees issuing from the Imperial will all connection between the landowners of Poland and their serfs, or rather villeins holding a tenure under them, is completely severed. The said tenants are now complete proprietors of the land they farm, subject to a certain ground-rent due, not to their former lord, but to the Imperial Government. For this spoliation an indemnity is offered to the landowners, the amount of which is to be settled by a committee sitting at Warsaw; the committee, however, is to have power to refuse compensation entirely.

A new Cabinet has been formed in Spain by Señor Mon and the Marquis de Nocedal; it is a coalition of the Liberal and Conservative parties, and has taken for its general programme a return to the Constitution of 1845; it is to be hoped that this Constitution includes among its principles that of common commercial honesty: Señor Mon and Señor Pacheco, the new Foreign Minister, have as yet enjoyed great confidence in England on the strength of their views on the Cuban debt, which it is hoped they do not intend to sacrifice. The rebellion in San Domingo is in a state of discouragement, and the Captain General has declared that he needs no further reinforcements. We understand that the British ship seized at Malaga on account of its concealed warlike cargo, has been released on the understanding that the munitions in question are intended neither for Spain nor for Italy, but for the armament of certain Confederate vessels.

When great bodies, like Austria and Russia, are in motion, it is natural that they should communicate some disturbance to neighbouring bodies of less gravity: thus, we are not surprised to find that Prince Couza has again drawn upon himself the attention of the Turkish authorities: a despatch, addressed to him by Ali Pasha, remonstrates strongly on the addition which he has lately made to his forces, limited by treaty to the number of 6,025. The patience with which the Western Powers bear the vagaries of this potentate, would be remarkable at any time but this, when patience appears to be the order of the day.

The Mexican mail has brought with it the unanimous vote of the notables and communes of Mexico, offering to the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian the imperial crown. The Archduke is brother to the present and nephew of the late Emperor of Austria; he married the Princess Charlotte, daughter of King Leopold of Belgium, and grand-daughter of Louis Philippe. He is described by a Paris contemporary as about thirty-two years of age, of an appearance both prepossessing and commanding. The imperial pair are at present enjoying the hospitalities of the Tuileries, whence they come on a visit to the Queen, which will also be a farewell visit of the Empress to her venerable father. The new Emperor has resolved to receive the final deputation from Mexico at Miramar, where he received the first official offer of the crown.

The death of M. Pietri at the commencement of this month has been generally considered a political as well as a personal loss to the Emperor. M. Pietri was a Corsican by birth, and a republican lawyer by education. Attached to the Bonaparte family by patriotism he was sufficiently wise or sufficiently devoted to sacrifice his Republican proclivities to Imperialism: in return for this sacrifice he received the post of Prefect of Police, which he held up to the time of the conspiracy of Orsini in 1858. From that office he retired to the placid life of a Senator, still rendering to the Government such political service as it demanded; his talents as an electioneerer were great, and among his triumphs may be counted the spontaneous vote given by Savoy in favour of annexation. His funeral obsequies were performed in Paris with all the ceremonies due to a Knight Grand Cross of the Legion of Honour.

The first and fifth electoral districts of the department of the Seine are without representatives; the elections for them come off on the 20th and 21st inst.; as yet no Government candidate has appeared, and the choice lies at present between the candidate put forward by the operatives specially, and divers others of differing shades of the opposition.

The observations made by the Imperial prosecutor in the trial of the conspirators concerning 'Mr. Flower, 35, Thurlow Square,' are unsatisfactory to both Governments. It is an insult to that of England to say that the French law officers have a criminal charge, which they can substantiate against one of its members; and it is equally derogatory to the dignity of the Imperial Government to suppose that it has either made an unwarranted insinuation, or subordinated public morality to reasons of policy.

Some of our readers may remember that a certain Sous-Lieutenant Fleury was tried at the beginning of the year for the murder of his mistress, and (the extenuating circumstances having been taken into account) sentenced to twenty years' imprisonment. This judgment has been quashed owing to an informality, and the prisoner is to be tried again by court-martial in Paris. There is no doubt that the law will do its utmost to protect the lives of so important a part of the Emperor's subjects.

A celebrated tailor of the name of Worms has practised upon the Lyonnaise ladies of his 'clientèle' a cruel trick, by disposing of all his business and debts to a successor and starting for England. The successor has of course enforced the payment of these debts, much to the tribulation of the fair ladies of Lyons, and even of Paris. We read of one ambassadress whose bill for fancy ball dresses amounts to 100,000 francs.

North Carolina Troops.—Among the re-enlistments of whole brigades and divisions, constantly announced in the Southern papers, we notice the following: General Robert D. Johnston's brigade, General Roder's division, General Lane's brigade, General Wilcox's division, and the brigade commanded by this last-mentioned General upon his promotion to a division. All these are North Carolina troops.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

CAPTURE OF THE SAXON.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Lord R. Montagu asked if it was true that the Saxon was captured because her cargo was alleged to be the property of the Confederate States, and, if so, whether it was according to the law of nations to seize enemy's goods under a neutral flag, and whether it is lawful to capture a vessel for carrying such goods. His Lordship also asked, if the capture of the Saxon should be defended on the ground that the cargo consisted of Federal property taken by a Confederate man-of-war, whether that would be a valid plea, and if it was in accordance with international law to seize lawfully captured goods shipped on board a neutral vessel.

The Attorney-General replied that no answer had been received from the United States Government to the representations made by Her Majesty's Government about the Saxon; and, therefore, as he did not know the grounds on which the vessel was captured, it was no use discussing hypothetical cases. [But why should the chief law officer of the Government decline to assent to generally accepted principles of international law? Does he fear to put any pressure on the United States Government? Are Her Majesty's Ministers waiting for Mr. Seward's despatch to make their construction of the law accord with it? It is not the first time that our Government have manifested a reluctance to avow any principle of law that was likely to prove distasteful to Mr. Seward.]

THE CONFEDERATE CRUISERS.

On Friday evening, in the House of Commons, Mr. Shaw Lefevre called attention to the course pursued by the agents of the Confederate States in fitting out vessels of war and enlisting seamen in the ports of this country. [We are sorry that our limited space does not enable us to do justice to the vigorous onslaught of the honourable member. But we can assure our readers that it was a very strong hash of what the New York Herald has written, and of what such men as Senator Sumner and Parson Brownlow have said, about perfidious England fitting out privateers to prey upon United States commerce.] Mr. Lefevre admitted the Florida had been judicially acquitted; but still there could be no doubt she left England commissioned by the Confederate Government. The Alabama, in Mr. Lefevre's opinion, ought to have been detained on suspicion. He said the Alabama has been 'destroying and burning commerce,' and that not only had American vessels been burnt, but also an American vessel 'that had been transferred to the British flag.' Mr. Lefevre is confident that the steam-rams in the Mersey, and vessels building or built in other places, were intended for the Confederate Government. The honourable member remarked that these vessels were in the habit of flying the British flag, 'a thing that constitutes a crime against the law of nations.' [If Mr. Lefevre reads any other journal than the Morning Star, he cannot be ignorant that Federal cruisers are in the habit of resorting to the same ruse.] The honourable member has no doubt the Rappahannock is a Confederate vessel, and putting all these cases together, he concludes that there has been an 'organised scheme' on the part of the Confederate Government to violate our neutrality and our laws. Mr. Lefevre declared that, in his opinion, the Federal cruisers were not men-of-war, but 'British privateers.' He considered that the British Government ought to go direct to the Confederate Government, and say, 'We will stand this no longer.' Mr. Lefevre is of opinion that if we were at war with Germany, German privateers would be fitted out in Federal ports. [We think the hon. member is right.] He also said: 'Hundreds of American merchants are yearning for the first opportunity of fitting out privateers to prey on British commerce;' and he thinks that we ought to propitiate Yankee anger by stopping the Confederates from getting any more ships from England. He concluded by moving for a copy 'of any correspondence which has taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Confederate agents in this country or elsewhere, with respect to the fitting out privateers in British ports.'

After a few words from Lord R. Montagu—who thinks it is the business of the Federal Government, and not of the British Government, to catch the Alabama—Mr. Baxter informed the House that he considered Mr. Lefevre's speech 'was marked by force of expression' [which is undoubtedly true] and by 'continuity of argument,' and that, in his opinion, the Government had fulfilled a great public duty in stopping the steam-rams. Mr. P. A. Taylor, who is rather notorious for forcible expressions, declared that 'the attitude of the Government of the United States has been honest and loyal towards this country; whilst the British Government, however honest in its desire to maintain the principle of non-intervention, had certainly been actuated by very strong sympathies for one of the belligerents [as witness the uninterrupted shipment of parts of artillery on English mail steamers to Federal ports, the uninterrupted Federal recruiting in Ireland, and the stoppage of the steam-rams 'on suspicion']. Mr. Taylor asked a question which admirably exhibits the spirit and value of his speech: 'While the Northern States respected our neutrality, what had been the conduct of the Confederate States?'

The Solicitor-General, whilst regretting the escape of the Alabama, denied that the Government had been remiss in their duty, and maintained that, whilst promising to be vigilant, they could not promise 'that no vessel could possibly escape, or that our laws would not be evaded.' The learned gentleman then said:—

> He could not agree with the remark that those ships should be treated as English vessels. He denied they were English vessels. They were not officered by British officers. They were Confederate vessels having Confederate commissions; and because some Englishmen had enlisted in them, and some more might have been employed in fitting them up, that was no ground for calling them British vessels. His honourable and learned friend had said, in the first place, that they ought to pursue and capture those ships. Capture the Alabama! But they should catch her first. He would remind his honourable and learned friend that when a vessel was commissioned by a recognised belligerent no enquiry could be made into her previous history. It had been decided in the American courts that a commission from a recognised belligerent obliterated the past offences of the vessel. Therefore, as they had every reason to suppose that the Alabama and the other vessels referred to were public vessels of war, commissioned by a recognised belligerent, it would not be in accordance with the law of nations to pursue and capture them on account of the original illegality in their proceedings. An act of that kind might be construed as no less than an act of war. But, secondly, his honourable and learned friend had said, 'You ought to keep them out of your ports.' No doubt there was more to be said for that. Her Majesty had a right to prohibit the entrance of any vessel into her ports. But, at the same time, Her Majesty's Government thought that, while preserving neutrality and admitting Federal vessels into our ports, if Confederate vessels or even a limited number of them were to be excluded, they would be accused of oppressing the weak and truckling to the strong. On the whole, therefore, it was thought more consistent with a fair neutrality to allow the vessels of both parties to come into our ports.

[This opinion, emanating from the legal adviser of the Government, is in exact conformity with the views expressed in an article entitled 'The Alabama and Tuscaloosa,' which appeared a few weeks since in our columns. We have only to hope that the Government will adhere unflinchingly to the doctrine which has been thus laid down. It is based on reason and on authority, and has now received a sanction which, as against the Government, is irrefragable. It, moreover, completely annihilates the latest edition of the theories of 'Historicus.']

The Solicitor-General said the Government were considering the matter, and that a remonstrance would shortly be conveyed to the Confederate Government, though 'it was by no means easy to make communications to the Confederate Government, nor was the difficulty lightened by their having expelled our consuls.' [We presume this statement was made under instructions from Earl Russell; but surely the Solicitor-General must know that the principal consuls were withdrawn from the South, and, according to English etiquette, it is not proper for an advocate to knowingly put forward a false statement, even though it appears in his brief.]

In answer to Sir J. Colebrooke, Mr. Lefevre said he did not mean to assert that the shipbuilders of Liverpool and Glasgow were guilty under the Foreign Enlistment Act, 'but he conceived they were virtually and morally breaking the law, if they knew that they were selling vessels to a belligerent.' [We suppose, in the Hon. Member's opinion, those who sell rifles, cannon, and ammunition to the Federals do not 'virtually and morally break the law.']

THE ISLAND OF SAN JUAN.

United States papers have asserted that the conduct of General Doyle has been censured, and that he has been recalled. In reply to Mr. Haliburton, Mr. Layard said General Doyle has not been recalled, and his conduct has received the entire approval of Her Majesty's Government.

CONTRABAND OF WAR IN BRITISH VESSELS.

Mr. Long asked whether a ship belonging to the Confederate navy would have the same right to search and make prize of an English vessel carrying contraband of war to a Federal port that a Federal war-vessel would exercise in the case of a British ship carrying contraband of war to a Confederate port; and, if not, whether such partiality in favour of one of two belligerent Powers was reconcilable with the 'strict neutrality' professed by Her Majesty's Government. The Attorney-General said there could be no doubt whatever that a Confederate vessel would have exactly the same right to visit, search, and capture a British vessel carrying contraband of war to a Federal port as a Federal vessel would to act in like manner to a British vessel carrying contraband to a Confederate port; but that it should always be remembered that neither was entitled to make any such capture except for the purpose of taking such ship for adjudication before a competent prize-court.

THE PAMPERO.

Mr. Dalglish asked whether the Government were prepared to accept from the owners of the Pampero and other steamers seized by the Government on the plea that these vessels were intended for the Confederate States of America a similar assurance to that which the Government have declared themselves satisfied with when given by the Danish Ambassador. The hon. member said that the contract for the building of the Pampero had been cancelled before the seizure, and that she had since been offered for sale to Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Layard said the cases were different. The Danish Minister had come forward and given the fullest information, whilst in the case of the Confederate vessels, 'subterfuge, not to use a stronger word, and every means of evading the law, were had recourse to.' Mr. Layard also said: 'Moreover, the word of the Danish Minister amounted to a diplomatic guarantee, on which Her Majesty's Government had the utmost reliance. On the other side, he doubted whether any such engagement upon which Her Majesty's Government could place similar reliance could be given.'

[An insult from the hon. member will never damage any Government or individual, but his praise is dangerous. We hope that M. de Bille will be able to assure his Government that he has done nothing to merit any commendation from Mr. Layard.]

DENMARK.

An important debate took place in the House of Lords on Tuesday. The Earl of Derby called attention to the changed character of the war. Slesvig was no longer held as a material guarantee; the Dannewerke has been destroyed, Jutland has been invaded, and preparations are going on for the capture of the town of Fredericia. Under these circumstances, His Lordship enquired if the Government would, without loss of time, lay before the House the papers on this subject, running down to the latest period.

Earl Russell thought it necessary, in reply, to state his views. He holds that the war, on the part of Austria and Prussia, is unjustifiable. The reparation asked for by the German Powers had not been refused, but the Danish Government had avowed its willingness to reconsider their position before the allied forces entered Slesvig. Therefore Denmark was justified in considering the invasion a cause of war. Moreover, Denmark had declared war against all the German Powers, and this was also justifiable on account of the Federal army of occupation encouraging the pretender to the sovereignty of the Duchies. Earl Russell would not at present lay upon the table the papers relating to the pending negotiations for a Conference. His Lordship then explained the course pursued by the Government. After the rejection of the proposed armistice, the Government proposed to the belligerents that they should meet 'and endeavour to restore peace without any cessation of hostilities.' Austria and Prussia assented, and have since declared they are ready to agree to an armistice 'on the present military status quo.' He has no doubt France, Russia, and Sweden are willing to join the Conference. The answer of Denmark would be received not later than the beginning of next week, and then the papers could be produced.

The Earl of Derby wished for the papers before Easter, but Earl Russell said he could not fix a time, 'as there is great pressure in the Foreign Office on account of preparing papers on China and America.'

In reply to the Earl of Ellenborough, Earl Russell said that one of the conditions of the armistice proposed by Austria and Prussia was, that the Austrian and Prussian forces should occupy the Duchy of Schleswig, and that the Danes should occupy the whole of Jutland.

The Earl of Ellenborough: Then I hope the noble Earl will at once reject that proposition.

The Earl of Shaftesbury asked for information respecting the movements of the Austrian fleet towards the Baltic. His Lordship bitterly denounced the conduct of Austria and Prussia. He said: 'Never have I known the people of England more profoundly stirred than they are on the present occasion. Never have I known exhibited a greater anxiety than is shown at the present moment in contemplating the issue of the struggle between the little and gallant kingdom of Denmark and its two overgrown and powerful oppressors. It is fifty millions against two millions in that unequal contest. I must say that the feelings of this country have been much touched by the conduct of the King of Denmark. The concession which the King of Denmark has promised to make must be considered a sufficient reparation for any wrong which has been committed. This little kingdom comes before its mighty oppressors and says, "Have patience with me, and I will pay you all;" but instead of that they seize it by the throat, invade its territory, inflict upon it unutterable calamities, and institute a war which I think every one will say, for wantonness and needlessness, is one of the most disgraceful to be found in the pages of ancient or modern history.' In conclusion Lord Shaftesbury said, if an Austrian fleet was sent to the Baltic, he hoped it would be met by a British fleet, 'that fleet having instructions from Her Majesty to watch its movements, to restrict its operations, and, if necessary, to defend by force of arms the integrity and the sanctity of the kingdom and people of Denmark.'

Earl Russell replied that he had heard from the Austrian Ambassador that the fleet was not intended for the Baltic, but to aid in protecting German commerce. He thought that every true friend of Austria must deplore her present proceedings.

The Earl of Ellenborough made a spirited appeal to their Lordships, which was greeted with such cheers as are rarely heard in the House of Lords. He declared that little confidence could now be placed in the promises of Austria. He believed that the Austrian fleet was on its way to join the Prussian fleet in the Baltic; and if that happened, the Danish strongholds must fall, and the very existence of Denmark would be sacrificed. He asked Earl Russell 'whether he will stand by and see that atrocity perpetrated upon a weak power?' The fate of Denmark to-day might be the fate of Holland and Belgium to-morrow. He considered that before the Easter recess Parliament ought to assure Her Majesty that it is ready to support any measures necessary for the maintenance of the independence of Denmark.

Earl Grey and the Earl of Harrowby expressed their entire concurrence with the observations of the Earl of Ellenborough.

Earl Russell said: 'What Her Majesty's Government have done has been to negotiate, but also to maintain themselves at liberty to act with other Powers, or if they thought fit to act alone, if the honour and the paramount interests of England should require it.' And he subsequently added: 'All I can say is, that the Government will consult according to their own opinions the honour and the interests of this country. They will not make war when the safety and the interest, the integrity and the independence, of Denmark can be secured by negotiation; but otherwise they will not neglect any means by which that safety and that independence and integrity can be secured. With regard to the fleet, ten days or a fortnight ago, that we might be able to have it at command, it was ordered into one of the home ports, so that any orders given to it might be at once obeyed. If it were thought necessary to give any orders to that fleet, it would be at once within our reach; and certainly I should not expect that any fleet of Austria or of Prussia would venture to encounter a squadron of ours.'

[It is remarkable that this important declaration that the Government is preparing to defend the integrity and independence of Denmark by force of arms should have been extorted by an incidental discussion, and that no similar announcement should have been made in the House of Commons.]

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Lord Palmerston stated, in answer to Mr. Disraeli, that, in the opinion of the Government, 'the whole matter with reference to operations beyond the Eider is an outrage on the independence of Denmark,' and that 'any extension of the occupation of Danish territory is an outrage, whatever excuse for it may be given.'

THE BRITISH ARMY.

According to the forms of the House of Commons, a motion for the increase of an estimate is not admissible, on the assumption that the Government may be inclined to ask for too much, but not for too little. Under these circumstances, Mr. Baillie, before the army estimates were submitted on Thursday last, protested against the proposed reduction of the forces. The hon. member had two principal objections. The first is, that our present force is too small to relieve the regiments in the colonies, and particularly in India. Our Indian Empire is a costly possession. The term of continuous service in India is limited to ten years. Now, a battalion goes out 1,000 strong. What is left of it at the end of ten years? The mortality is 690, and of the balance, 310, so many are invalided and sent home, that, 'practically speaking, the battalion is annihilated in ten years.' On January 1 we had 107 battalions serving abroad, and to give them relief every ten years, and a rest of five years, a reserve of 53 battalions is necessary; but the force at home does not exceed 34 battalions. Therefore, to reduce our reserve is to impair the health, efficiency, and the discipline of the army. The Marquis of Hartington stated that during the ensuing year there will be 11 battalions at home, 45 in the colonies, and 55 in India.] Mr. Baillie's second objection was that the influence of England had declined, owing to the impression in Europe and America that the people had grown rich, and were more anxious to preserve their money than the honour of the country. To this must be attributed 'the humiliation of England's Foreign Minister, and his failure in all diplomatic negotiations.' Earl Russell had failed with regard to Poland and Denmark, because it was well understood that 'the Ministers of England had decided, under no circumstances, to go to war.' Mr. Baillie did not say we ought to go to war, but he maintained that, 'if England interfered, England ought to be prepared for the result.' The Ministers were attempting to trade on the reputation of the country, 'forgetting that, under their hands, that reputation had passed away.' At first sight it seemed strange that a reduction of the army should be proposed; but the reason was the divisions in the Cabinet, and the necessity the Prime Minister was under of making concessions 'even to the humblest section of his political supporters.'

In moving the estimates, the Marquis of Hartington made the following financial statement, premising that he should have to submit a supplementary estimate of 400,000*l.*, part of which was for the war in New Zealand:—

ESTIMATES FOR

1861–2	15,883,000
1863–4	15,060,237
1864–5	14,844,888

Compared with 1861-2, there was this year a reduction of 1,038,112*l.*, and, compared with last year, of 213,349*l.* But deducting the amounts that would, it is calculated, be repaid into the Exchequer, the present estimate was, in fact, 13,529,440*l.*, or 2,362,714*l.* less than the estimates for 1861-2. The number of men proposed was 146,766 men of all ranks, being a reduction of 1,464 compared with last year. In defence of this reduction the Marquis said: 'He fully admitted that the estimates he was going to move were peace estimates. The Government had not based their estimates upon the supposition that the country was likely to be soon involved in war.' After some discussion the vote for the men was agreed to.

A MINISTERIAL MAJORITY OF 'ONE.'

On Thursday, Colonel Edwards moved a resolution that the discontinuance of the annual assembling of the Yeomanry Cavalry for six days' training would be detrimental to the efficiency of that force. The Marquis of Hartington and Lord Palmerston defended the policy of the Government, and on a division, the Government had a majority of 'one,' the numbers being 157 to 158. The announcement of the result of the division was loudly cheered by the Opposition. On a question touching the efficiency of the defences of the country, such a majority was nearly as damaging to the Government as an actual defeat.

GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES BILL.

On Monday, Mr. Gladstone explained to the House his proposal for a system of Government Life Assurance. He states that at present the societies to which the working classes resort are so unsafe that the insurers are under a great risk of losing their money. The Bill he has introduced provides that the Government shall issue policies for small amounts, so as to give the working classes an unfailing security that the provision they make for their families will not be taken from them by fraud or mismanagement. Mr. Gladstone did not deny that this would be an interference with private enterprise, but he contended that there were exceptions to the principle of Government non-intervention (as with factory children and sanitary regulations), and that this was a proper exception. After rather an animated discussion, the further consideration of the Bill was adjourned till next week. This measure is producing considerable agitation amongst the working classes.

THE GALWAY PACKET SERVICE.

Mr. F. Peel stated that the Galway Company has asked to have their contract suspended until the beginning of June. During six months the Company had omitted four voyages on each side.

THE ALLEGED COMBINATION AGAINST FRANCE.

On Tuesday Mr. Hunt asked Lord Palmerston for an explanation of a passage which occurred in a despatch from Lord Napier to Earl Russell, dated January 6, 1864, in which the following language is attributed to Prince Gortschakoff: 'The four Governments (i. e. England, Russia, Prussia, and Austria), happily now thinking and acting in harmony on a question still more important than that of Holstein and Schleswig, ought not in this matter to be split into two camps opposing each other.' Lord Palmerston replied that he thought Prince Gortschakoff must have alluded to a general European Congress. His Lordship added: 'If the honourable gentleman means to enquire, as I suppose he does, whether there was any combination by these four Powers against France, I assure him there was no ground whatever for any such supposition.'

A GOVERNMENT SURRENDER.

Mr. Adderly moved: 'That grants made from the Treasury to schools for the working classes should not, in every case, be reduced by the whole amount of all endowments.' As this is opposed to the education system so strongly contended for by the Government last Session, it was expected that the Ministry would resist the motion. But a glance at the Opposition benches determined the Government to surrender at discretion; and Mr Lowe consented to the motion, not that he was convinced it was right, but in deference to the feeling of the House.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

Manchester, March 9

I remarked last week the not insignificant fact that since the opening of Parliament the Southern Independence Association has been receiving daily a very large accession of strength. Every post brings applications for membership from all quarters of Great Britain and Ireland, and from, politically, religiously, and socially, all sorts and conditions of men. One of the most recently enrolled members is a county magistrate, of that peaceful creed to which John Bright nominally belongs, but to which his daily thoughts and wishes continually give the lie. Another is a conscientious advocate of anti-slavery principles, who nevertheless writes as follows: 'I beg to say that I think the Southerners have clearly the right to dissolve partnership and withdraw from union with the North. I think also the abolition of slavery a contemptible subterfuge in the mouths of the Federals, but I think likewise that slavery is wrong, and do not use or purchase fabrics manufactured from slave-grown cotton; so that I am not sure that, with these opinions, your society would think me properly a member of the Southern Independence Association.' A third applicant for membership philosophises upon the slavery question thus: 'Any people having no occupation and no talent for reproductive industry, must, in the nature of things, under the proposed new system, be treated ultimately with cruelty. Slaves, coaxed or forced from their regular employment, must suffer under Northern rule from competition with those who occupy the lowest walks of labour. For the sake of the negro, therefore, I cannot forbear saying that, in common with almost every one I know, I wish success to the Confederates in their struggle for independence.'

A gentleman writing from County Mayo says: 'I desire to have my name enrolled as a member of the Southern Independence Association, and am indeed glad to see that so excellent a means has been established of testing the real feeling of British subjects on a question so vital to their interests, for I have no doubt that the present cowardly truckling to the Northern States, so far from satisfying them, will only encourage and urge them, at the first opportune moment, to 'come down upon us' in a way they would never attempt if their dishonesty and bullying had been met by our Government as it ought to have been, —a line of policy which I hope is not yet too late to be adopted. . . . I only know of one proprietor in this quarter who sympathises with the Federals.'

At an influential meeting held last evening at Rochdale, Mr. Robert Duncan, cotton spinner and manufacturer, in the chair, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:—'1st. That a requisition, signed by the merchants, manufacturers, and general tradesmen of the town, be sent to Mr. James Spence of Liverpool, requesting him to deliver an address at Rochdale upon the American question.' 2nd. That the Secretary of the Southern Independence Association, Mr. Staley, be authorised to draw up such requisition and take the necessary steps for getting it influentially and numerously signed. 3rd. That this meeting form a committee, to be called the Rochdale Branch of the Southern Independence Association.' Sympathy with the Confederacy and antipathy to Mr. Cobden are to some intents and purposes convertible terms, and we are therefore not surprised that the Southerners of Rochdale are meditating a course of action not included within the limits of the foregoing resolutions. The Rochdale Pilot, referring to an important meeting of the Conservative party, thus speculates upon some political movement against John Bright's colleague in his advocacy of pro-Federalism:—

'That a feeling has long been entertained of the impropriety of the Conservative party in Rochdale acquiescing in the representation of the borough by Mr. Cobden is undoubted. That feeling found very strong expression at the recent public dinner of the party, and has at length, we are glad to say, developed into action. On Thursday evening last, in accordance with a numerously-signed requisition, which set forth the present isolation of the party in Rochdale, and the advisability of an effort to redress such a condition of things, a meeting was held in the warehouse of Messrs. Stott and Pilling, Cheetham Street, J. S. Entwistle, Esq., presiding, to take into consideration the propriety of contesting the borough at the next election. It would be premature at this stage to say more than that the attendance was very large, that a strong and unanimous opinion was expressed as to the desirability of reversing the existing political representation of the borough, and matters put in a train for the accomplishment, if possible, of that result; and that the proceedings of the meeting, from the inception to the close, were marked by great enthusiasm.'

There needs some political check like that to counteract—unless it be too late—the mischievous tendency of the speeches recently delivered by Messrs. Cobden and Bright, in their rabidly anti-patriotic desire to recruit from our own population the wasted armies of the North. Thanks to the eloquent aid of those representative Englishmen, the threat conveyed, in an extract from the New York Shipping List, that agents and emissaries were on the eve of being despatched to the United Kingdom, to swell the immigration to the States in 1864 to at least half a million of able-bodied men, is already beginning to be enacted with a vengeance. The following paragraph in the Manchester Courier is the first, but will probably not be the last, upon this subject:—

'Emigration from Ashton and the District. — A considerable number of emigrants to New York, said to have been engaged as weavers, left the Charlestown station, Ashton-under-Lyne, yesterday morning. The departure was witnessed by

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris, March

However unwilling the great [illegible] to believe in the imminence of war, the [illegible] far distant as gradually to [illegible] The press of all shades of opinion [illegible] rumour's thousand tongues are [illegible] little facts calculated to confirm [illegible] the only topic of conversation. Last [illegible] diplomatist said to me, 'This time next year we shall be at peace, and you will be at war.' I do not [illegible] is likely to come true in the first part [illegible] from the knowledge of things as they are, [illegible] often proved false in regard to America, that I [illegible] is quite wrong. Events seem fast tending [illegible] second part of his prophecy. The [illegible] seems to remain, the common sense of mankind [illegible] poor assurance, for that which the [illegible] uncommon sense has rarely prevented [illegible] or a monarchy, from rushing into [illegible] already called your readers' attention [illegible] preparations quickly in progress [illegible] these must be now added the hastened armaments of the iron-clads at Cherbourg.

M. Fould is said to be on the point of resigning, and this would be thought the most conclusive [illegible] far distant, as the Minister of Finance, [illegible] has always insisted on peace as the indispensable [illegible] restoring the equilibrium of the budget. Another Ministerial change, by which Gen. Fleury would replace Marshal Randon, is also spoken of, and it also is considered symptomatic of war.

The Archduke Maximilian arrived at last on Saturday. The delay in his coming, and the threatening attitude assumed by Austria in Italy, had led to an unfounded rumour that the difficulties which have surrounded this negotiation were insurmountable. The Nation of last night—which, by the way has of late assumed a very decided tone of opposition—thus sums up its judgment of the decision the Archduke has come to:

'Behind him he leaves Europe troubled, its States mistrustful of each other; he leaves his brother, the Emperor of Austria, in presence of Denmark mutilated, Poland revolted, and Italy still menacing. He leaves Germany hesitating and wavering between the various influences which pretend to sway her. Even the relations between France and Austria, the only ones which need cause the Archduke serious reflection, if we regard them in the light in which they present themselves to most bystanders, show us the possibility that while France with one hand puts a crown on the head of the Archduke Maximilian, she may with the other draw the sword against the Emperor Francis Joseph. It would be a strange sight, and new to history, to behold a great power protecting and attacking at the same time two members of the same family, and able to hold him she protects as a hostage against the other whom she combats. Yet such eventual possibilities seem to have no terrors for the Archduke. He goes straight to his end, and with such undaunted assurance, that, after admiring his courage, we cannot refrain from regarding the resolution he seems to have taken as a pledge of peace for Europe.'

I have made this extract because it expresses very faithfully the general feeling here. It reflects the irritation felt against Austria both in regard to Denmark and the state of siege in Gallicia, and, above all, in consequence of the rumoured alliance with Russia and Prussia of which these acts are considered the result. It reflects also the wish of the French people to see the expedition to Mexico triumphantly concluded. While the Times was expressing its displeasure with Germany by proposing to restore to France the Rhine frontiers—an act which would be totally at variance with the system of nationalities of which France is herself the protectress—the French Government addressed a note to England on the eventualities of a European war, in which it is proposed not to restore the Rhine provinces to France, but to erect them into a neutral state destined to guard the eastern frontier against the ambition of Germany.

The Isthmus of Suez has of late occupied the law courts here after exhausting the resources of diplomacy. The dispute between the Company and the Viceroy, which turns on the employment of forced labour and the grant of an immense tract of land made by the last Pasha, was referred to M. de Morny, whose decision, based on a legal report, is understood to have been averse to the Company. It has now been offered to the Emperor's arbitrage, and he has appointed a commission, presided over by M. Thouvenel, Lord Stratford's old adversary, to report on the whole case.

The attention which the state of Europe attracts may account for the comparatively little interest taken by the French public in American affairs. The Presse is the only paper which has mentioned them in the last week, and this only to repeat its gloomy vaticinations of the speedy victory of the Federals; but this has little influence on opinion, for the Presse takes such delight in inventing and defending paradoxes, that its approval is now almost equivalent to universal discredit. The Pays, which for some time seemed wavering in its view of what it wished, gives in its last number a very fairly written summary of the latest news, and does not fail to call attention to the position made for the slaves which fall to the conscription, and who are to have the honour of being killed for the Union, without forming a part of the United States army. In the same paper there is a letter from a subscriber, illustrating the celebrated civis romanus theory, in a fashion which our English experience of its value makes us envy. He tells how one of twelve young abbés who followed a bishop to Texas from the Lyons seminary, having been ordained, was in charge of a parish there, when the Federals reached, destroyed the village, rifled the chapel, and were on the point of shooting him. The muskets were already pointed, and the word 'Fire!' only had to be pronounced. 'I am a Frenchman!' he cried. 'As a priest you may shoot me, but as a Frenchman you must answer for my blood to my Emperor and my country.' At these words, says the correspondent of the Phys, the muskets were lowered, the altar-vessels and other valuables were restored, and a sum was paid for the damage done. When all was settled, the first danger past, the thirst of martyrdom seems to have seized the young priest, who, turning to the Yankees, said, 'You may now shoot me if you dare.' It is hard to believe the story, for the Federal troops are little given to disgorging their prey, still less to paying for damage done.

This morning's Constitution, in an article proceeding from M. Limayrac, deprecates any hasty appreciation of the events which now disturb Europe. It concludes in the following words, which at least have the merit of committing no one: 'The Holy Alliance which the Times and Morning Post have conjured up is, we repeat it, a phantom. As for the triple alliance of Prussia, Austria, and Russia, we desire, before judging it, to be assured of its existence, and then to know on what conditions it exists.'

On the approaching elections for Paris, which occupy a large space in most of the papers, I shall be better able to write next week. As yet, the candidates are not designed by the grand electors, as the Daily News calls the editors of the three Liberal papers and the nine representatives of the City. M. Carnot seems designated for one of the two vacant seats, and an artisan claims to represent the Faubourg St. Antoine. Government has not yet announced its abstention or participation in the struggle.

The Discussione publishes the text of the Emperor's answer to the address of the National Association on the subject of the late conspiracy. The last phrase is much remarked on. 'Such attempts, doubt not, can in no wise change my feelings towards your country; and I shall always consider it an honour to have contributed to establish its independence.'

THE NEGRO'S PLACE IN NATURE.

(From the Reader of March 5th.)

Professor Huxley has, for some cause, been induced to make a public attack on a paper entitled 'The Negro's Place in Nature,' which I recently read before the Anthropological Society of London. If Mr Huxley had confined his remarks to a fair statement of the arguments of that paper, I should not have troubled you with this communication: but there is such a misrepresentation (unintentional, I hope) of my position, that I feel bound to give an indignant denial to the charges there insinuated against me—viz, that my views were brought forward in behalf of the 'slave-holding interest.' When such charges were made by the Morning Star, they were amusing; but when men of science indulge in such contemptible imputations, silence is no longer possible, and the 'stigma of public condemnation' will not fail eventually to be affixed to one who resorts to such fanatical expedients. Professor Huxley is reported to have said: 'I hold in my hand an address to a scientific body of this country;' and he then quoted as a specimen extract a portion of a letter from a lady who had paid some attention to this subject in America.

I cited this extract, not as a scientific argument, but simply as an illustration of the interest taken, and knowledge possessed, by some ladies; and, imperfect as some of these observations undoubtedly are, I still hold that they contrast favourably with much of the scientific teaching on the physical characters of the Negro in this country. It is an utter misrepresentation to assert this to be a part of the paper which I submitted to the Anthropological Society. When a demand arose for copies of my paper, the Council consented to its separate publication, and gave their sanction to my affixing a letter which I had written to Captain Burton; and the extract so much complained of merely occurs in a postscript to this printed letter, erroneously alluded to by Professor Huxley as a 'preface.' It can only be wilful misrepresentation which attempts to exhibit this extract or any portion of the letter as a part of the paper; and, as it was not intended as a scientific argument, I shall take no further notice of Mr. Huxley's misplaced strictures. Nor is Professor Huxley more happy in his criticisms on the assertions contained in the paper. Vrolik's meaning is clearly given in the words I quoted, although I might have added, for person, dull of comprehension, that the pelvis of the male Negro did not bear absolutely 'a great resemblance to the lower mammalia,' but simply a greater general resemblance in comparison with that of the European.

Professor Huxley asserts that the observation 'that the grey substance of the brain of the Negro is of darker colour than that of the European, that the whole brain has a smoky tint, and that the pia mater contains brown spots, which are never found in the brain of the European,' is contradicted by the note which I inserted in support of this opinion; but one extract from the note is, 'The pia mater of the negro presented in certain spots a brown tint; nothing of the kind existed in the white subject. The white substance of the negro brain had a smoky tint, but it was especially in the grey substance that the brown tint was marked. The two brains were placed in two separate vases containing the same quantity of alcohol. After three days they were sufficiently firm to be examined. The difference of coloration was then as decided as on the first day.' This is the opinion of Dr. Paul Broca; and Professor Gubler's observations only indicate that there is a trace of coloration sometimes to be detected in the brain of some Europeans of dark complexions, and in no way invalidates the assertion that the brain of the negro is darker, and that the pia mater contains brown spots, which are never found to the same extent in the European.

I certainly differ very materially from Professor Huxley respecting the justifiability of the Northern expenditure of blood and treasure for such a cause as the abolition of negro slavery, but shall not resort to the unscientific practice to which he has now given his sanction, of railing at those from whom we differ.

I can readily understand the vexation which Professor Huxley must feel at the little support his own speculations have met with at the hands of the anthropologists of Europe, and I am glad to know that he now feels deeply for the 'unsuspecting public' on whom he has called for so large an amount of imagination and conjecture to supply the place of true science.

No one surely can hold me in any way responsible for the opinions of Dr. Van Evrie or any other writer whom I have quoted, and I protest against the assertion that I quoted from Dr. Evrie 'apparently with entire approbation,' for I said nothing which warrants any one in making such a statement. It is equally false to assert that I quoted Dr. Van Evrie's opinions as the 'verdict of science.'

Mr. Huxley may feel it his duty to affix the 'stigma of public condemnation' to my paper, as others have done to his own labours; such sentiments, I cannot but think, come with a very bad grace from the author of such a book as 'Evidence as to Man's Place in Nature.'

It is my good fortune to know that my paper has been received with the highest approval by many of the chief anthropologists of Europe. It is also satisfactory for me to feel that my scientific brethren in this country have, for the most part, returned me their thanks for my efforts to elucidate the truth on the difficult question of the physical, mental, and moral characters of the Negro race.

As evidence that I am not unsupported on this question by those who have paid the most attention to it, I have obtained permission to quote the following extract from a letter received from Dr. Barnard Davis, one of the learned authors of 'Crania Britannica,' and who, from the continuous attention he has paid to the subject, is far more capable of judging of the value of my paper than a mere theoretical anatomist. Dr. B. Davis writes:—

'I received your capital "Negro's Place in Nature" yesterday, and hasten to return you my warmest thanks for the moral courage and ability you have exhibited in endeavouring to raise the standard of truth, which has been so long and so sadly trampled in the mire by the pretented and mistaken friends of humanity.

'It is a bold, manly, temperate, and clever effort to stem the torrent of bastard philanthropy, which is now producing a vast and immeasurable amount of evil to mankind, especially to the negro, enough to make every human heart weep.

'I have all along felt most keenly the inhuman cruelty aimed at the hitherto happy and most useful negro slaves in the Southern States by the abolitionists and pseudo-philanthropists. The ignorance of these people would carry the negroes back into a state of barbarism and misery, which is likely to result in the most fiendish acts.'

When I receive numbers of such letters from my scientific brethren, I can well afford to treat ungenerous attacks on my scientific honesty with all the contempt they merit.

SOUTHERN PRISONERS' RELIEF FUND.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—Some of your readers will no doubt have heard that an attempt is being made to get up an amateur theatrical performance in aid of the 'Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund.' Arrangements are now sufficiently advanced for us to ask the assistance of sympathisers. If you would kindly give this note a place in your columns, and permit letters to be addressed to your care, such assistance would, no doubt, be freely offered. It might take the form either of personal aid on Committee, &c., or of pecuniary contributions towards expenses. There are still vacancies in our corps dramatique. I may add that a drama, founded on events of the war is being written for the occasion. I am, &c.,

FEDERAL ENLISTMENT IN IRELAND.

(From the Irish Times of March 1.)

On Saturday last 600 able-bodied young men left the North Wall for New York. They had been collected from this city and the suburban districts, and were brought to the quays in groups of four, ten, fifteen, or twenty. Wherever in the neighbourhood of Dublin labourers' work was proceeding, there the Federal agent appeared, picked out the strongest men, talked them over, and generally succeeded in buying their lives. The men are not told in express words that they must enlist in the Federal armies, but they know very well what they are required to do, and what they must do. They are ostensibly engaged to work the construction of a railway for three months. The whereabouts of the railway we have been unable to discover. Their passage, clothes, and food are paid for, and they are nominally allowed a dollar a day until the expiration of the three months. Their accounts will be settled, and the cost of their passage, clothes, and keep, is to be deducted from the money due from the quarter's service. When that settlement is made, the men 'may enlist in the Federal armies if they please' or, if they prefer it, they may seek work. The Northerners are a sharp people, and they take good care that the 'three months men' must enlist in the Federal army to keep themselves from prison.

For on arriving at New York the 'emigrants' are placed by themselves either on some island or in an isolated depot. While there they must buy food, water, boots, and clothing. They are charged ten dollars for what is worth two. Temptations are offered to them of every kind. If they have no money, so much the better. An accommodating dealer in greenbacks attends every company, and cashes their notes in advance at an enormous percentage. On the expiration of the three months the emigrant has had some experience in digging trenches, more in drill, but he is overwhelmed with debt. He has been exposed to the rapacity of a swarm of harpies and to a legion of seducers. He is told he may find employment where he pleases, when he has paid his debts. In his difficulty he is offered 165*l*. in greenbacks, a sum which will clear off his liabilities, and give him some capital to commence a new score, until that too is wasted, and then he 'is sent to the front.'

There never was devised a more iniquitous scheme of deception, and, unhappily, never was a wicked device so successful. Misguided young men are hired and then plundered, and they are plundered to compel them to enlist. When they are once regularly enlisted, they have nothing before them but death—death either in the sudden shock of battle, for they will be placed, as usual, in the van or on the forlorn hope; or death after lingering suffering, when they have been abandoned wounded on the field; or death by fever, which kills them off like flies in pestilential hospitals, whose very walls are impregnated with disease.

Out of every hundred men who leave their sweethearts, their families, and their work behind them, not ten will be alive at this time next year, and of these more than half will be maimed and crippled for the brief term of their days. A more deadly war was never waged than that between the North and the South—deadly by wounds, deadly by hardship, deadly by disease; and in this war five Irishmen have been slain for one native American.

It is such an emigration as this that dilettanti professors pronounce to be the hope of Ireland and the blessing of the people. The opinions of these theorists might be laughed at were they not indicative of something which is very sad. All those who pronounce this emigration to be good are persons well known for their connection with Government. It follows, then, that the Government will never interfere to prevent that which their scribes are required to represent as a blessing. A ship is seized because there is a suspicion that it is intended for the use of the Confederates. Her owner is called upon to produce proof that she is designed for some non-belligerent state. Yet a ship is useless without men, and stores, and arms; but within bowshot of the Castle of Dublin, under the very eyes of Her Majesty's Government, bodies of 600 men, whose walk and movement betray that they have undergone some preliminary drilling in this country, are marched to the transport ship, bound for the great seaport of the Northern belligerent. If the destination of a ship must be known, why not the destination of regiments of 600 men? Why are not the captains of emigrant ships compelled to give bonds to guarantee the peaceable character of the employment for which these emigrants are designed? Our Consuls in the American cities could readily ascertain how these emigrants were distributed, and the Federal Government, grateful as they should be for many favours, ought to engage to enlist in their armies no emigrant from these countries until a year after his arrival. There is employment now for every able-bodied man in Ireland. Many of those men who departed on Saturday held situations, some of them to our knowledge under public bodies, at salaries of from 15*s*. to 18*s*. a week. There is a good prospect of still better remuneration now that so many sources of employment are being gradually opened. But where will labourers be found? Where peasants to till the soil? Where soldiers whom we may soon need? The blind apathy of Government sees not the cruel deportation of the strength of the land, or, perceiving that the flight of 'emigrants' occurs when they are at the helm, proclaim loudly that the depopulation of a country is the greatest of blessings.

ITEMS ABOUT FORT SUMTER.

The garrison of the fort was five hundred men of the First South Carolina Artillery, under command of Colonel Alfred Rhett.

At the commencement of the bombardment of August 17, 1863, there were in the fort 131,000 pounds of gunpowder. The magazine containing it became in a few days unsafe, from the destructive effect of the 200-pounder Parrott shells and shots hurled into the walls and casements adjoining it. The powder was removed by night to the west magazine, and shipped as fast as possible to Charleston.

On Sunday, August 23, the Ironsides and seven Monitors commenced a terrific bombardment. A fog protected them from the guns of Moultrie. Sumter, having only two ten-inch and one eleven-inch gun left en barbette, could only fire an occasional shot to show life. For seven hours at close range, the fleet hurled shot and shell into the work. Striking the wall near the parapet, loose bricks were thrown up in columns, and fell in showers around the gunners and about the work. Walls were ploughed through, casemates were filled with sand, and the shells passed across the parade, striking the interior wall of the west magazine, containing powder enough to destroy fort and garrison. One shell struck the ventilator and exploded. It filled the magazine with smoke. Another more successful shot, and all would have been lost. It was an anxious moment, but the fort was held.

Gradually the morning dawned. The fog lifted, and Fort Moultrie opened fire on the ships. Instead of continuing their fire at this critical period, the fleet withdrew, and the danger was remitted. The object was now, in the unsafe condition of the fort, to get rid of the powder. It depends on time and the movements of the fleet. Had the fleet early renewed the attack, the business might have been done. The fleet delayed! Night after night the powder was moved in barrels under the enemy's guns. Only eight hundred pounds were left—the crisis was passed! The fort was now safe from the explosion of the powder in its magazine.

Another grand combined attack of land batteries and fleet was made, during which a shell from a ship passed through the wall into the shell-room and exploded, imminently endangering piles of loaded shells, and bursting open the door of the magazine adjoining. Colonel Rhett ordered the shells to be rolled into the water. This was done under a heavy fire directed upon that portion of the work.

The fort was now safe from explosion of any sort; it only remained to hold the work under the enemy's battering, and to repulse assaults.

The attack of September 2 failed, and the first bombardment of Sumter ended. It had lasted sixteen days. Since then no such grand attack of all the Monitors and the Ironsides has been made upon Fort Sumter. During the fight of September 8, three Monitors were disabled in an effort to save the Weehawken, grounded within range.

Besides the detachment at the guns, men and officers were incessantly occupied. Heavy ordnance was mounted, shifted, and dismounted. Banks, temporary buildings, and combustible matter were cleared away. There was much work to be done by the soldiers in digging dirt from the parade and filling casemates with sand. Negroes were also engaged in this duty, as also in protecting the hospital, magazines, and guns, by sand traverses. Troops, ammunition, and provisions were carried all night long, in small boats, to and from Fort Sumter and Morris Island. Invaluable pieces of huge ordnance, shot, shell, powder, and commissary stores were saved to the Confederacy by this night-work of the garrison.

On August 27, the artillery was withdrawn, leaving but one company in the fort. General Beauregard offered to relieve Colonel Rhett, if he needed rest. The Colonel declined to be relieved while any of his men were in the work or it was considered to be an artillery post.

The south wall of the fort was knocked into a mass of rubbish. The north-east and north-west walls were cut down and honeycombed; the casements battered into heaps of brick and mortar. The east wall was scarred, pitted, and breached. Every available gun had been dismounted and rendered unserviceable. The fort was a mere wreck, but the Confederate flag still flew over the silent ruins. Half of the men left in the fort were unfit for duty from want of sleep and exhaustion.

On the night of September 8 the enemy assaulted Sumter, but, as had been anticipated, Major Elliot, in command, easily repulsed them, sinking many of their barges and launches.

The engineers were allowed fifty days to build bomb-proofs of earth and erect additional traverses for protection of the garrison, before the second bombardment of October 26. To-day (January 15), for all purposes of defence, Fort Sumter is stronger than ever.—Charleston Correspondence.

THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

On Saturday, Feb. 13, Mr. Johnson of Ga. offered a joint resolution, which passed, giving thanks to Commander John Taylor Wood, C. S. Navy, for the daring and brilliantly executed plans which resulted in the capture of the U. S. transport schooner Elmore, on the Potomac River; of the ship Alleghany and the U. S. gunboats Satellite and Reliance, and the U. S. transport schooners Golden Rod, Coquette, and Two Brothers, on the Chesapeake; and more recently, in the capture from under the guns of the enemy's works of the U. S. gunboat Underwriter, in the Neuse River, near Newbern, N. C., with the officers and crews of the several vessels brought off as prisoners.

Rations of Yankee Prisoners.—Mr. Preston of Virginia, from the Committee on Quarter-master's and Commissary Departments, to whom was referred the resolution of the House inquiring into the facts concerning the allegation that an insufficient quantity of food has been furnished to the Federal prisoners, made a report, accompanied by a mass of evidence, going to prove, conclusively, that the allegation was entirely without foundation. The report was tabled, and ordered to be printed.

Thanks to Gen. E. Kirby Smith.—On Monday, February 15, Mr. Johnson of Arkansas offered resolutions of thanks to Gen. E. Kirby Smith and his officers and men for the signal victory achieved by them at the battle of Richmond, Ky., for that highest order of generalship, with which this victory was followed up, utterly annihilating with five thousand men an army of ten thousand, of whom full five thousand were actually captured, besides the slain in battle, and for the brilliant campaign in which the speed, vigour, and constancy of a rapid advance resulted in the planting the Confederate flag upon the capital of Kentucky and upon the shores of the Ohio River, in front of the great city of Cincinnati.

The Destruction of Confederate States Treasury Notes.—House joint resolution for the relief of Maj. Wm. F. Hines, Quartermaster, who, by order of Gen. Bowen, burnt $94,000 in Confederate States Treasury notes in the streets of Vicksburg, to prevent its falling in the hands of the Yankees, was taken up and passed.

NEUTRALITY.

(From the Church and State Review.)

We do not propose to argue the question of intervention or non-intervention in American affairs. For ourselves, we believe that a firm and friendly mediation would have been better for all parties concerned. For the Southern white, whom it would have saved from a costly and fearful war; for the negro, in the amelioration of whose condition it would have given us the right and the influence of a proved friend to interpose; for the North, from which it would have averted, at least for a time, the fearful revolution now so rapidly hurrying on; for ourselves, more than all, to whom instead of famine in Lancashire and disaffection in Ireland, instead of the contemptuous indifference of the South, and the still more contemptuous hatred of the North, it would have given peace and plenty at home, and abroad the reluctant respect of one belligerent and the cordial, grateful friendship of the other. This has been our belief from the first; the experience of three years of an opposite policy has strongly confirmed it. Our rulers, however, have thought otherwise, and our present concern is not with the wisdom of their policy, but with the manner in which it has been carried out. Accepting the decision that in this quarrel—affecting ourselves as no quarrel, not absolutely our own, ever did or ever can again—it was our duty, or at the least our interest, to be neutral, we simply ask of what kind has our neutrality been?

To recognise the political existence of the Confederate States would have been, as is admitted on all hands, to put a stop to the war. In direct opposition to our action in every similar case, this recognition is refused. To treat the States as still a portion of the old Union would have been to secure their ports against blockade. We acknowledge them as belligerents. To grant them full belligerent privileges would be to lessen the effects of the blockade to which that acknowledgment has subjected them. We qualify our acknowledgment to precisely the extent most fatal to them, and most favourable to their foe.

Accepting unreservedly the abandonment by the South of their solitary weapon, the issuing of letters of marque, we make a merit with the North of disregarding the solemn promise given in return, and enforcing the obligation of a paper blockade. The export of tons of arms and whole batteries of artillery; the enlistment of men by thousands and tens of thousands for the Federal army, goes on almost openly under the very eyes of our authorities; and the only notice taken is the granting, at public expense, of a huge subsidy to a new packet line, whose sole traffic is the carrying of Federal recruits. The spies of the Federal minister suspect that certain vessels may possibly be ultimately intended for Confederate service, and without a tittle of evidence these vessels are promptly seized by an armed force and confiscated for months until their 'innocence' can be proved. A Yankee merchantman captured on the high seas, condemned as a prize and commissioned by the Confederate authorities as a man-of-war, claims the slender hospitality of a distant colonial port, and orders are sent express across the two Atlantics for her instant seizure and 'restitution.' A Confederate merchantman is driven by a Yankee gunboat on our own shores, and fired there by shells that fall but half spent among the houses of our own people, and our Government repudiates with lofty indignation any claim for compensation or redress. We need not multiply cases; they are but too numerous and too well known. But in each and in all the principle by which our conduct is guided is the same. No severity can be too stringent as against the weaker belligerent; towards the stronger no subservience too complete.

At the present moment three cases have arisen if possible more grave and critical, more wounding to our honour and more dangerous to our peace, than any that have yet occurred. A British subject has been deliberately murdered by a Federal officer on the deck of his own ship. The recruiting agents of the Federal army, the leaders of a band of conspirators avowedly leagued for a war of extermination against ourselves, have appeared in Federal uniform at the head of a riot in the Irish capital. Significantly supported by these signs of friendship comes the demand of indemnification for Confederate reprisals upon Federal commerce. What will our 'warm' neutrality reply to pressure such as this?

> Fair Sir, you spit on me on Wednesday last;
> You spurned me such a day; another time
> You called me dog; and for these courtesies
> I'll pay you thus much monies?

THE SPIRIT OF THE SOUTH.

Mr. Cobb, Ex-United States Secretary of the Treasury, delivered a speech in Atlanta, which concludes as follows:—

'Your fate is in your own hands. Are you looking forward with a hope which has no resting-place in your conviction, and is only flitting through your minds, that perhaps after all some foreign interference will come to our rescue to save and preserve us from the enemy? Banish it from your minds; it is a wild and visionary dream; it is a fatal delusion. The sympathy of the world is against you. If you are cowards you will falter and faint when the fact is announced to you; if you are brave men, it will arouse in your hearts the spirit of true manhood, which you have inherited from your revolutionary fathers and mothers, and make you truer than ever to your country and her cause.

'Do you look forward with some hope to what has been termed the Conservative element of the North, and expect to be preserved and protected by it from Lincoln's power and dominion? Banish the fatal delusion. Conservatism at the North lies prostrate in the dust. In their mad efforts to take away our liberties they have lost their own. They are as powerless to aid you as they are to protect themselves. You must either submit to Lincoln and Abolitionism, or by your own unaided arm, with the blessing of a kind Providence, win your liberty and your independence. Think not that there is a power at the North to restore to you the Constitution and the Union as they were, even were you prepared to accept it. You must either be freemen, or you must submit to Lincoln, and he has given you his terms.

'I put the picture before you. Do you stagger before it, or does it arouse within you anew the spirit of resistance—the spirit of freemen, worthy of the ancestry from which we sprang? Look at these things; consider well of them, and let us, with hearts purged and purified with afflictions, appeal to Him who alone can give victory and success to our arms.'

'Forward, my hearers, with our shields locked and our trust in God, is our only movement now. It is too late even to go backwards. We might have gone backwards a year ago, when our armies were victoriously thundering at the gates of Washington, and were keeping at successful bay the Hessians of the West, had we been content to bear humiliation for ourselves and degradation for our children. But even that is no longer left us. It is now victory or unconditional submission—submission not to the Conservative and Christian people of the North, but to a party of infidel fanatics, with an army of needy and greedy soldiers at their backs. Who shall be able to restrain them in their hour of victory? When that moment approaches—when the danger shall seem to be over and the spoils are ready to be divided—every outlaw will rush to fill the ranks, every adventurer will rush to swell their legions, and they will sweep down upon the South as the hosts of Attila did upon the fertile fields of Italy. And shall you find in defeat that mercy which you did not find in victory? You may slumber now, but you will wake to a fearful reality. You may lie upon your beds of ease, and dream that, when it is all over, you will be welcomed back to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens, but how terrible will be your disappointment! You will have an ignoble home, overrun by hordes of insolent slaves and rapacious soldiers. You will wear the badge of a conquered race—Pariahs among your fellow-creatures, yourselves degraded, your delicate wives and gentle children thrust down to menial service, insulted, perhaps dishonoured. Think you that these victorious hordes, made up in the large part of the sweepings of Europe, will leave you anything? As well might the lamb expect mercy from the wolf. Power which is checked and fettered by a doubtful contest is very different from a power victorious, triumphant, and irresponsible. The friends whom you have known and loved at the North, who have sympathised with you in your trials, and to whom you might have looked for comfort and protection, will have enough to do then to take care of themselves. The surges that sweep over us will carry them away in its refluent tide.'

We hear from Nassau that Major-General Preston and Captain Walker Fearn, both of the Confederate army, had arrived at that port, en route, as it is said, for Mexico, on a diplomatic mission, and had been received with much distinction by the civil and military authorities of the island. General Preston was at the outbreak of the war United States Minister to Spain; and Captain Fearn has also considerable diplomatic experience, both before and since the disruption of the Union.

'The Autographic Mirror.'—This new candidate for public favour is, we think, likely to meet with success, because it fills an hitherto vacant place, and is a well-arranged and admirably executed work. Its object is to present its readers with fac-similes of the autographs of celebrities of all countries and of all times. Besides gratifying the very natural curiosity to see something of the handy-work of illustrious personages, a publication like The Autographic Mirror can hardly fail to bring to light some interesting, historical, and literary documents. Many persons have in their possession valuable autographs, which they will be glad to place at the disposal of the editor of the Mirror. We would suggest that the practice of giving English translations of French manuscripts is not desirable. When the writing is too illegible to be read by any one except an expert, it would be better to give a printed transcript of it in the margin, for we may fairly assume that the subscribers to The Mirror are sufficiently au fait with the French language to translate for themselves. It must not be inferred from this remark that The Mirror is a dear publication, for, considering the quantity of matter given, and the necessary cost in producing it, we think sixpence a number a very low price.

The Imports of Cotton.—The Board of Trade tables, just published, credit the Confederate States with only that cotton which has been imported direct from their ports, and place to the account of 'other countries' the shipments of Southern produce received into the United Kingdom vid Mexico, Bermuda, the Bahamas, and Cuba. The figures thus furnished for the year 1863 are 57,090 cwts., whereas they would, if stated correctly and in accordance with the facts, read nearly ten times that quantity—namely 540,000 cwts. The arrivals of Southern cotton at Philadelphia, New York, and Boston, in a great measure through the same intermediate channels for the past twelve months, were about equal to those that reached Europe. The total exportations of cotton from the Confederate States to all places in 1863, were not much short of 300,000 bales, and weighed about 1,300,000 cwts, or just one-third the quantity reported by the Government returns as received from the British East Indies—3,878,757 cwts. When, however, an allowance is made for the additional loss in spinning Surat cotton, with a reduction for the portion that is worthless for manufacturing purposes, it will be found that the quantity of American cotton was, by reason of its superior quality, equivalent to nearly one-half that of Indian. (From Mr. George M'Henry's pamphlet on 'The Cotton Question.')

The Anti-Fenian Movement.—The truly Irish demonstration of Irish brotherhood at the Dublin Rotunda has been followed by another, and less lawless, indication of the discord which prevails in the 'National' party. In the course of last week two broadsheets, of which copies are in our possession, were posted on the gates and doors of Roman Catholic churches in Dublin. It must be presumed that this liberty was not taken without the sanction of the Roman Catholic Archbishop, and the character of the documents themselves is sufficiently remarkable to deserve attention for its own sake. Both are signed 'Sacerdos;' one is headed 'Letters of his Holiness Pius IX. on the American War,' and the other 'Letters of John Mitchell, William Smith O'Brien, John Martin, and "Sacerdos" on the American War.' Their object is decidedly anti-Fenian—to discourage Federal enlistment in Ireland, and it is but justice to their compiler to say that they contain passages of which the good sense and logical force are perfectly startling. No statement that we have yet read on the causes and consequences of the emigration from Ireland to the United States is more thoughtful and rational than the letter of Mr. Smith O'Brien. No attack from the pen of Confederate journalists upon the Yankee Government and people is more bitter and incisive than the sallies of Mr. John Mitchell. If the Fenians have any writer capable of repelling these assaults by other than physical means, their literary resources must be greater than we have any reason to believe.—Times.

Are States Nations?—It is ominous of great evil that we read now-a-days, in all the journals which are in the service, from principle or from pay, of the reigning Administration, disparaging and contemptuous allusions to the term 'State,' as if a 'State,' as it figures in American politics, were something a little more perhaps than a county, but much less than a sovereign nation. It offends the ear of these sensitive critics to hear it asserted that when the thirteen colonies declared their independence, they erected themselves into so many nations which they called 'States,' each possessing the plenary sovereign character and attributes. Now the fact is that State and nation are convertible terms. A State is a nation. A nation is a State; and we every day, and in the most formal political documents, see these terms used indifferently, as quite synonymous. Nation does not always imply the possession of sovereign character by the community to which the term is applied. Then we hear of the Irish nation, the Scotch nation, the English nation, though the individual sovereignty of Ireland, Scotland, and England is absorbed and lost in that of 'The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.' The term State, as used in American politics, no less than nation, implies the highest condition of political being, and is consistent with the highest sovereign attributes. Witness the language of our own Declaration of Independence, the best authority that can be adduced for the purposes of this article. That instrument declares that the thirteen colonies 'are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as free and independent States they have full power to levy war, conclude peace, contract alliances, establish commerce, and do all other acts and things that independent States may of right do.' Is it not clear? What more can be necessary to rescue the term State from the puerile criticism by which it is so often attacked?—New York News.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a re-ponsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26*s.* per annum; post-paid, 30*s.*: payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. HOPKINS, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. HUTTON, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.
At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq. Manchester Southern Club Office, Market Street.
At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER & MULLER, 52 Rue du Château d'Eu, Paris.
At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4 Borgo Nuovo.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 10, 1864.

The Attack upon Mobile.

THE real object of the complicated movements of the Federal armies in the South-west is at length disclosed. It is nothing more or less than the capture of Mobile, and the establishment of a new basis of operations in the heart of the Western States. For this SHERMAN's column has made its bold and rapid advance through Mississippi, while FARRAGUT's flotilla, and, it is said, a portion of BANKS's forces, occupy the attention of the Confederate garrison. General SHERMAN left Vicksburg about the 4th ult. with an army estimated at from 25,000 to 40,000 men, principally infantry, carrying but a few days' rations with them, and relying mainly on the districts through which they had to march for subsistence. As he swept along he tore up the railroads, and destroyed all the bridges in his rear, thus plainly indicating the intention of opening up for himself a new base on the Gulf, and of establishing communications with some cooperating force, naval or military, on the coast of Alabama. His progress does not appear to have been opposed, the Confederates prudently retiring before him, with their guerillas hovering on his rear and both flanks, cutting off stragglers, and capturing here and there a gun or a few wagons. With the exception of a slight skirmish at Jackson, and a repulse at Clinton, he seems to have had no fighting. The victory claimed at Bandon turns out to be an utterly unfounded rumour, and the last authentic intelligence we have of his progress is the announcement of the evacuation of Meridian by the Confederates, the result probably of a southward movement which left this station in the rear. That any considerable portion of his force had reached Quitman, on the Mobile and Ohio railroad, about 100 miles from Mobile, is officially denied. Some miles of the rail had been destroyed by a small Federal cavalry force, which immediately retired. But it is not probable that, in the ten days which had elapsed from the start from Vicksburg, SHERMAN's column had accomplished more than 100 miles, considering the difficulties of the route, the wants of the army, and the attacks of the Confederate guerillas. Time, however, was of the utmost importance to the Federals. It is a vital necessity to SHERMAN's army that it should reach the coast, or, at any rate, open communications with FARRAGUT without delay. A march of 300 miles through an enemy's country, at the rate of 20 miles a day, will leave his forces for a time quite unfit for an assault upon a fortified town. They will need rest, support, and supplies; and unless FARRAGUT is in a position to cooperate with them, as they approach Mobile, they will be in extreme peril. A direct advance from Quitman along the railroad would bring SHERMAN upon the rearward defences of Mobile. These consist of three lines of strong earthworks, the outer line distant about five miles from the city. He must carry these lines before he can enter Mobile. But it is not likely he will have all the fighting to do. The next mail may bring us the intelligence that FARRAGUT has renewed the attack, or that BANKS has succeeded in landing a force at Mississippi City. By the last accounts FARRAGUT had failed in one attempt to force Grant's Pass, a narrow and shallow passage from Mississippi Sound into Mobile Bay, but was preparing to renew it as soon as the weather was more favourable. But it is doubtful whether he has a sufficient number of vessels of light draught, even if he should effect the passage, to force his way up to the town; and he will yet, in all probability, be compelled to run the gauntlet of the guns of Fort James and Fort Morgan. All depends, however, upon FARRAGUT's progress. If he should succeed in passing the sea defences of Mobile, SHERMAN will be safe. The garrison will be between two fires, and the assault on the lines will be a much easier matter. If FARRAGUT fails, SHERMAN, short of supplies and ammunition, will be reduced to the alternative of an assault in which failure would be destruction, or a retrograde movement somewhat equivalent to M'CLELLAN's famous change of base from the Chickahominy to the James River for strategic reasons. We are not aware of the strength of the Confederate garrison of Mobile. It is not the habit with the South to disclose its tactics or display its numbers. But we have good reason to believe that it is fully able to hold the town against the forces which now threaten it. Altogether, we think SHERMAN's march has lost much of its terrors now that its object is revealed. The Federal press is very exultant about its boldness and rapidity, but a successful result alone can justify it. A mere change of base, a flying raid through Mississippi, will have accomplished nothing. If SHERMAN could march 300 miles in three weeks, we may rely upon it General POLK's forces in Alabama will not be very far from Mobile by the time he reaches the lines of defence. Their presence would postpone the capture at least for months, and in the meantime SHERMAN's energies will be sufficiently taxed in provisioning his army and holding his ground.

At other points the Confederates are displaying an activity which must, within a few weeks, bring about important collisions and decisive results. LONGSTREET, who a week ago was reported to be in full retreat southward, as if to effect a junction with JOHNSON's army, has reappeared in great strength within a few miles of Knoxville, heavily reinforced by General BUCKNER. The Federal communications between Cumberland Gap and Knoxville have been cut off, and there is every indication that the long-threatened attack upon the capital of Eastern Tennessee will not be much longer deferred. At the same time, JOHNSON's army is said to be in motion, and the Tennessee river is blockaded, so that the supplies on which the Federal garrison at Chattanooga depend are with difficulty got up. MORGAN, the renowned guerilla leader, has reorganised his force, and has crossed to Tennessee. Everything portends the renewal of the struggle for the possession of the hilly country of the State of Tennessee and a desperate effort on the part of the South to execute the programme laid down by President DAVIS last autumn, and drive the army of the Cumberland beyond the Ohio. The Virginian Generals, LEE and MEADE, are busily organising soldiers for the spring campaigns. But the growing boldness of the Confederate army sadly harasses the Federal army. Not a day passes without its long list of casualties and losses of matériel—the captures amounting sometimes to more than 100 men and officers. MOSLEY, who is decidedly one of the most dashing cavaliers in Virginia, keeps every Federal outpost, and even whole camps, in perpetual alarm; and although it may be admitted that these guerilla services will not be decisive of the issue of the war, nothing could more signally illustrate the hopelessness of the task in which the Federals are engaged than this presence and activity of a large Confederate cavalry force virtually within their lines. At Washington it is expected that LEE will take the initiative, and that another great battle will be fought on the historic ground of Bull's Run. Curiously enough, the reason assigned is the despondency of LEE's army. We can undeceive the people of Washington, and assure them that LEE's men were never in better fighting trim or in higher spirits; and that when a forward movement does take place, it will be made with a confidence justified and heightened by three years of victories undisgraced by a single defeat.

Parliament.

THE Ministry certainly does not gain in power or popularity as the session advances. A sad change—a change in some respects to be regretted for other than party reasons—has come over the Liberals since their fortunes culminated in 1853. In that year they held an ascendency in Parliament such as no Government had held since the days of PITT. They had a preponderance of administrative talent, and an unquestioned supremacy in debate. On the front bench, to Mr. Speaker's right, sat nearly all the ablest men in the country. Mr. DISRAELI was the sole reliance of the Opposition. The Government had the benefit of the administrative and Parliamentary ability of Sir JAMES GRAHAM, whose genius was allowed to atone for a character which was damaged and blackened by more than one very questionable transaction. By him sat SIDNEY HERBERT, a man of no common powers, but owing his influence less to his acknowledged abilities than to the respect and love inspired by one of the purest and noblest spirits that ever mingled in political strife. Lord JOHN lent them the aid of his Parliamentary experience and his indomitable pluck; for Lord JOHN was as brave in Parliament as Lord RUSSELL is timid at the Foreign Office. Lord PALMERSTON was there, with his thorough knowledge of the temper of Parliament, and his perfect sympathy with the feelings of the country, one of the poorest speakers yet most formidable debaters that ever led a party. Mr. GLADSTONE added to the authority of the Coalition the force of his brilliant oratory and the weight of his thorough mastery of finance; and they were presently strengthened by the accession of Sir GEORGE CORNEWALL LEWIS, the profoundest statesman and most impartial politician of his time. Since that time the Liberals have been constantly losing strength, and the Conservatives have constantly gained it. The substitution of Sir R. PALMER for Sir R. BETHELL is a very doubtful advantage; the former is a better man and probably a better lawyer, but he is less versatile, and consequently less effective in general debate. Sir JAMES GRAHAM has gone to his account. The country has lost the invaluable services of SIDNEY HERBERT and CORNEWALL LEWIS. Lord JOHN has been advisedly removed—as was aptly observed by the official jester to the House, Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE—to another and a happier place. Their places have not been filled, and the defence of the Government rests solely upon Lord PALMERSTON and Mr. GLADSTONE. The latter does not speak frequently except on financial questions; the former, though he is probably the ablest and halest of octogenarians, is becoming more and more evidently unequal to the heavy burden which devolves on him. Mr. DISRAELI now enjoys the support of such allies as Lord STANLEY, Lord ROBERT CECIL, Mr. FITZGERALD, Mr. WALPOLE, and, above all, Sir HUGH CAIRNS. It is not wonderful, therefore, that—as Lord R. CECIL the other day remarked—the Opposition has the lion's share of the debates, or that the debates generally damage the Government. As uninterested observers, we cannot but discern the possibility of a shipwreck at no distant date; nor do we suppose that such an event can be postponed for many weeks after Lord PALMERSTON shall be forced to confess that his present task is too heavy for his strength.

Thursday night witnessed a conflict which certainly shook the Government not a little. The Yeomanry Cavalry is not a popular force with the Radicals. It has been used to put down those disloyal outbreaks with which Americanised Englishmen, like Mr. BRIGHT or Mr. FORSTER, feel a great and natural sympathy; and it could be depended upon as surely as the line to crush any Fenian outrages at Liverpool, or prevent any such seditions as that of Bristol in 1831, or of Birmingham in 1842. Its value, moreover, is generally underrated by the borough members and their constituents, who know nothing about it. On the other hand, it is highly popular with the farmers and the country gentlemen; it is an institution standing midway between the militia and the Volunteers, and a necessary supplement to both; and any proposal to disband it might overthrow a Government. The measure actually proposed by the Ministry is hardly intelligible. They asked for the usual vote of 41,000*l.* for its permanent staff, but refused the 46,000*l.* necessary to call it out for its usual period of annual training. This was taken up angrily by some of the Colonels of Yeomanry who have seats in the House. Colonel EDWARDS made a very sharp onslaught upon the Government, showing that it was simply absurd to vote money for the Yeomanry at all, unless they were to be called out yearly for duty. He was supported by General PEEL, late Minister for War. Lord PALMERSTON attempted a reply, and was reminded by Sir W. MILES of language held by him in 1853, diametrically opposite to that which he was holding now. The House divided; and the Government had a majority of one. They might almost as well have been beaten; especially as they were saved by the votes of two deserters from the Opposition.

What followed hurt them less. The attack might have been a very formidable one, but it fell into injudicious hands. There is no manner of doubt that the Liberals have been guilty of certain manœuvres in regard to Dockyard patronage precisely akin to those for which Mr. STAFFORD was hunted to death in 1853. It is equally certain that Admiral Sir BALDWIN WALKER—the same who seized the Tuscaloosa—was sent out of the country merely in order that he might not be compelled to confess the manner in which these manœuvres were carried out; for he was appointed while a commission was actually waiting for his evidence on that subject, and he hurried to sea in such haste as sufficiently proved his fear of being detained by that Parliamentary enquiry, which, in fact, was made but a day too late. The whole proceeding was one of the most impudent political stratagems ever perpetrated by the head of a great department of State; and there would have been good grounds for moving an address to Her Majesty to dismiss the Duke of Somerset from her councils. Nor would the leniency generally extended to political misdemeanants be here in place; for the Duke of Somerset was the chief agent in the malicious and vindictive persecution of Mr. Stafford. Well handled, the subject might have afforded the means of a very damaging attack on one of the most unpopular members of the Administration. But Mr. Ferrand, who as member for Devonport took the matter in hand, is notorious for his want of temper and self-control. He treated the question from an electioneering point of view; he made it a personal quarrel between himself and Sir Baldwin Walker; and he very foolishly dragged in the name of another officer, who had been guilty of nothing worse than a trivial indiscretion. Under these circumstances, the feeling of the House went with the absent party to the quarrel. Lord Clarence Paget aptly took advantage of this, and was aided by Sir A. Buller and Mr. Bernal Osborne; and that which might have been a discussion of great importance, clearing the character of Mr. Stafford, and bringing to deserved infamy two of the worst and most unscrupulous of political jobbers in the Naval Department, degenerated into a violent personal squabble, disgraceful not only to the actors in it, but to the House of Commons. The general result was favourable to the Ministry. Mr. Ferrand may thank his own intemperate folly for the loss of an excellent opportunity of rendering justice to the memory of a cruelly injured friend, and taking condign vengeance on his assassins.

The debate of Friday was a transparent manœuvre. Mr. Lefevre was put forward, as a friend and partisan of the Ministry, to counteract by a violent attack on the Confederates the effect of the recent discussions in which charges of gross partiality towards the North have been made and proved against Lord Russell. The only defence ever set up by the Ministers to which any attention has been vouchsafed has been this: 'We are accused, on the one hand, of straining the law, municipal and international, against the South. On the other hand, we are accused by the North of rendering to the South services altogether inconsistent with neutrality. The presumption, therefore, is that we have been honestly neutral.' It has been felt, however, that this presumption was too feeble to bear the weight of their defence. It has been apparent that, even if the facts alleged by the North were admitted, its charges would be wholly untenable—that there is not even a shadow of foundation for any complaint of unfriendly conduct towards the North; whereas even those who defend the Administration most warmly speak rather apologetically than confidently when taunted with its violations of neutrality at the expense of the South. Under these circumstances, a Ministerialist, not known as a violent Northern partisan, comes forward to accuse the Government of over-forbearance towards the Confederacy. This is exactly what they want, as an excuse for the violence and injustice of which they are conscious, and they meet the attack with a gratitude which they cannot conceal. The real character of the manœuvre was sufficiently explained by the commission of the duty of reply to the Solicitor-General. That gentleman is one of the least important and least respected members of the Government. He was lately counsel to the Admiralty; and while he held that office he gave advice to Mr. Adams in furtherance of his suit against the Government in the matter of the Alabama. To put him forward to answer an attack on the Confederate Government—to desire the legal adviser of Mr. Adams to vindicate the rightfulness of our dealings with the Alabama and her consorts, is sufficient evidence of a foregone determination that the reply shall only be a sham one, the defence wholly insincere. The announcement made by the Solicitor-General, that the Confederate Government is to be called to account for having purchased ships of British builders, was one which neither an honest lawyer nor a respectable statesman would have cared to make; and, therefore, it was properly intrusted to one who owes his professional position entirely to the scarcity of lawyers in the ranks of his party. As it was admitted, or rather contended, by the Attorney-General, in the case of the Alexandra, that the Foreign Enlistment Act had no relation to international law, and as there is no question whatever of the right of neutrals to sell and of belligerents to purchase ships, as a matter of international right, we shall be curious to see the correspondence on this subject between Lord Russell and Mr. Benjamin. In the meantime we take note of one act of humiliation and self-abasement on the part of the British Government; one more case—the worst, and let us hope the last—in which the obligations of neutrality and the honour of England have alike been trampled under foot by a British Minister in his eager servility towards the United States.

Lord R. Cecil has given notice of his intention after Easter to press a motion of which the importance can hardly be overrated. It is confessed by the Administration that they acted illegally in detaining the vessels built by Messrs. Laird until those gentlemen should give a satisfactory account of their destination; but it is urged that they did this 'on their own responsibility,' transgressing the law at their own risk for the public good, and trusting to escape from punishment by making it clear that they acted on good and sufficient grounds. This doctrine of responsibility has, as Sir Hugh Cairns observed, been made in past times to cover the worst excesses of tyranny, and is dangerous in the extreme to the security of the Constitution and the liberty of the subject. It is not likely that it will again be employed to cover outrages on individuals so gross as have been formerly committed; but, on the other hand, if once suffered by Parliament to prevail, it is likely to be much more freely and recklessly used now than in former days. For in those days Ministerial responsibility had a very serious meaning; it meant sometimes impeachment—always the peril of political ruin and permanent disgrace, if Parliament should condemn the conduct of the Executive. Now it means nothing more than the liability to be dismissed from office, which attends just as much on political errors, or on mere unpopularity, as on the gravest derelictions of duty. It is not to be tolerated that a Minister should deliberately violate the law—should lay an embargo on an important branch of trade—should seize the property of British subjects—should inflict upon them all the oppression, injury, vexation, and expense involved in a lawsuit that may last for years, and be carried from court to court—and, having done all this, should turn round and say, 'Well, I did it at my peril; if you disapprove of it, pass a vote of censure.' Is a vote of censure an adequate penalty for such an offence? Is it adequate either as deterrent or as retribution? You cannot practically punish a Minister for political crimes. Impeachment is a dead letter; criminal prosecution is impossible; costs are paid, not by the guilty party, but by the boundless purse of the nation. You have therefore no check on official misdeeds, no power of restraining the abuse of Executive authority, but by timely prevention. This check it is the constitutional duty of Parliament to apply. It is the duty of the House of Commons to declare that a penal statute shall not be strained for political purposes at the pleasure of the Executive advisers of the Crown; and the neglect of that duty would be more dangerous, and the license thereby given to abuses of power would be more disastrous, than any consequences which could possibly flow from violations of the Foreign Enlistment Act. We heartily hope that the guardians of national liberty will not be led astray from the performance of their proper functions by any considerations of policy or partiality; and that a peremptory veto will be placed upon proceedings which, if they were suffered to pass with impunity, might well be made a precedent for the most fatal invasions of the privileges which eight centuries of constitutional struggles have extorted and confirmed.

The Fear of a European War.

The glass has gone down again. The hopes which the premature announcement that Austria and Prussia had agreed to a conference, and the practical suspension of hostilities for some days, had disposed, have given place to fears of a general war. The pessimists are again in possession of public opinion, with even less right to it than the optimists had. It was absurd, no doubt, to assume that the Dano-German dispute was in a fair way of settlement because Austria and Prussia declared that they had no objection to take part in a conference whilst carrying on the war with all their might; it is still more absurd to assume, from the failure of that idle project to obtain the concurrence of other Powers, that Europe is on the verge of a general war. There is reason enough, no doubt, in the present state of Europe, for apprehension and alarm. The fact that a war is waging in which one of the parties enjoys all the sympathies, and has the strongest claim to the assistance, of France and England, may well justify an apprehension that Europe will find itself arrayed in hostile camps. But the danger is no greater now than it has been at any time since the Germans crossed the Eider; on the contrary, all the signs of these latter days point to the preservation of peace for the present.

There are two States ready and anxious to fight, but neither will venture to draw a sword without the encouragement of one of the non-German great Powers, and that encouragement no great Power is at present disposed to give. Sweden would send her army and her navy to the assistance of the Danes, if either England or France would promise to stand by her. Italy would attack Venetia if France would allow her. The English Government was willing—indeed, anxious—to concert with France, Russia, and Sweden, measures for defending the integrity of Denmark. It believed, and with good reason, that such a quadruple alliance would restrain Germany without any recourse to arms. But France and Russia have both refused that concert, partly because they do not believe that they are sufficiently interested in the integrity of Denmark and the prosperity of a dynasty closely connected with England to quarrel with Germany, and partly and mainly because they place no reliance upon the promises of the English Government. They believe that, after committing them to threats against Germany, it would find some pretext for sneaking out of its engagements, and leave them the burden of defending English interests. By itself the English Government, unless forced by some expression of popular feeling which it would be dangerous to disregard, will render no material aid to Denmark. Its will may be good, but only under some such pressure would it essay to overcome the repugnance which exists in the highest quarter to war against Germany. Nor, indeed, could it at present find any good reason to draw the sword. It has allowed Germany to invade Slesvig with a view of taking possession of that Duchy as a material guarantee for the fulfilment of Danish engagements, contenting itself with a pledge that the Treaty of London is to be maintained. Until Austria and Prussia avow their intention to set that Treaty aside, it can hardly, having acquiesced in the invasion, interfere by force of arms. The invasion of Jutland cannot be taken as a casus belli. The Germans cannot be expected to confine the war to Slesvig if the Danes carry it on in every part of the sea or land where they can strike a blow with advantage. To sit down before a formidable position like Düppel, and allow the Danes to use Fredericia and the whole of Jutland for the maintenance of that position, and to proceed to the destruction of German commerce, would be an act so suicidal that no sensible man could ask the allies to commit it. Denmark and Germany are at war—have been so from the moment the invaders crossed the Eider—and so long as the war lasts they will strike each other wherever they can. It would be absurd for England, after having assented to the war, to attempt to limit it, and tell the Germans they must fight with one hand tied behind them, or she will interfere on behalf of Denmark. The policy of the English Government will be to wait until Austria and Prussia proceed to deal with their conquest. If then they propose to break the engagement they made on crossing the Eider, it will be for England to interfere, by force of arms if necessary, to compel its fulfilment. Some time will elapse before that juncture arrives; and even then, if the present Government is in power, it will probably submit to any spoliation of Denmark, and any insult to England, rather than fight.

France is equally disposed to maintain peace. It is clear, from the papers recently published, that the Emperor will not go to war with Germany unless the honour and interests of France imperatively demand it. At present he does not consider that France has any imperative call to interfere. France, which boasts of having destroyed the Treaties of 1815, will not come forward as the vindicator at any cost of the Treaty of 1852, which the Emperor is of opinion in some degree violated the principle of nationalities. What she may eventually do if the German Powers propose to sever both Duchies from Denmark is another question; but it is certain that even then the Emperor would enter upon war with great reluctance. The war in Italy was a very different matter. There he had a people at his back, a great national feeling to sustain him. There were great dynastic and national interests to be advanced. The prowess of the French soldiers received a new seal; its achievements reflected a new lustre upon the second Empire. France obtained a direct territorial advantage. The possession of Savoy and Nice, valuable in itself, pushed forward French frontiers so as to command Italy. Although without any possessions in Italy, France is again triumphant in the long struggle with Germany for influence in that country. Italy is practically a satrapy of France, and the Mediterranean a French lake. A war with Germany would be quite another thing. The dangers and difficulties would be much greater, the gain in any case much smaller. All that France could gain by such a struggle would be the Rhine Provinces, and their retention would be harder than their conquest, as Germany would ever be seeking to recover them. Moreover, in such a war the Emperor could never be secure that he might not have to face a coalition of the whole of Europe. He could place no reliance upon the alliance or even the neutrality of England. England, he knows, however angry she may now be with Germany, would look with alarm upon an extension of the French frontier, and, if she did not directly oppose it, would do so indirectly. The Emperor may resolve to save Denmark, but he certainly will not interfere upon her behalf unless the demands of the German Powers are so outrageous that acquiescence becomes impossible; and those Powers will hardly risk that danger.

The story of an alliance between Austria, Russia, and Prussia, which has excited in some quarters so much alarm, is not worthy of credit. Did, however, the alliance exist, it would furnish no ground for apprehending a general war. Such an alliance could only be a defensive one. Putting all their forces together, the three Powers could undertake no aggressive designs, and it is idle to talk of a great coalition between the Western Powers and the revolution against them. Assuredly England, which would not fight on behalf of Denmark, where her honour and interests called upon her to fight, will take no part in a revolutionary war against Austria, Prussia, and Russia. As little likely is the Emperor of the French to approve of such a crusade. But the Holy Alliance is a canard, resting on no better foundation than some approximation between the hitherto estranged Courts of St. Petersburg and Vienna. It is not improbable that the three Powers may have agreed upon common action against the Polish insurrection. Such an agreement was inevitable from its outbreak. The interests of all three are practically the same. Each must be anxious to destroy the Polish national sentiment; when insurrection is blazing in the territories of the one, the possessions of the other two are in danger. Austria did, indeed, try to throw upon Russia the whole burden of extinguishing the present movement, she gained political capital, and, as her co-partitioners were determined to suppress it, risked nothing. But now Austria, by her conduct towards Denmark, has lost all the sympathy of Europe, and has nothing to gain by liberal professions. What little credit she might still get is dearly purchased by the insecurity in which the manœuvres of the insurrectionary Government keep Galicia. She has therefore proclaimed the state of siege, and the next spring will probably witness a combined and vigorous movement for the extirpation of the insurrection. Western Europe will not interfere with it. The understanding certainly does not at present go beyond this agreement to cooperate in a matter of common interest. It may be extended to other subjects; in any case it cannot be regarded as threatening the peace of Europe. Its action will not be aggressive, because the allies would have nothing to gain and everything to lose by aggression. As to a regular alliance, that is out of the question. Austria and Prussia dare not venture upon it. It would render them so unpopular with their own people and country, so weak against invasion or insurrection, that the thrones of King and Emperor would not be worth a year's purchase. The enthusiasm of the Germans on behalf of Slesvig and Holstein is due in very large part to the belief that in getting rid of the London Treaty they throw off a shameful check imposed upon them by Russia; and unless the whole of the national strength effervesces in the present agitation, Austria and Prussia, which feared revolution if they set themselves against the Slesvig-Holstein mania would conjure up a more dangerous madness in renewing the Holy Alliance.

SLAVERY AND PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S PROCLAMATION.

By Hon. C. S. Morlhead, ex-Governor of Kentucky.

No. I.

A plain statement of facts in relation to slavery in the Southern States of America, in connection with the military proclamation of emancipation of President Lincoln, may tend to show how adroitly the true issues between the sections have been perverted by the North, and account in some degree for the gross misrepresentation on this subject which, with the best intentions, foreign public journals are liable to make.

Before, however, proceeding with this task, it may not be out of place to take a rapid glance at the condition of the negroes who have been brought under Federal rule.

The breath of the President's proclamation has swept like a deadly sirocco over a large portion of the once beautiful valley of the Mississippi, leaving in its track one unvarying scene of devastation and ruin. Let those who are fond of the recital of horrors far surpassing the creations of fancy read the accounts of Federal atrocities in this worse than Vandal warfare. But the wretched blacks, for whom, it is pretended, this desolation has been wrought—they, for whose liberty rivers of blood have been shed, and the hate of hell kindled in once fraternal breasts—where are they, and what has freedom done for them? General Grant answers from the banks of the Mississippi. From 'plantations stripped of everything, they have come in to us, utterly destitute, utterly ignorant. All the able-bodied among them are forced into the army as soldiers or camp servants.' The rest, 'a sable throng of women, children, and infirm persons,' are huddled along the river.

In one city, Memphis, during a space of three months, out of 4,000 there collected, 1,200 perished miserably from want and starvation. Swarming in worse than savage misery among the camps of the soldiery, an eye-witness says, 'Their presence moves all that is ribald and brutal in those camps to hatred and contempt, to outrage and abuse.' In the report of the Rev. William D. Butler, agent of the Christian commission sent to Vicksburg from the North, the most deplorable account is given of the sufferings of these poor creatures, upon whom the boon of freedom has been forced. A few extracts only can be given, but, to appreciate all the horrors he witnessed, the whole report should be read. He commences by his visit to the Missouri troops in General Sherman's corps, where, he says, 'I saw large numbers of these negroes grouped in camps and companies, in a most wretched and pitiable condition. Their only shelter was brush, pieces of old tents, quilts, and whatever else would afford them any protection. They lived upon such food as they could obtain in camps by working for soldiers, or in other ways gratifying them.' After the capitulation of Vicksburg and the departure of Pemberton's army on the 15th of July, 1863, he says: 'Thousands of these miserable creatures filled the vacant houses, churches, and caves. Here they crowded together, sometimes twenty or more in a single room, weary, weak and sick from their long march and abstinence, spiritless and sad, and many of them longing to be once more on old Massa's plantation.' On the 30th of July, 1863, he went out early to examine the premises. He says: 'The first object that attracted my attention in the rear of the church, was the tall skeleton of a negro man sitting on the ground, with his back to a post, and his head hanging down upon his breast, and his arms resting almost powerless at his side. He evidently was very sick. I raised his head a little, and asked what ailed him. "O Sir," he feebly exclaimed, "I have the di-re-a and the fever." "Have you no friends?" I asked. "Yes; my mother and sister live in that house there, and I have come out here to be cool."' He continues: 'I passed to the front, and on the stone door-sill I found another lying with a gourd filled with water at his side. As I looked at his dirty and wasted form, I thought his sufferings would be but short. I roused him a little, and he told me that he had no medicine, no bread, nothing to eat.' Further on, he says: 'I turned to enter the basement, and was met by a third negro, with swollen feet, trembling from weakness and want, asking for a little water. All these men told me that they had been servants of officers in the Union army, and, when taken sick, were driven away.' He visited one of the post hospitals, and he says: 'I went into the Baptist church, where a large number of negroes had taken quarters. I shall not attempt to describe the scene. I had before me as pitiable and suffering a group of humanity as was ever gathered together. We saw a poor negro who had crawled half up one of the terraces which surround the building, and was dying. The doctor remarked that he would die there, that he had crawled up there to get some medicine, and that they were frequently found dead in the shrubbery and fence corners.'

About the 1st of August, peremptory orders were issued to remove across the river 'all negroes of every age or sex, whether sick or well, who were not in some employment. About 3,000 were thus removed to the low grounds opposite Vicksburg, and there left in the woods without any shelter. . . The chaplain told me that these negroes had suffered, and were still suffering, untold want and wretchedness; that 400 had died since he took charge of them, that from 15 to 20 die daily; that sometimes they would crawl off into the woods and die, where their bodies would be found only by the stench which would arise from their decay; that rations were furnished them by the Government, but once they were five days without receiving any food, and they threatened to kill him, thinking the fault was his. He also stated that he had no tents, or shelter except brush, to shield them from the sun or storm or dews of night.' There were 2,000 at this point, 8,551 at Young's Point, on Papaw Island 2,400—in all over 16,000. 'All,' says he, 'were either sick or taking care of the sick. I saw nothing but one sad scene of misery.'

I am in possession of a letter from a gentleman of as high respectability and veracity as any in the State of Mississippi, in which he says: 'My negroes came to me and told me that they had no idea of leaving, although the Yankees had been to see them every day to persuade them to do so. The day after the Yankees left, I went out and found no living thing upon my place except one colt and numerous cats and dogs. Celia, a woman that you may have noticed about our house, had been sent to the plantation, and had a baby eight days old only when she was forced away. We have heard from them, and learn that they are very anxious to get back. Many have made their escape and returned, and give the most horrible and revolting accounts of their treatment and sufferings. I saw myself an extensive encampment in Madison parish in August last, and many women and children were lying dead, with no one to bury them. Many of the children were fly-blown, and had vermin in their mouths and eyes before they were dead. There is not a doubt but that the mortality, suffering, cruelty, and bad treatment of every sort towards these poor creatures, surpass anything in the annals of crime and suffering in modern times.'

In the emancipation proclamation, the President 'declares that all persons held as slaves in certain designated States, and parts of States, are, and hereafter shall be, free.' Are they free even in those localities where the proclamation has had full effect? On the contrary, I venture the assertion, susceptible as I know it to be of the fullest proof, that, so far as these wretched beings are concerned, a more hideous and cruel bondage has never existed on earth.

Plantations from which the white inhabitants have been driven at the point of the bayonet, are said, in official proclamations, to be 'abandoned.' They are now called 'Government plantations,' and are rented out to greedy Yankee adventurers. All the able-bodied negro men are forced into the army. The old men, women, and children, are taken to these rented plantations, and certainly General Phelps can no longer complain that they live 'in comparative idleness and ease.' They call them free. They say they are hired labourers. Yes, hired! when a string of glass beads, a yard of coarse calico of gaudy colours, or a pint of whisky, will pay for a day's work. The little pittance which, by contract, they are entitled to, amounts literally to nothing. The insatiate appetite for gain of the Yankee lessee makes him look alone to the profits which may be realised from his 'sharp bargain.' He feels, and certainly manifests, no interest whatever in the hapless condition of these dependent creatures, except to wring from their thews and sinews the greatest possible amount of labour. In a letter from a reliable source it is stated that they are fed 'on unwholesome rations, the refuse of the Federal camps, dealt out to the poor unfortunates, and for which they are liberally charged.' The same writer says: 'The women have become corrupt in body and mind, beyond anything witnessed in the worst purlieus of large cities. Numbers of them have died and are dying from diseases previously unknown to plantation life.' In the New York World of February 4, 1864, it is said that 'examinations have in many cases been made into the health and well-being of the negroes on what are called Government plantations;' 'and the report showed a most terrible mortality, equal to that of those awful middle passages of slave ships, from our infant recollection of whose rehearsal we recoil with so much horror.' The same paper gives a few instances from this report as specimens: 'On the old Hickory plantation 413 negroes were placed on the 3rd of June, of whom 214 had died by the 11th of September. Of 300 placed on White Castle plantation, only 42 were found living on the 16th of September. On the Andliers plantation only 178 were left out of 400, and a proportionate mortality was found on the Vintress, Magnolia, Richland, and Miles Taylor plantations.' With characteristic Yankee philanthropy, the editor calls to his aid the consoling philosophical reflection that 'perhaps it is ordained by an inscrutable Providence that this unfortunate race shall be driven by an overruling fatality to reap the inevitable consequences of inferiority of race in presence of a civilisation the advantages of which they cannot share, and under the vices of which they must succumb.' If this reflection be just, God save these poor creatures from Yankee civilisation!

It is useless to enlarge this detail of horrible barbarities. Such is Republican philanthropy for the black race; such is military emancipation of the slave! Who can doubt that such emancipation is extermination?

Confederate Official Documents.

SYNOPSIS OF REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF TAXES.

No argument could be so forcible in showing the compact organisation and the still unimpaired resources of the thirteen sovereign States which the powers of the earth persist in regarding as mere insurgents, as are the dry facts and figures contained in the papers laid before the Confederate Congress at its present session. The Report of the Secretary of the Treasury has already been published in extenso in this Journal (Jan. 21); but the documents accompanying this report are at least of equal importance, and permit us a more comprehensive insight into the internal economy of the Confederacy. First among these is the Report of the Commissioner of Taxes. We have seldom read an official document more strongly characterised by practical good sense and plainness of statements. A great portion of it is taken up with pointing out the deficiencies and flaws of the existing tax laws and suggestions of remedies; but the principles of the act are highly commended, and the European reader is startled right at the beginning with the statement, 'that the great body of tax-payers not only submit to the burdens cheerfully, but manifest a willingness to have them increased.' 'Notwithstanding the evil predictions of croakers and demagogues, the people have yielded a ready acquiescence everywhere,' with scarcely any, and these very inconsiderable, exceptions. The war taxes of the Confederacy are of two sorts—one in money, the other in kind. Of the latter the Commissioner speaks less confidently, as less generally popular and more easily evaded, though successfully collected everywhere, and having produced some excellent results in the provisioning of the armies.

The results of the money tax afford, indeed, a curious commentary on the boasted progress of the Federal invasion. It appears from the Commissioner's Report that during the six months ending July 1, 1863, this tax has been assessed and collected in the various States to the extent as follows:—

In Alabama, in all the collection districts, excepting only the counties of Franklin, Lawrence, and Winston. The State, therefore, still owes to the Confederate Government $141,087·47.

In Arkansas, forty-eight districts have been assessed, only eight remaining unassessed. The State still owes $151·606·03.

In Florida, all the districts assessed, leaving only the counties of Duval and Clay, which are in possession of the public enemy.

In Georgia, full assessment made in all the counties of all the districts.

Louisiana having assumed the collection of the tax, and paid in advance into the Confederate Treasury the estimated amount due by her, is found to have a balance in her favour of $75,825·61, which has been refunded.

In Mississippi, all the districts have been assessed, and the collection made by Confederate officers; but, the State having suffered greatly by incursions of the enemy, $146,012·97 still remains due.

In North Carolina, all the counties have been assessed. Payment being assumed by the State in advance, she is entitled to a balance of $111,171·09, which has been refunded by the Confederate Treasury.

South Carolina assumed the collection of the tax through State officers, and the tax has been paid in the whole State, excepting the parishes of All Saints, St. George's, Winyon, St. Helena, St. John's Colleton, St. Andrew's, and in the parish of St. Luke's and St. James' (Santee), on behalf of which, being contiguous to the sea, and exposed to the depredations of the enemy, the Governor of the State claims exemption in the sum of $146,547·97; leaving, however, the Confederate Government still indebted to the State to the amount of $8,447·63.

In Tennessee no general apportionment of the tax has been practicable; but the State has paid on account the sum of $1,499,706·77, and the amount estimated to be still due is only $705,233·23.

From Texas, owing to the difficulty of mail communication, the accounts were not yet fully made up; but the tax had been there more than ordinarily productive, and the State had already paid into the Treasury $1,212,964·51, leaving an estimated balance due of $411,343·54.

In Virginia there are 149 counties and 11 cities, making as many collection districts, of which 97 counties and 9 cities have been assessed, leaving 52 counties and 2 cities (Alexandria and Wheeling) unassessed, owing either to disloyalty of the population, as in North-western Virginia, or to the temporary occupation of hostile armies. The State, however, has paid into the Confederate Treasury $2,125,000, leaving a balance of only $311,738·97.

The amounts severally paid by the States since the date of the Commissioner's last Report of Jan. 6, 1863, to the end of the fiscal year, July 1, 1863, will be best perceived from the subjoined Table, upon which we need offer no comments to the readers of Federal war bulletins and Federal 'progress maps.' It is clear that each of the eleven States properly comprised in the Confederacy has contributed a fair share to the revenue of the general Government, and that even those which have the most severely suffered from the war, and which are most confidently claimed by the enemy as his conquests—Louisiana and Tennessee—are not greatly, if at all, in arrears.

Alabama	2,000,000 00
Arkansas	400,000 00
Florida	225,374 11
Georgia	2,494,112 41
Louisiana	2,424,174 39
Mississippi	2,094,990 23
North Carolina	1,288,825 31
South Carolina	1,651,528 55
Tennessee	1,499,766 77
Texas	1,242,964 51
Virginia	2,125,000 00
	17,446,736 28

This tax is levied upon an amount of taxable property, so far as assessed by Confederate or State officers, which is classified as follows:—

Real estate	1,393,719,759 64
Slaves	1,480,399,656 17
Merchandise	67,521,668 54
Bank Stock	94,465,231 46
Railroad and other corporation stock	51,502,063 13
Money at interest	498,765,468 70
Cash on hand	41,300,341 88
Horses, cattle, &c.	44,563,258 26
Gold watches	7,169,290 00
Gold and silver plate	4,568,697 65
Pianos	5,474,126 00
Pleasure-carriages	16,813,670 75
Stock not returned by corporations	10,147,291 03
Sum total (excluding Tennessee, which does not appear in the classified assessments)	3,716,410,523 21
Tennessee (estimated assessment)	490,000,000 00
Non-rendered and sequestrated property	14,345,311 00
Final aggregate	4,220,755 834 21

This, for a 'local insurrection, chiefly adjacent to the Gulf of Mexico,' appears a tolerably fair showing of taxable property. And it must be remembered that the principle upon which the assessment is based, insures, as nearly as possible, the real or old values of property, and that, therefore, but slight allowance, if any, must be made for the fictitious value which some of the articles enumerated have acquired through the depreciation of the currency or the operation of the blockade.

In regard to the probable proceeds of the war tax during the current fiscal year, ending July 1, 1864, the Commissioner says:—

'Judging from the collections already made of taxes from business and occupations, it may be safely affirmed that the money tax alone (the tax in kind not computed) this year will amount to at least one hundred millions of dollars. If the law could be carried out, and full returns and collections made in the territory of the Confederate States under our control at the beginning of the year, it is believed the amount will reach $150,000,000. But even this sum, without the cooperation of a successful system of funding, will not produce such reduction in the volume of currency afloat as will reduce the price of the necessaries of life to that standard so essential to the safety of the Government and the happiness of the people. In levying taxes, therefore, two prominent objects should be sought—first to raise a certain amount of revenue, and secondly to so adjust the taxes as to make it the interest of capitalists to invest their surplus moneys in Confederate bonds or stocks; and to that end it is believed that the present rate of taxation in certain cases should be greatly increased.

MILITARY AND OTHER ESTIMATES.

Of the estimates submitted by the several Departments and their respective bureaux to the Confederate Congress, as the bases of the appropriations for the current half-year, the most interesting are those of the pay, subsistence, and clothing of the army. The Quartermaster's and Commissary's estimates are for an effective force of [illegible] men, in the classification of which [illegible] the singularly large proportion of [illegible], appropriating a sufficient number to their [illegible] not exceeding the last and second year of the war, as [illegible]

This force, as appears from the estimates for pay, is commanded by 200 general officers.

What is most conspicuous in these estimates is the low rate at which the rations are computed, [illegible] be explained on no other supposition than that the [illegible] prices prevailing in Richmond and the [illegible] lation are far from having the [illegible] Commissary's Department [illegible] the provisioning of the army. The following is the [illegible] which the appropriations for the purpose are asked:—

Bacon	$0·40 a pound
Beef	10 "
Flour	1·3 "
Meal (maize)	9 "
Vinegar	50 a gallon
Candles	1·00 a pound
Soap	1·00 "
Sugar	1·00 "
Molasses	5·50 a gallon
Whisky	5·00 "

These prices suggest a curious fact recently mentioned by a Richmond paper, as illustrating the difference between the real and the apparent depreciation of the currency. It is stated that a foreign visitor, boarding at one of the principal hotels at that city, paid his bill in specie at the rate of 60 cents per day. The charge in currency is $8·00; before the war it was $2·50.

The soldier's daily ration, consisting of bacon or beef, flour or meal, with a small allowance of other articles to each company, is estimated at $0·74·5, a trifle less than three-quarters of a dollar; or 3s. English. Coffee is not mentioned in the estimates, from which we conclude that this part of the soldier's ration is no longer furnished to the Confederate armies. In contrast with the relatively small estimates for subsistence are those for clothing. The articles are not specified; but, from the appropriations asked for, it appears that each enlisted man of the line costs the Government for clothing about $142·00 a year. Altogether the War Department asks Congress for the following amounts, under the several heads enumerated, for the period of six months, ending June 30, 1864, inclusive:—

Quartermaster-General	320,028,745
Commissary-General	57,988,000
Surgeon-General	17,020,000
Engineer Bureau	10,000,000
Ordnance Bureau	23,000,000
Nitre and Mining Bureau	9,500,000
Adjutant-General's Office	50,000
Bureau of War (Compensation of Secretary, Assistants, Clerical Force, &c.)	242,125
Contingent Fund	250,000
	438,078,870

The other departments of State, as might be expected, are less exacting in their demands upon the public purse. The estimates for the naval service are not published. The others are as follows:—

State Department	541,409·50
Department of Justice (Attorney-General's)	222,587·76
Treasury Department	390,200,000·00
Interest on public debt	20,000,000,000·00
Payment of principal under loan of Aug. 19, 1861, falling due July 1, 1864	1,340,200·00

The Post-Office Department, instead of asking for an appropriation, returns a net surplus of $675,048·44.

Among the detailed estimates of the clerical expenses of the Treasury Department, we observe the salaries of 159 female clerks. The War Department and its different bureaux employ as clerks invalided officers and soldiers exclusively.

Startling as these estimates of expenditure, amounting for six months to nearly $500,000,000, or at the rate nominally of about £2,000,000 sterling per annum, will appear, it may be well to remember the fact, that while the taxable property of these States, as returned in the Tax Commissioner's Report, is estimated at nearly, if not quite, its true value before the war, the expenditures of the Government are almost wholly in a depreciated currency. At the present rate of exchange, all the necessities of the Government could be met with specie at about 6 per cent., or at most 7 per cent., of the estimated amount, and with this fact in view, the expenditure will not be deemed excessive, especially when it is considered that the six months, for which we have the estimates before us, are a period of supreme effort. At prices before the war, the stock of cotton now in the Confederacy, though not equal to a single ordinary year's crop, represents £30,000,000 of gold—at present Liverpool prices about four times as much, or £120,000,000; and this, at the same rate of exchange, would represent in Confederate currency an amount many times larger than the entire indebtedness of the Confederacy and of the several States. This comparison is useful as illustrating that, however exhaustive the drain is upon the public resources, it is not so utterly disproportionate to them, as might at first glance appear.

POSTAL ROUTES AND REVENUE.

If the foregoing figures are calculated to impress the European reader with the vitality, the vast extent, and the efficient internal organisation of the Confederate States, no less impressive are the figures which exhibit the peaceable operations of the Government, and by which we may measure not only the enormous territorial extent, but the activity of social and business intercourse among the population.

It was determined by the framers of the Confederate [illegible]

[illegible] currency. If, then, the [illegible] no doubt have been [illegible] [illegible] to be in proportion to the [illegible] the considerable sum of $6,5[illegible] much larger. This [illegible] whenever the volume of the [illegible]

For this return [illegible] it with the returns for the last [illegible] ment of the United States, and the first [illegible] Confederate Government:—

Year ending:	Receipts	Expenditure	Profit	Loss
	$	$	$	$
(U.S. Govt.)
June 30, 1863	3,337,853	2,662,804	675,084

The Postmaster-General remarks: 'Adding the increase of receipts to the decrease of expenditure between these two years, there is an improvement of the revenue of the year which ended the 30th of June last, over those of the year which ended June 30, 1860, of $3,453,754.'

The number of post-offices in the Confederate States is 8,287. The number established during the year ending June 30, 1863, was 137, and during the same period 430 were discontinued. The Report before us does not present the number of the Confederate postal routes, but in setting forth the particulars of the contracts entered into for Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Florida, it gives some suggestive statistics. Independently of the railroads, the number of routes in these five States is 887, and the (still not taking into account the railways) aggregate lineal length of these routes is 27,961 miles, and the aggregate number of lineal miles length of routes let to service in these States is 23,459 miles. We may judge of the extent of the railroad service by the following return of the cost per annum in these States:—

Railroad service	360,105
Contract works as	352,466

We have no account of the number of letters that passed through the Post-Office; but the following return of the number of postage-stamps sold during the year shows that it must have been very large:—

2 cent stamps	557,200
5 " "	37,952,977
10 " "	10,417,700
20 " "	95,100
Total	49,023,977

The number of letters sent to the 'Dead Letter Branch,' in consequence of the postage not being prepaid, was 43,211.

Postmaster Reagan says that the service of the Trans-Mississippi Department 'has been interrupted, and irregular, but he hopes from recent arrangements 'that postal intercourse with these States will be secured with more or less regularity,' and he suggests that an officer should be employed west of the Mississippi invested with powers to conduct the postal business, his acts to be subject to the final revision and approval of the Postmaster-General. The object of this recommendation is to give greater vigour to the Trans-Mississippi service, and that under trying circumstances the subordinate officials may not be without competent direction.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

Richmond: Jan. 11, 1864.

NEW YEAR'S DAY IN THE CONFEDERACY—GENERAL MORGAN'S OVATION AT RICHMOND—THE ABOLITION OF THE SUBSTITUTE SYSTEM—A PROPOSAL TO AUGMENT THE POWER OF THE EXECUTIVE—THE PUBLIC WILLINGNESS TO MEET THE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTIES—THE EXTREME COLD—THREATENED VENGEANCE OF THE YANKEES—REFUSAL TO RECOGNISE GENERAL BUTLER AS COMMISSIONER OF EXCHANGE—THE WILMINGTON BLOCKADE—THE NEWLY APPOINTED ATTORNEY-GENERAL.

The old year went out and the new year came in stormily, in respect of the elements—quietly, so far as military operations were concerned—cheerily, in the social circle—anxiously, in the look-out for the future, upon which the attention of all thoughtful men is fixed. President Davis held a public reception on New Year's Day at the Executive Mansion, where large numbers of ladies and gentlemen paid their respects to His Excellency; but this apart, no official formalities marked the anniversary. The editorial columns of the daily press gave us, as usual, their retrospect of the past in phrase more or less moralising and rhetorical, and their prognostics for the coming time, in language hopeful or despondent, as was the mood of the writers. The newly-elected Governor of Virginia, General William Smith, took up the reins of State administration, which had just dropped from the hands of John Letcher, and entertained a large audience in the hall of the House of Delegates for an hour, prefatory to taking the oaths of office, by telling them how he meant to drive the State coach, please Heaven, without upsetting it, during the next four years. And so passed New Year's Day, with a high wind, such as only Dickens could describe, blowing out of the west, and increasing in bluster and intense bitterness of cold as the first sun of eighteen hundred and sixty-four went down in bloody wrath and splendour.

The event of the last week was the arrival in Richmond of Brigadier-General John H. Morgan, the renowned Kentucky partisan, whose brilliant and various adventures have attached such distinction to his name at home and abroad. He came in a whirl of snow by the train from Danville at midnight of Thursday the 7th instant, and was escorted to the Ballard House, where cheerful fires were lighted and brimming bowls prepared in his welcome. From that moment till the present he has been undergoing the martyrdom of fame. Aldermen have waylaid him, committees have come upon him from ambuscade in the corridors of the hotel, and managers of public entertainments have rushed into his rooms with tickets to fancy-dress balls. On Friday he was escorted through the principal streets in an open carriage, with every aggravation of discomfort, attended by His Honour the Mayor and a couple of common councilmen, the thermometer being at only 14° of Fahrenheit, and a brass band blaring in his ears, to the City Hall, where His Honour the Mayor made him a speech in the open air, and everybody shivered and shouted for the space of thirty minutes; and the hero of the occasion, no doubt, wished himself, for the nonce, back in the Ohio Penitentiary. On Saturday, General Morgan, with his brother-in-law, General A. P. Hill, visited the Libby Prison, and exchanged compliments with Generals Neal Dow and Colonel Streight, guests of the Confederate States in that establishment. Yesterday, with Mrs. Morgan, he attended St. Paul's Episcopal Church, and today he has been received in due form by both Houses of the Virginia Legislature, the new Lieutenant-Governor, the Hon. Samuel Price, as President of the Senate, addressing him in that body, and H. W. Sheffey, Esq., Speaker of the House of Delegates, firing off a very pretty little oration at him ex officio from the Speaker's chair. General Morgan remains to be welcomed at the festive board, &c. &c. This is the first ovation that has been paid to a popular hero in the capital of the Confederacy, and if it has been just a little excessive, the fault may be pardoned for the circumstances surrounding the worthy recipient. General Morgan has been honoured with a demonstration such as was not given to Lee, Jackson, or Longstreet, crowned with the laurels of victory; but the public sympathy conspired with the public gratitude to bring it about. Setting aside the romance which hangs around the bold rider, the man of hair-breadth 'scapes, of numberless disguises, of solitary perils in the enemy's country by day and by night, and of the recent marvellous adventure in getting out of the penitentiary at Columbus, there was the ignominious treatment he received at the hands of his captors to inflame the resentment and excite the enthusiasm of our people. He who was consigned by our enemies to a felon's cell, who was made to wear the felon's dress and to undergo the felon's tonsure—he it is whom naturally enough we delight to honour. General Morgan seems to bear it all with becoming modesty. If his digestion is as little impaired by the dinners as his vanity has been stimulated by the compliments he has received, he will be none the worse for the ovation. In a few days he will proceed to Georgia to take command of his old companions in arms, who are already rallying to his call; and there is not one who will not fling the old shoe after him, and cry, Jack Morgan, God speed!

The bill abolishing substitutes in the army having passed both Houses of Congress (in the Senate there were but two votes recorded against it Mr. Orr of South Carolina, and Mr. Herschel V. Johnson of Georgia) has received the signature of the President and become a law, and the enrolling officers are already engaged in sending to the Camps of Instruction the new men who are brought by its provisions into the army. The expedition with which the measure was perfected and put in operation has prevented in great degree the escape of the class effected by it beyond the limits of the Confederacy. A stampede, however, was the immediate result, chiefly among the Jews, who had procured substitutes and fancied themselves safe to 'puy and shell' and make their 'shix hunder per shent' during the continuance of the war, and the gamblers, a lamentably numerous fraternity, who cried out with one voice against the bad faith of the Government, these purist patriots, who had never practised bad faith themselves, not they. The Jews and gamblers ran off, some to the Potomac, some to Wilmington. Enormous sums were paid by them to hackmen in this city to take them to the border. One vehicle is said to have made several trips to a point on the Rappahannock, sixty miles distant, receiving for each trip the sum of two thousand dollars. Stringent orders from the War Department, requiring all parties leaving the Confederacy to produce passports countersigned by the Secretary of War, have operated to check the hegira, and but a small number comparatively of the substitute conscripts will succeed in getting away. As a general rule, the persons on whom the new law will work the greatest amount of hardship, good citizens with families, quiet men who have passed forty years of age, have submitted to it with the best grace, and gone most willingly into camp.

A disposition has been manifested in both Houses of Congress to augment the power of the Confederate Executive to an extent that would make the President little less than an absolute dictator, armed with authority greater than that of any monarch of Europe, the Czar Alexander alone perhaps excepted. Mr. Phelan of Mississippi has offered a resolution in the senate, suspending the writ of habeas corpus in all cases involving service in the army; and Mr. Miles of South Carolina, the chairman of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, has reported a Bill making a tabula rasa of exemptions, and subjecting all classes of the community to military duty. Among a people so jealous of their liberties as our own—a people who braved the calamities of war sooner than relinquish their inestimable birthright, a very natural alarm has been excited by propositions involving the abrogation of the writ of habeas corpus and the freedom of the press: for the bill of Mr. Miles in effect abrogates the freedom of the press. It would silence every press in the country by mustering editors and printers into service. The bill proposes to shift the responsibility of naming such exempts as would be indispensable to carry on the commercial, industrial, and manufacturing business of the country from the shoulders of Congress to the shoulders of the President. It would empower the President, calling to his assistance the Secretary of War, to designate the persons who shall be permitted by special detail to cultivate the soil, to drive the wheels of the factories, to do this, that, or the other work or labour necessary to the public economy. The editor, in the event of the passage of the bill, would write only by express permission of the Executive. It is not a supposable case that any President would detail an editor from service in the army to conduct a paper inimical to his administration. Indeed, it is clear that no President could do this, consistently with his sense of duty; and it is equally clear that a press whose conductors are the mere creatures of executive favour would be a tame and subservient machine, an automaton to squeak the opinions of the Government, not a fearless thinker to challenge the soundness of these opinions and to express the sentiments of the people. The bill reported from the military committee has met with able opposition, not only in the newspapers of the country (where opposition was as naturally to be expected, Mr. Miles would doubtless say, as the outcry of the silversmiths of Ephesus of old when the making of shrines for Diana was endangered), but on the floor of Congress. Mr. Staples of Virginia has protested against its passage in an earnest and well-considered speech, which I cannot but think the faithful expression of the public sentiment of Virginia; and other voices will be heard on the same side before the debate is brought to a close. The feeling against this augmentation of power in the Executive head is not to be construed as indicating any want of confidence in Jefferson Davis: it would be as deep and general if George Washington were the man who was thus to be invested with a virtual dictatorship. Mr. Davis, in the purity of his motives and the singleness of his patriotism, in the excellence of his private life and the amenity of his manners, commands the respect and affection of the Southern people; but these Southern people are unwilling to commit their liberties to the keeping of any one man, were he the wisest and best of his race.

There is no danger that the people will not sustain Congress in the most drastic measures they may adopt for the relief of the currency and the maintenance of the public credit. And yet the House of Representatives sits the greater part of its time with closed doors discussing the Report of the Currency Committee, as if they distrusted the people, and were unwilling to let it be known what schemes were under consideration. A few days will probably terminate the debate on this subject in the passage of a bill which will call in, more or less promptly, the outstanding Treasury notes, and raise by taxation money enough to meet the expenses of the war.

For a fortnight we have had the severest winter weather that is known to the climate of Virginia. The mercury has reached a depression of 8° of Fahrenheit, and ice has formed to the thickness of five inches. Snow has fallen to a greater or less depth throughout the State and in Eastern Tennessee. As a necessary consequence, active hostilities have been suspended everywhere along the extended lines of the opposing armies. At Charleston the enemy's batteries have kept up their fire upon the city at the rate of twenty-five shells a day, and upon Sumter irregularly, accomplishing very little. The rumour prevailed last week that a land attack was about to be made upon Wilmington from the direction of Newbern, and that Meade had gone thither to command the attacking column; but this is not believed, although some demonstrations of an advance from Newbern had caused a movement of Confederate troops in that direction to repel any serious attempt that might be hazarded. The Northern papers declare that Meade's purpose is to open the spring campaign by coming down on Richmond with an overwhelming force, which shall reduce its reduction to a certainty. Three large armies, led by three mighty captains, perhaps Meade, Rosecrans, and Burnside, are to approach the capital by three different routes, and having won three splendid victories, are to celebrate the indubitably final downfall of the rebellion in the pillage of the town, and the execution of the leading rebels. The three mighty captains, like the fearful Trinity of Coleridge's Eclogue Fire, Famine, and Slaughter will confer upon the measures of ruin that shall be adopted. Salt will be sown over the site of the Libby Prison. Belle Isle will be utterly wiped out, blown up, removed, every cubic foot of it, earth and granite, and the James River made to flow over the accursed spot where it stands. Such is to be the fate of Richmond. The enemy is kind to announce his intentions so long beforehand.

As I conjectured in my last letter, our Government has officially refused to recognise General Butler as Commissioner for the exchange of prisoners, vice General Meredith, removed by the Yankee authorities, and there has been no communication with the enemy by flag of truce since Judge Ould's letter, making this refusal known, was forwarded to Fortress Monroe, now two weeks ago. There is a rumour that Burnside has been sent to take Butler's place, in which event negotiations will probably be renewed at an early day. But nothing positive is known on the subject.

From Wilmington we have intelligence of the loss of the fine steamer 'Dare,' on her first trip to the Confederate States, with a large and valuable cargo, forced to run ashore under pressure of the blockading fleet. The continued inefficiency of the blockade, despite the addition of several large and swift Yankee steamers to the squadron, is shown, however, in the arrival at Wilmington, during the past week, of six or eight steamers from Bermuda and Nassau. The trade with these ports goes on regularly, as if no line of fire had to be passed by the daring sailors engaged in it.

The appointment of the Hon. George Davis, recently Senator in Congress from North Carolina, as Attorney-General, in the place of the Hon. Thomas H. Watts, who resigned on being elected Governor of Alabama, has given universal satisfaction to the Confederacy. Mr. Davis is not a relative of the President, as has been stated, nor had he any political association with Jefferson Davis under the old Union, having always acted with the Old Line Whig party.

The city is full of distinguished military men. Besides General Morgan, the army is represented here by Generals Buckner, John C. Breckinridge, A. P. Hill, Preston, Edward Johnson, Kemper, Hood, Quarles, and Jeb. Stuart.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: Feb. 15, 1864.

GENERALS BANKS AND GRANT SHELVED FOR POLITICAL REASONS — GENERAL SHERMAN AS A MILITARY COMMANDER — THE PROBABLE OBJECT OF HIS MOVEMENTS—THE REINFORCEMENT OF THE CONFEDERATE ARMIES THE CONSCRIPTION BILL —GENERAL BRAGG IN WESTERN LOUISIANA. THE NAVIGATION OF THE MISSISSIPPI, AND THE PARTISAN RANGERS —NORTH CAROLINA —A NORTHERN JOURNAL ON FEDERAL ATROCITIES THE SITUATION IN TEXAS.

Notwithstanding all the parade of apparent preparation, it is now very generally understood that the land forces in this Department will figure but little, if at all, in the movement upon Mobile. Knowing well the strength of the army in the Gulf Department, and the vast extent of territory it is expected to hold, I expressed the opinion several weeks ago that General Banks was in no condition to undertake any movement seriously threatening Mobile. Since then, his chances of figuring in the campaign are much less flattering, from which we may conclude that the general's vanity and the politician's aspirations have received a mortifying blow. The goal of Banks's ambition is the 'White House,' and for that reason the Administration would not lend itself to the strengthening of his claims to the nomination by intrusting him with the conduct of the campaign, and the materiel and men necessary for its successful prosecution; for were he to succeed, he would surely overtop both Chase and Lincoln in his claims to the nomination. Party politics and the rivalry of Presidential aspirants are controlling questions with the Federal Government in the conduct of the war; and it is owing to such considerations as these that Banks is now shelved, and Grant is forced into comparative inaction, his army being very materially weakened by the withdrawal of troops for the campaign just opened, under General Sherman, in the State of Mississippi. Sherman is a brave, but a blundering and unfortunate old soldier, who drives right on, regardless of consequences, to victory or disastrous defeat. He is a soldier of undoubted pugnacity, scientific acquirements, and fair tactical skill; but the most unfortunate, blundering, headlong, and headstrong strategist that ever set squadron in the field. In his attempt to storm Haynes' Bluff last year, he led his men into a slaughter-pen, where they were literally shot down by hundreds by the three Confederate regiments who held the position under that skilful young general, S. D. Lee. In the late battles near Chattanooga, he was thrice repulsed, with fearful loss, and still he led his corps to the fourth attack, till his columns, broken and scattered and panic-stricken, were chased down the mountains, and driven helter-skelter across the river. I doubt not he would have rallied his men, and led them once more to the slaughter, had not the Confederates destroyed his pontoon bridges. And to such a leader is intrusted the campaign which is thought to have for its object the capture of Mobile. Sherman is not a politician, so the rival Presidential aspirants have no fears that even so important a military achievement as the capture of Mobile would lead his thoughts to political honours, but with Banks or Grant the result would be far otherwise.

The movement of troops in Mississippi under Sherman, begun about the 1st inst., does not appear to be aimed directly against Mobile, but rather to seize and occupy important strategic positions on the line of the Alabama and Sombigbee rivers, say Selma and Montgomery. With these commanding positions in their possession, and the forts and batteries in the harbour being silenced or passed by Farragut's fleet, the enemy, in his fervid imagination, unhesitatingly concludes that Mobile would fall without a blow. To say nothing of the resistance the Confederates are prepared to offer, the natural difficulties which Sherman would have to overcome in a march across the State of Mississippi, and thence to Selma and Montgomery in the very heart of Alabama, would entail such an amount of suffering, privations, and hardships upon his troops as would leave him but the remnant of an army.

My own opinion is that Sherman's movement is intended as a grand feint to draw troops from Northern Georgia for the defence of Mobile, so that Grant may be able to give further succour to Foster at Knoxville, now sorely pressed by Longstreet, while he still retains sufficient force to move upon Joe Johnston's army. But, whatever may be Sherman's objective point, he is now certainly across the Big Black River with a large force, and is doubtless by this time in Jackson, the capital of Mississippi—that is, if General Polk did not attempt to hold that place. Even should he attempt nothing more, if his force be large enough, Sherman will compel General Polk to contract his lines, so as to cover Mobile more effectively, whether threatened direct or by the line of the Sombigbee River. But this contracting of his lines will not, in effect, involve the abandonment of any considerable portion of the State of Mississippi; for the large and very effective force of Confederate cavalry in that State, under the command of General S. D. Lee, will be amply able to hold in check and punish any reconnoitring, marauding, or foraging columns of the enemy. As yet it is difficult to decide whether Sherman's movement be a feint or the opening of a regularly planned campaign. At all events, I can assert with confidence, from my knowledge of what is going on within the Confederate lines, that, whether it be a feint or an offensive movement, it can neither deceive the Confederates, nor find them unprepared for the shock of arms. The armies of Lee, Johnston, Longstreet, and Polk, are being strengthened to a degree even many of the most sanguine do not dream of, and the Federal generals will soon be startled from their dreams of successful invasion, and their bloody conquests be snatched from them even while they meditate 'the last blow to the expiring rebellion.' I know of that whereof I write. The sole business of the Confederate States just now is war, and it is cheering to know that both Government and people are bending all their energies for the tug of war, giving assurance to the observer that this year is destined to witness a series of brilliant and decisive victories for the Confederate arms. There is a kind of sublimity in the quiet earnestness with which the Southern people are preparing for the coming struggle, while they appreciate to its full value the cost and the consequences of victory or defeat. Their preparations are not confined simply to raising of new levies of troops, but (as I am informed by gentlemen from across the lines, and as I read in Confederate journals) the whole territory is, as it were, laid out into Commissary, Quartermaster, Ordnance, Recruiting, &c., Departments, and the citizens detailed for service in these several sections. In a word, the armies are being rapidly augmented to the desired strength, and the whole resources of the country organised for a decisive campaign. The Congress, too, has at length consented to relieve the army of all work on fortifications, Government workshops, &c., by detailing negroes for such service. On the 1st inst. the House of Representatives passed a Bill which provides that all male free negroes between the ages of eighteen and fifty be held liable to perform duty in the army, in the way of work on fortifications, Government works, and hospitals, and receive rations, clothing, and eleven dollars per month. The Secretary of War is authorised to employ 20,000 slaves, if necessary, and furnish rations and clothing, and pay their owners eleven dollars a month, and pay for the loss of slaves while so employed, and may impress if unable to procure them otherwise. The Bill authorises the impressment of not more than one in every five male slaves, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, to be taken from one owner. Free negroes are to be first conscribed, and then slaves impressed to make up any deficiency. Those free under the Treaty of Paris of 1803, and with Spain of 1819, are not liable under this Act.

On the 29th ult., the Senate removed the injunction of secresy from the Military Bill passed by that body on the 16th of the same month. It provides that from its passage all white residents of the Confederate States between eighteen and forty-five shall be in the service during the war, and between forty-five and fifty-five shall enrol within such time as the President shall prescribe, and all failing to enrol shall be conscribed into the army in the field. All details for provost and hospital guards, the service of the Quartermaster, Commissary, and Nitre Bureaus, agents, clerks, &c., shall be taken from those between forty-five and fifty-five now in the service, or below the age of forty-five and unfit for field service. All exemption laws are repealed, except as regards mail contractors, and the following provisions are substituted:—

All persons unfit for service; members and officers of Congress and State Legislatures, and such officers as the President or the Governors of States shall declare necessary to administer the Government; ministers authorised to preach on the 10th of April, 1862; one editor of each newspaper published on the 10th of April, 1862, and which has been regularly published, and of which he has been editor ever since, and printers; one apothecary to each store engaged at that time, and regularly engaged since; physicians over thirty-five years of age in regular practice for seven years; teachers continuously engaged for two years; one overseer on each farm of 20 field hands, the sole property of minors, insane persons, femmes sole, or persons in the service, provided such overseer has been so employed since the 10th of April, 1862, and if there be no white man able to discharge the same duties and not liable to service; one person under each Government contract, with certain restrictions. Any quartermaster or commissary not in the field, provost-marshal, nitre or enrolling officer, who shall employ any one liable to service between the ages of eighteen and forty-five shall be cashiered. These are the principal features of the bill as passed by the Senate. It is still under consideration in secret session in the House. What changes have been made in it are not known.

The Congress has also passed a Bill providing a home for veterans, a Confederate Hôtel des Invalides.

There is a strong probability of the Confederate forces west of the river, especially those in Western Louisiana, undertaking some important movements very soon. General Bragg is now in command over them, but whether he relieves General Kirby Smith, who commands the entire Trans-Mississippi Department, or his jurisdiction extends no farther than Western Louisiana, does not yet appear. It is said that Kirby Smith goes to East Tennessee to relieve Longstreet, who is to take a special and important command in Virginia. If General Smith comes east, of course Bragg succeeds him. The latter has not been among the most fortunate of the Confederate generals, but his great and many merits as a commander cannot be denied, and his appointment to the Trans-Mississippi Department I think a good one. He has had full time to review the past; and let us hope that, profiting by his experience, and being inspired with a new zeal while fighting on the soil of his own State, and almost within sight of his desolated home, he may retrieve his ill fortune, and redeem the Department. On several occasions, both before and since the General crossed, large supplies of arms and all kinds of military stores have been shipped to the west bank of the river, without let or hindrance from the Federal gunboats or garrisons. Since the opening of the present month, the Confederates have, in fact, had things pretty much their own way on the Mississippi. Their light field batteries, with which they attack the passing transport or gunboat, seem to be ubiquitous, and have inflicted great damage. The Gilman has been destroyed, the Lillie Martin captured and taken up the Arkansas river, and the Arago, Freestone, Shreveport, Sir William Wallace, and other steamboats have been fired upon and more or less damaged, and with loss of life in some instances.

All this is the work of the Partisan Rangers, who have also captured Island No. 60, with all the negroes, agents, stock, stores, &c., in the 'Government plantation' on that island. Fort Pillow, Hickman, and several other points on the river have been occupied by this dashing, restless, and enterprising body of soldiery. And yet President Lincoln says the Mississippi travels unvexed to the sea. He ought to ask the opinion of the steamboat captains on that point. If these small bands of Partisan Rangers can thus defy the armies on the river and Admiral Porter's great naval flotilla, how will it be when General Bragg comes in to effect certain well-matured plans of his? Do not be surprised if you should shortly hear of another Vicksburg or Port Hudson on the Mississippi. And speaking of Port Hudson reminds me of the fact that the garrison at that place is still confined to its ditches. I have it, on Federal authority, that the pickets dare not go from under cover of the guns, or they would surely be 'gobbled' by the Confederate cavalry, who are constantly in sight, and who may be almost said to have invested the place. The same is true of Baton Rouge. All this is very mortifying, especially at the present time, when it is so desirable to extend the Federal lines, and drive or bribe those brought within them to the ballot-box on the 22nd inst. But it cannot be helped. The conquest of these 'rebellious States' is a slow business—so slow, indeed, that, were it not for his fortifications and the presence of the navy, Banks could not hold his territory one week.

I perceive in the Northern press a persistent effort to produce the impression that North Carolina is fast becoming alienated from the Confederate Government. Their support of the war and the steady adherence of her public men give the lie to this slander. Not one North Carolinian of the least prominence has advocated the tender of any terms to the North save those of absolute independence. Even the Raleigh Standard, from which the Northern press is so fond of quoting, scornfully repudiates Mr. Lincoln's 'Amnesty Proclamation.' The repudiation not happening to be a sharp criticism upon the Richmond Administration, the Northern editors entirely overlooked it in their clippings from Southern journals; so, concluding it has not come under your eye, I append the article from Holden's paper, the Raleigh Standard:—

'We publish to-day that portion of Mr. Lincoln's message which relates to the Confederate States. . . . Without entering into any argument in reply to any portion of this document, we say that if "the rebellion" were in the condition which Mr. Lincoln claims, which we by no means admit, and if our people were reduced to the painful necessity of reconstructing the old Government, the terms of such reconstruction, as indicated by the oath proposed, would be exceedingly repugnant to a high-spirited and gallant people. Terms of pardon based on an oath to support certain acts of the Federal Congress relating to slaves strike us as strange and absurd. Terms might be imposed with equal reason based on the support of any other law. This, it seems to us, would be an abuse of the pardoning power, even conceding, as we do not, that we are rebels, and asking pardon.

'Again, the assumption that one-tenth of the people of a State may shape the action of the State on a question so vital in its character, is opposed to the fundamental principle of the right of a majority to govern, and would, if carried into effect, lead to civil war among ourselves. We tell Mr. Lincoln that the people of North Carolina may be overrun and physically subdued, but their honour and their proud port as freemen they can never sacrifice. They will take no oaths which their State, in Convention assembled, does not require them to take; and whatever may happen, North Carolina will act as a State by a majority of her people, and thus shape her own destiny. Her people would not rally round a tenth to do anything. North Carolina may be forced to walk through the valley of humiliation, but she would do it in her own proud integrity, with her garments unstained save by the blood of those who, presuming on their physical might, would dishonour and degrade her.'

As we are on the Old North State, let me quote for you the opinion of a North-western journal, the Chicago (Ill.) Times, upon the recent Federal negro raid into that State. It was ordered by General Butler, and was wholly worthy of that 'tyrant without courage, and coward without shame.' This criticism of a journal published in a 'loyal State' is more damaging than anything which could be said by the Southern press:—

'THE ATROCITIES OF THE LATE RAID IN NORTH CAROLINA.

'Taking the Northern and Southern accounts of the late raid of General Wild into North Carolina, and deducting a fair percentage from both in order to get rid of abolition and secession, bombast and exaggeration, we are able to arrive at the truth in the case, and also to learn several valuable lessons relative to our new allies. In the first place, the lengthy and particular account furnished by a New York paper does not show that the expedition was projected against any organised enemy, but, rather, that it had for its object the testing of the endurance and other qualities of the negro troops.

'If we take no other evidence than that furnished by the New York Times, we cannot resist the conclusion that the whole affair was a disgrace to the age in which it occurred. When we add to this the accounts given by the Southern papers, it assumes a character only equalled by the atrocities charged against the Russians in their Polish dominions.

'From the Times' account we gather, in brief, that private houses were visited, ransacked, and plundered at discretion, by these sooty devils. The correspondent relates, with evident gusto, how white women went down on their knees to the thick-lipped, greasy blacks, and prayed for protection for themselves and their little ones; and how delicate white ladies were compelled to go to their kitchens and cook for the woolly-headed gorillas who chattered and threatened on every side.

'To the shoddy-abolitionism of the North—to the abolition plebeians whose hatred of the South and Southern institutions grows out of that jealousy which vulgarity always entertains towards refinement—this spectacle of delicate white women being forced at the point of the bayonet to perform menial offices for a mob of sweltering, offensive negroes, is one affording unmixed delight. To them nothing on earth could be more replete with enjoyment than the sight of shrinking, refined, delicate young ladies, and pale, anxious mothers, driven about, threatened, and insulted by armed negroes. They gloat over such affairs, as the canaille of France in revolutionary days gloated over the indignities committed upon some member of the hated noblesse at the prison or guillotine.

'We do not learn that there was any organised force to call out this expedition. There was simply a desire to inure the negroes to war by instructing them in marching, in insulting slaveholders' wives, and in robbing slaveholders' houses, henroosts, and plantations. One Confederate soldier was captured, and, for no assigned reason, hung; hence, we suppose, it was done simply to teach the negroes a lesson, and show them how to serve Confederates hereafter when they should succeed in catching them.'

By way of Mobile we have late intelligence from Texas, under date of Houston, January 11, viâ Jackson, Mississippi, January 29. The Indians, armed and equipped and hounded on by Yankee emissaries, have made a bloody raid in Cook County. They killed some fifteen of the inhabitants, mostly women and old men, and stole a large amount of stock.

'Brigadier-General and Military Governor' Hamilton, on his visit to Brownsville in January last, crossed over to Matamoros, where he was publicly received by Governor Serna and Colonel Cortina, the latter of whom, as I have already informed you, has driven out the former, and now rules in his stead. The 'Governor' made a speech at the banquet given in his honour, in which he declared that, in case the French should advance upon Matamoros, the Yankees would help the Mexicans to 'wipe them out.' Fine talk this for a 'governor' without a government, a general without a command! This Lincoln satrap has since returned to New Orleans, where he passes most of his hours in a state of intoxication. He might make Brownsville, or any one of the sand islands on the coast in Federal possession, his seat of government, but doubtless the Federal officers in command would not tolerate his presence among them. At the rate the occupation of Texas is progressing, it will be many a day and many a year before Jack Hamilton is installed at Austin, the capital of the State. The intelligence from Houston is to the following effect respecting military affairs:—No engagement, scarcely a skirmish, has occurred on our coast since the fall of Fort Esperanza at Pass Cavallo; the health and spirit of our troops are good; the organisation of the army is thorough; many of the regiments number from 800 to 1,100 men, and veteran officers, from lieutenants to general, are in command in each brigade. The 'Amnesty Proclamation' of Lincoln excites hardly a passing thought. It is not regarded as even of enough importance to be worth laughing at. In a word, Texas is all right. The enemy has in two months taken no point that was regarded as defensible or intended to be defended, and they will not attempt to do so until largely reinforced. The people have looked the emergency squarely in the face, and they are determined to fight it out, no matter against what odds or under what difficulties. Texas will not succumb, even though other States in the Confederacy should be overwhelmed. About four hundred Federal prisoners captured in Texas and Western Louisiana have been exchanged at Vermillionville, Louisiana; and several hundred more remain in Texas, as Banks has no Confederate prisoners to exchange for them.

☞In the above you have the substance of the latest news from Texas. The latest arrivals of United States transports from the points in Federal possession' announce no change in the situation. As I have repeatedly said, the Federals dare not advance into the interior without large reinforcements—much larger, indeed, than there is any prospect of their receiving within the next twelve months. Meantime, the army of Texas and its gallant and enterprising leader, General Magruder, are chafing under their forced inaction; and, if the enemy does not advance and give them battle, I feel assured Magruder will strike a crushing blow where the enemy least expect it. That general, it is well known, is too full of resources and too enterprising to sit down with an army of some 20,000 men in front of the few Federal posts on the coast, while other points held by the enemy elsewhere are so invitingly open to attack. Indeed, the Federal forces in Texas may be regarded as so many men hors de combat. They can do nothing where they are, except watch the progress of events along the Rio Grande frontier; and doubtless, but for that and the consequent loss of prestige involved in the abandonment of points occupied with such a flourish of trumpets, the whole force would be brought back to New Orleans, where they are much needed.

Were these forces now here, Banks might be able to co-operate very effectively in the much talked-of movement upon Mobile. As it is, it taxes his utmost strength to hold his lines in this State. Several regiments, whose term of service has expired, have left for home on furlough, it is said, after having 're-enlisted as veteran volunteers.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: Feb. 24, 1864.

GENERAL SHERMAN'S MOVEMENTS—THE FLORIDA EXPEDITION AND THE MISSION OF MR. LINCOLN'S PRIVATE SECRETARY—MR. LINCOLN'S ELECTIONEERING TACTICS—THE POWERS CONFERRED ON HIM BY THE POPULAR PASSIONS OF THE NORTH—THE POLITICAL DIVISION OF THE STATES—THE SPLIT IN THE REPUBLICAN PARTY—THE CANDIDATURE OF MR. CHASE—THE REPUBLICAN NATIONAL CONVENTION—THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The whole interest of military affairs is now transferred to the South-west. The Federal expedition under General Sherman, said to be twenty-five to thirty thousand strong, has crossed the State of Mississippi to the line of the Mobile and Ohio railroad, a distance of one hundred and forty miles, and was at the latest accounts, which we get from Confederate sources, at Quitman, a station on that road, fifteen miles below Meridan, the point of junction. The distance by railroad from Quitman to Mobile is 109 miles. The fleet of Commodore Farragut had made a demonstration against the harbour defences of Mobile Bay, but without success. It is inferred from this, that an immediate attack on Mobile is intended by this land force descending the railroad, with a combined assault on the water point. Such is the opinion of the War Department at Richmond, which has issued a notice for non-combatants to quit the city, to avoid the threatened attack. But it is by no means certain that the expedition means to reach Mobile now, by that route. It may continue to advance eastwardly direct to the Alabama river, and by passing Selwa and Montgomery, operate against Atalanta in that direction. Sherman's move is a very bold, and has been a very rapid one. It may prove to have been a perilous one. The Confederates are in force above him, on the Mobile road, and have closed upon his rear toward Jackson, thus cutting off his connexions there. Indeed, it is said that he destroyed the roads and bridges behind him so as to prevent the junction of the Confederates, until he should have advanced beyond their power to check him. The position is a very critical one, and only great success can excuse it.

There is another batch of rumours from East Tennessee, that the Confederates are in motion in large force. Nothing new on the Potomac or at Charleston. The bulk of the army which was before Charleston has been sent into Florida on one of Mr. Lincoln's campaigns, to see to the getting up of a spurious State, to give Mr. Lincoln its votes at the election in November.

Accompanying this army, sent to take possession of a barren and undefended peninsula, was Mr. John Hay, private secretary to Mr. Lincoln, made an assistant adjutant-general of the army for the purpose. His mission was, as was announced in Federal orders from the head-quarters of the army, to extend to the citizens of the State of Florida the benefits of the Federal proclamation of awards, by offering to their signature the oath therein prescribed. This is what is called the 'iron-clad' oath of allegiance to the United States, and to all the measures of the Administration and Congress since the beginning of the war. When a thousand of them are collected, the process, which General Banks has carried through in Louisiana, by the election ordered to take place there on the 22nd, will be applied to Florida; and the army of 10,000 men, sent into Florida, will have accomplished what Mr. Lincoln intended.

It is said from Warbylow, that the whole expedition, involving the withdrawal of the force from before Charleston, and its transfer to the Florida peninsula, was executed, under an order by Mr. Lincoln, to the commanding general in the Department, without the knowledge of the Secretary of War or the General-in-Chief at Washington. This would scarcely be credited but through the testimony of published reports of the military operations of last year, that Mr. Lincoln continually interfered, during the campaign in Virginia last year, to alter the plans of the generals in command, and order and counter-order movements of large bodies of the army without consulting them. It is therefore not unlikely that he assumed to march these troops into Florida on a campaign, for the bloodless acquisition of a State for his own political profit.

Arkansas, Louisiana, and Florida are now shaped for reconstruction—if not yet re-constructed—after the Lincoln pattern. A small minority of the population, in a small portion of these States, have qualified themselves by hard swearing, under the pressure of a military force, devoted to Mr. Lincoln, to be received into the Union as States, and counted in the presidental election.

These are bold moves towards that re-appointment of himself as President, for which his adversaries have charged that Mr. Lincoln has been steadily labouring during the past two years. The national insanity for crushing out the Southern struggle for independence, with overwhelming forces, at all costs, helped him to formidable powers, which he has used with great dexterity, and thus far with signal success, to make himself the centre of an irresistible political influence, as well as the possessor of unlimited executive authority. Congress and the people gave him all the resources of the nation in money and men, and finally surrendered to him despotic power over their own liberties. They furnished him with immense armies, which he has carefully weeded of the popular chiefs who might have opposed his will, and converted into an enormous electioneering machine devoted to his service. These armies he has employed everywhere in suppressing all discontent with the measures of his Government as disloyalty to the Union, and in identifying support of himself with the popular idea of nationality and patriotism. He has overawed elections in some places by the presence of his troops, and carried the elections in several doubtful States by squads of soldiers, detached for the purpose of voting there on the side of the Administration, while its opponents were held back or severely punished for appearing at the polls; and general orders of congratulation were issued from military head-quarters on the result of a State election as for a victory in battle. The Border States were entered by Federal troops, their election laws set aside, the polls occupied by the military, and the adversaries of the Administration driven away by military force, or by such edicts as only permitted its partisans to vote.

Two fierce popular passions concurred in the heaping of these and other enormous powers upon the President, and in sustaining him in the most despotic use of them without remonstrance. The whole North was carried away in a transport of rage and revenge into an unrelenting purpose to force back the South under their rule, and took no heed of cost or consequences. They were ready to bestow everything and excuse everything, and sacrifice everything, to attain this object. The republican party, in power for the first time, was eager to use the Government to keep down their opponents, and to make them odious by identifying them with the cause of the public enemy; a device which succeeded in seducing many into allies by these arts, and turning others into silence by their terrors.

All this went smoothly for the President's desire for re-election—because it conferred on him such powers that he might reasonably calculate upon dictating a re-nomination—if a nomination was desirable, or make himself a candidate by popular acclamation, or ensure his own election by Congress, if the conflicting claims of rival individuals should prevent a choice by the Electoral Colleges, and the election should be sent to the House of Representatives, where it must be decided by States votes as units.

The reconstructive scheme going on in the South-west is part of this Presidential policy for the election. The number of States represented in the House of Representatives, of this Congress, upon which the election of President, in the contingency of a non-election by the colleges, would devolve, is now twenty-five, including the spurious State of West Virginia, recently created, on the reception of which there would be a serious question raised, if the decision should affect the result of the election. Of these twenty-five, the political opponents of the Administration control only four, New York, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Two, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania, are equally divided, and might be expected to vote blanks. There are, therefore, nine new states in Congress, which are expected to have votes for a president of the same political party as Mr. Lincoln. I include the border state of Kentucky, because its members were chosen under the control of General Burnside's army. Several of the members are, however, discontented with Mr. Lincoln and his party, and might, perhaps, be set down as uncertain. Eighteen, therefore, is the fixed vote for a republican for President, and the whole of the eighteen will be necessary to effect an election. The full complement of States, including West Virginia, is thirty-five – that is, on the assumption that the insurrectionary States are still constitutionally in the Union, and, whether 'reconstructed' or not, are to be counted. The constitutional majority is eighteen, and that is precisely the number of the unequivocally republican states, which may, nevertheless, be divided in their presidential preferences. Mr. Lincoln is, by computation—the present computation—reasonably sure of a greater part of these. It is easily to be perceived that he can control the position, and dictate his own re-election if he succeed in increasing the number of loyal States, represented in Congress, by adding to them delegations from insurrectionary States, 'reconstructed' so as to be pledged, and oath-bound, to make their support for him sure.

Since these reconstructive schemes of Mr. Lincoln have taken so unmistaken a shape of personal politics, there is a great deal of bitterness manifested among the most devoted of the adherents of his war policy, and within a few days, the signs of a revolt within the party have become glaring. The movements of his personal followers to obtain nominations for him from State, legislative, and other bodies outside of the organisation of the party, have stimulated a large class of men, of great political influence, supported by powerful party organs, to bring forward other candidates, and to require the regular endorsement of the usual party convention, at which they hope to supersede Mr. Lincoln with a new candidate. This class of malcontents look to Mr. Chase, the Secretary of the Treasury, as their candidate, and an organisation at Washington City already prepared to advance his interests has come before the public with a circular announcing their preference of Mr. Chase to Mr. Lincoln, and their purpose to urge his name before the Convention. The friends of Mr. Chase carry on the movement in a temper of some bitterness against the efforts of the President to renominate himself, and reflect, as well on the corruptness of the Administration as on the lack of sincerity and thoroughness of the President in the final carrying out of the wholesale policy of subjugation and extermination towards the Southern people into which it is charged, that he has been reluctantly forced by the more unquestionable radicalism of which Mr. Chase is presented as the type.

The effect of the Chase circular at Washington has been to create intense political excitement. It is signed by a United States senator as chairman of the Chase organisation, and as soon as issued produced a fluency of rumours that the Cabinet of Mr. Lincoln was to be immediately dissolved by the retirement of Mr. Chase—their conflict of position as rival candidates making it impossible for them to act together in harmony. At all events it is made certain that there is a conflict; and whether it displays itself or not in the breaking up of the Cabinet immediately, it is impossible an Administration can continue together with two Presidential candidates struggling to use the various powers of the Government in opposite directions, each for his own profit.

It may be thought desirable by Mr. Lincoln to have under his own control all the immense influence of the Treasury department. Some of Mr. Chase's interested admirers might fall off from power, if he should lose his office, and with it the power to be so essentially useful as he has been to his friends. But there is another aspect of the question in which the loss of his office may be a gain. Thus far, the management of the finances of the Government, by Mr. Chase, has been, in the popular judgment, a great success. It has been received as the indispensable duty of every 'loyal' man to aid him, to exalt his administration, and to give him the glory of having carried on the greatest war of modern times, without abating seriously the prosperity of the country. Thinking men know this to be a huge imposture, and anticipate the day when the crash of credit will come, and the whole fabric of fictitious prosperity collapse with frightful ruin. It will be lucky for Mr. Chase if he shall be out of office when the catastrophe occurs, and his friends be able to charge all the calamities of the country to his withdrawal from the Treasury department. This most 'thinking people,' as Cobbett used sarcastically to call the English, when they were running a similar race of fictitious prosperity under Bank suspensions, will be made to believe that Mr. Chase could have carried them on his shoulders, safe to land through the sea of greenbacks.

The National Republican Committee appointed by the Chicago Convention of 1860, re-assembled at Washington on Monday, and fixed upon the 7th of June for the holding of a Republican National Convention, at Baltimore, for the nomination of candidates for President and Vice-President. This is thought to be the beginning of a series of efforts to check and defeat the re-nomination of Mr. Lincoln. The most significant action bearing on that subject was the adoption of a resolution by which the delegates are to be allowed seats, except from States represented, in the present Congress. This shuts out the delegations which were to be sent from the 'reconstructed' States, Louisiana, Florida, Arkansas, until that subject is definitively determined by the action of Congress on the credentials presented; and it is inferred that the mere admission of representatives will not be sufficient without a formal recognition of the new status by both Houses of Congress. The Lincoln programme of spurious representation in the Convention is, therefore, in all probability suspended until after the nomination is made in June.

I give you the outlines of the position of this Presidential question as it stands now, on the side of the party in power, which thinks itself strong enough to divide and contend afterwards, one franchise with the other, for the mastery of the Government, without much apprehension that its divisions will let in the opposite party. I am not sure that they are not entirely right in that estimate. The Democratic party is utterly demoralised. There is nothing of vitality left in it by which it could be galvanised into life, for a spirited and successful campaign. Its only hope for power is in the nomination of General M'Clellan on the war platform, with the propitiation of the most rampant republicanism, by conceding that which the administration has done—unconstitutional and wrong against the social order, prosperity, and property of the South, as an accomplished fact; and that the mission of Conservatism is to rest upon that basis, and build up a new Union by force on a foundation which is laid in the ruins of the Constitution, and cemented by the unatoned blood and sacrifices of seven or eight millions of an oppressed nationality.

The revolt against Lincoln is a revolt against the suspicion of moderation. It is shocking evidence of the ferocious temper which this war has engendered among the people of the North, that there should be radicalism so bloody and exterminating, that the policy of Mr. Lincoln shall be held up in contrast by them to the rebuke of the people as too mild and merciful for the demands of the crisis.

It would not surprise me, if the conflict gets doubtful, to find Mr. Chase giving way, always for the good of the cause, on assurances that his policy will be vigorously adopted, and with such assurances for the future as will secure him any position to which he may aspire. When the feeble breath of an old man of eighty-five years goes out, Mr. Chase may be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

Wednesday Evening, March 10.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Since the 4th of the month, the Money Market has been in a very quiet state. The pressure then experienced from the payments of the 3rd and 4th falling so closely together, for the moment occasioned a strain that was little expected. It was, nevertheless, felt that it would not be continuous, and therefore the change to comparative ease has not produced surprise. Every now and then a temporary fright is created by a large withdrawal for Brazil or Egypt to meet cotton indebtedness. Still, as the influx of gold from America and Australia is making steady progress, it is not probable the Bank Directors will immediately move upwards. So far as can be perceived, there will be about an average level in the value of money for the next few weeks; and though it is believed in some quarters we may once more touch 5 per cent., this view is not generally entertained by those who watch the strides making in the export trade of the country. It is satisfactory to know that the latest Indian and Chinese exchanges manifest steadiness, and that nearly 200,000*l*. in gold is en route for London and Liverpool. While the demand for silver will thus be kept under, we shall have also additional supplies of the metal to assist in the material development of business. The Bank minimum continuing 6 per cent., the Lombard Street houses are charging $5\frac{1}{4}$ and $5\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Any symptoms of stringency are not likely to present themselves, unless the mania for new companies should expand. The little success that has attended recent introductions, save in exceptional instances, will not warrant any great further movement in the same direction. On the Stock Exchange the supply of capital has become so abundant that the terms for short loans do not exceed 4 to $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

Although the bullion operations this week do not present quite so favourable an aspect as for some time past, still there is nothing to cause any uneasiness. The amount of gold sent into the Bank, including 30,000*l*. this afternoon, has been 285,000*l*.; but, on the other hand, there have been withdrawals to the extent of 411,000*l*., of which 95,000*l*. was in sovereigns for Alexandria, and 316,000*l*. for the Brazils. The arrivals of specie have also been rather limited, being only 87,184*l*.; of which 64,300*l*. was from New York, 5,020*l*. from the Brazils, and 18,164*l*. from Geelong. The Ripon steamer took out 242,198*l*., of which 27,643*l*. was in gold and 211,555*l*. in silver. For Alexandria the amount was 20,300*l*.; Point de Galle, 25,250*l*.; India, 83,298*l*.; and China and the Straits, 113,350*l*. The Magdalena steamer will take out to the Brazils 324,000*l*. in gold, and 20,000*l*. in silver. The silver market has been rather more animated, in consequence of the demand for the East; but bar silver being rather scarce, owing to the absence of important remittances by the last mail, the price has remained very firm at $61\frac{1}{2}$d. per oz. Mexican dollars have also been more enquired after, but there having been only a short supply on hand they realised $64\frac{1}{4}$d., an advance of $1\frac{1}{4}$d. per oz. compared with the previous official price. There have, however, been some sales at intermediate rates.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Business in the English Funded Securities has not been particularly active; the same causes which have for some weeks past prevented active operations on the part of the dealers still continue to exercise an adverse influence; and till something definite is decided with regard to the Danish war, much improvement cannot be expected. Although prices close the same to-day as on Wednesday last, still the tendency is towards increased depression. The last prices for Consols were 91 to $91\frac{1}{8}$ for money, and $91\frac{1}{4}$ to $91\frac{3}{8}$ for the account. Exchequer Bills remain unaltered at 5s. dis. to par. In the Foreign Stock Market a fair amount of business has been transacted, but chiefly of a speculative character in some of the leading descriptions; but with the exception of Mexican, which exhibit an advance of $1\frac{1}{8}$ per cent., there has been no material alteration. Greek have declined $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent., and Spanish from $\frac{1}{4}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$; but Turkish have recovered about $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The last quotations this evening were—Greek, $22\frac{1}{4}$ to $22\frac{3}{4}$; Mexican, $43\frac{3}{8}$ to $43\frac{5}{8}$; Spanish Passims, $34\frac{3}{4}$ to 35; ditto Certificates, $13\frac{1}{2}$ to $13\frac{3}{4}$; Turkish Six per Cents. (1854), 91 to 92; and ditto (1862), $68\frac{3}{4}$ to $69\frac{1}{4}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

There has been little doing in this stock during market an advance of 1 or 2 per cent. succeeded by a reaction to 43 and 45, at which the quotation stands to-day, represents the only noticeable change.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

Although the amount of business transacted in American Government and railway securities has not been so extensive as last week, still the transactions have been tolerably numerous, and prices for the most part continue well supported. The following dealings have been officially recorded:—United States Six per Cents., at $65\frac{1}{4}$; ditto ditto Five per Cents., 60; Virginia State Six per Cents., 33; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, 78, 80, 79, and $79\frac{1}{4}$; ditto ditto, Pennsylvania ditto, 81, $81\frac{1}{4}$, $81\frac{3}{4}$, 81, and $82\frac{1}{2}$; Erie Shares, $100, all paid, $67\frac{1}{2}$ and 67; Ditto Seven per Cent. Preference, 60; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 17, 16, and $16\frac{1}{4}$ dis.; ditto, ditto, all paid, 74, $73\frac{1}{2}$, $73\frac{3}{4}$, and 73; Marietta and Cincinnati Railway, 72; Pennsylvania Railway, second mortgage, 87 and $87\frac{1}{2}$.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

A moderately active business has been transacted in British Railway securities, but nothing like a pressure of business has been exhibited. In the present unsettled state of affairs there appears but little anxiety to increase operations, and under these circumstances prices generally exhibit a retrograde tendency. As compared with last week there has been a fall of between 2 and 3 per cent. in Brightons; of 1 per cent. in Great Eastern, Great Northern, London and Blackwall, Chatham and Dover, London and North-Western, Metropolitan, and South-Eastern; of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Western; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in North-Eastern (Berwick), and do. (York); and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Caledonian, Edinburgh and Glasgow, Lancashire and Yorkshire, Sheffield, North British, North-Eastern (Leeds), and North Staffordshire. On the other hand, an improvement of 1 per cent. has to be noticed in North London and South Devon. In foreign railway shares there has been still less doing, at a proportionate reduction in prices. For shares in British Possessions there has again been rather more enquiry; business has shown more briskness, and prices continue to be fairly sustained.

MEETINGS OF PUBLIC COMPANIES.

At an extraordinary general meeting of the Intercolonial Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, resolutions were passed, in accordance with the directors' report, for the creation of 37,500 new shares of 10*l*. each, representing the nominal sum of 375,000*l*. At the same time it was determined to alter the name of the Company to the Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Company.—At the half-yearly meeting of the shareholders of the Submarine Telegraph Company, the report was adopted unanimously, and a dividend at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum less income tax was declared. The earnings for the half-year ending December 31 showed an increase of 100*l*. a week as compared with the corresponding period of the former year. At an extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Australian Mortgage, Land, and Finance Company, a resolution was passed altering the 22nd clause of the Articles of Association, so as to authorise the directors to issue bonds, debentures, or obligations of the Company, as soon as a sum equal to 3*l*. per share of the subscribed capital of the Company has been paid up.—At the annual general meeting of the proprietors of the Commercial Union Assurance Company, Mr. Henry Trower in the Chair, a very favourable report was presented and adopted, and a dividend at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum free of income tax declared.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

New joint-stock undertakings continue to be brought forward in rapid succession, and this week they have if anything been more numerous than usual, though the majority of them are not of great magnitude. Perhaps the most important is that of the Albion Bank (Limited), for which a capital of 1,000,000*l*. is proposed to be raised in 20,000 shares of 50*l*. each, but of which only 10,000 shares are to be issued in the first instance. The special object of the undertaking is the accommodation of the business of the agricultural and cotton markets of the metropolis. There is to be an office in the City, as well as at the Metropolitan Meat Market in Smithfield and the Metropolitan Cattle Market, and it is intended subsequently to extend the operations to the provinces. One of the old established private Banks, more particularly connected with this description of business, is to be absorbed by the new company, and the active partner in the business will join the board.—The directors of the Panama, New Zealand, and Australian Royal Mail Company's (late the Intercolonial Royal Mail) having been authorised to increase their capital, invite applications for 375,000*l*., in 37,500 shares of 10*l*. each. The object is to enable the company to perform the contract recently entered into with the Government of New Zealand for a monthly mail service between Sydney, New Zealand, and Panama, in correspondence with the Royal Mail Company's steamers between Southampton and Aspinwall. The route thus opened will bring New Zealand 2,000 miles nearer to England, than by the present Overland Route, and 4,000 miles nearer than by the Cape. The nominal capital of the company will, in the aggregate, be 562,500*l*., of which 412,500*l*. will be paid up. It is not anticipated that calls beyond 7*l*. per share will be requisite. The London and Liverpool Hotel Company (Limited) is another new undertaking, for which a capital of 120,000*l*. is sought in 6,000 shares of 20*l* each. The object of the promoters is the purchase of the land, goodwill, &c., of the Washington Hotel, a large establishment recently erected in Lime Street, Livepool, and fitted up on the model of the great American and Continental hotels. Extensive ice-wells (now filled) under the hotel, and of which there are no others in Liverpool, are included in the purchase, and from that source alone, the directors anticipate that a dividend of at least five per cent. on the capital will be realised.—The Liverpool Adelphi Hotel Company is also announced, the object being the purchase of the well-known Adelphi Hotel in Liverpool, which is to be sold in consequence of the death of the late proprietor and to enlarge it by additional buildings, for which there is ample room. A considerable portion of the purchase money is to be paid in the Company's shares, and, as the business is still going on, as soon as the purchase is completed profits will accrue. The proposed capital is £100,000, in 10,000 shares of £10 each. Another prospectus is that of the Bristol Indigo Blue and Black Lead Company, for which a capital of 50,000*l*., is sought to be raised in 5,000 shares of 10*l*. each. The Company proposes to take an old established business, in this line, in Milk Street, Bristol. The premises are extensive and completely fitted with steam machinery, and the connection is large, consisting of 2,200 customers in all parts of England, Ireland, and Scotland.—Another prospectus just issued is that of the Kentish Royal Hotel Company (Limited), Tunbridge Wells. The object is to purchase the lease, goodwill, furniture, and fittings of the Great Kentish Royal Hotel, and it is proposed to re-construct the building on a scale commensurate with the prevailing tastes and growing wants of the community. The hotel is within two minutes walk of the chalybeate springs, and only four from the railway terminus. The capital to be raised is 50,000*l.* in 5,000 shares of 10*l.* each; deposits on application 10*s.* per share, and 30*s.* on allotment.—The General Credit and Finance Company of London, and the London Financial Association, have this afternoon issued a prospectus inviting subscriptions for the capital of the Central Argentine Railway Company (Limited). The projected railway which will be about 247 miles in length is to connect Rosario and Cordova, two of the most important cities in the Argentine Republic, commencing at the city and port of Rosario, it will pass through the provinces of Santa Fé and Cordova, and about midway will form a junction with the high roads penetrating the southern and western provinces, thus opening up a vast country now very deficient in means of transit. The railway will be under special concession from the Argentine Government, with a Government guarantee of 7 per cent. per annum for 40 years. A grant of land adjoining the railway, and interest at 7 per cent. on deposit and calls from date of payment. The capital fixed by the concession is 1,600,000*l.*, of which it is now proposed to raise 1,000,000*l.*, in 50,000 shares, of 20*l.* each, and 600,000*l.* hereafter, as may be found necessary. The deposit required will be 1*l.* on application, and 1*l.* 10*s.* on allotment.—Another prospectus issued to-day is that of the Umzinto Plantation and Trading Company of Natal (Limited), with a capital of 125,000*l.*, in 5,000 shares, of 25*l.* each, with power to increase; but it is not intended to call up more than 12*l.* per share. The Company is formed for the purpose of working to their fullest extent the valuable Umzinto Sugar Plantation Estates in Natal, and to extend the operations of the existing Colonial Company, a preliminary arrangement for the purchase of which has been entered into.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSIONS.

The suspension has been announced of Messrs. Bakewell, Southey and Co., commission merchants. Their liabilities are not at present known, but they are not anticipated to be large. The stoppage is also announced of Messrs. E. Yeoman and Son, in the gun and general export trade. The firm, it is believed, have been connected with transactions for running the blockade, from which they have sustained heavy losses.—Letters from Amsterdam announce the suspension of Messrs. G. and H. Deckker, in the seed trade, with debts and liabilities amounting to about 40,000*l.*

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

Transactions in produce have during the last few days been upon a diminished scale. Several arrivals having taken place, buyers are induced to reserve the execution of their orders to some extent, that they may secure the advantage of choice which the fresh supplies will afford so soon as they become available. Meantime the quantity of produce offering on the market is small, and prices are consequently firm, notwithstanding the abatement in the demand. Cotton, however, forms an exception to the general firmness, and, with good arrivals and small sales, quotations have receded ½*d.* per lb. American butters meet a fair demand, being relatively cheap, and 84*s.* to 106*s.*, according to quality, are still the quotations. Other foreign butters are declining, but are still high. American bacon sells slowly. In barrel middles there is nothing doing. A moderate business is pressing in cheese, at 56*s.* to 60*s.* for the better kinds of New York imports. Petroleum, after being dull all the week at 1*s.* 10*d.*, is to-day rather more saleable at 1*s.* 10½*d.* and 1*s.* 11*d.* per gallon for American refined. French turpentine has risen to 77*s.* per cwt., prices having come higher from ports of shipment. Rosin is firm, with a fair enquiry. Linseed oil has further advanced to 36*s.*, the market closing buyers at that price to-day. Rape oil has been sold largely for arrival at 41*s.* for brown and 43*s.* for pale; but purchases may now be made about 6*d.* under these rates. Cocoa-nut has declined 1*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. since this day week. The tallow market, affected partly by political affairs on the Continent and partly by the state of the speculative account, is firmer at an advance of 6*d.* to 9*d.* per cwt. Russian hemp is dull, but Manilla sells freely, good roping at 36*l.* to 36*l.* 10*s.* per ton. Jute is not materially altered. The activity in the sugar market has subsided, but the firmness of prices is retained. Coffee, with diminished stocks, has risen 1*s.* per cwt. for Ceylon kinds. The corn trade remains as dull as it very well can be, but sales are not pressed, and quotations of foreign are without any perceptible depression. The metal trade has been extremely dull. Scotch pig iron has receded to 2*l.* 16*s.* 6*d.* per ton, cash; spelter to 22*l.* 5*s.* on the spot; and English copper was to-day reduced 5*l.* per ton, making common cake 103*l.*, and best select 106*l.* per ton. Lead continues very firm. In drugs and dyes the advance recently noticed is well maintained. The colonial wool sales are progressing at firm rates for all descriptions, except Cape wools, which are depressed 1*d.* per lb. Scarcely anything is doing for America, and less than an average for the Continent of Europe.

LIVERPOOL, March 9.—Our cotton market still continues rather dull; nevertheless, there has been a fair demand, but prices have a downward tendency, as holders appear more disposed to realise. In American, particularly the lower descriptions, and Brazil, the decline has been about ¼*d.* per lb. Egyptian have been very irregular, and are down about ½*d.* Surats have been more depressed than any other descriptions, and for the inferior qualities the decline is from ½*d.* to 1*d.* per lb.; of the better kinds, however, there has been a great scarcity, and the fall in them cannot be quoted at more than ¼*d.* The sales this week have been 24,500 bales, of which 6,500 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year, down to the present time, have been 318,800 bales, against 280,600 bales to the corresponding period in 1863. There have been imported this year 235,994 bales, and to the same time last year 201,733 bales. The exports this year have been 53,229 bales, and the same period in 1863, 47,763 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 222,500 bales; last year it was 137,900 bales. 45,800 bales have been taken on speculation this year, against 86,490 bales in 1863. The computed stocks at the present time are 241,430 bales, whilst at the same period last year they were 408,520 bales. Advices from Bombay to the 13th February give the export of cotton for Liverpool for the fortnight ending that date, as—the Latona, with 4,534 bales; the Nile, 3,031 bales; City of Delhi, 3,576 bales; Coromandel, 2,927 bales; the Sardinia, 4,248 bales; the Iduna, 2,486 bales; Neptune's Car, 3,460 bales; and the Mercia, with 2,466 bales. The total export for the fortnight had been 27,845 bales; and since the 1st January, 95,424 bales, against 89,223 bales in the corresponding period of 1863. The closing quotations this evening were American descriptions, 24*d.* to 27½*d.*; Pernambuco, 26½*d.* to 26½*d.*; Maranhams, 26½*d.* to 27½*d.*; Bahia, 26*d.*; Egyptian, 25*d.* to 31*d.*; and Surats, 12*d.* to 24½*d.*

MANCHESTER, March 9.—All the Manchester markets have been very flat, and prices consequently depressed. Business in shipping yarns has been almost entirely suspended, it being impossible for spinners to effect sales without even a greater reduction than was demanded last week, and the market closes flat, with a tendency to a still further reduction. Home-trade yarns have been in but little demand; prices are again lower by fully ½*d.* per lb., but even this reduction has failed to induce business. There is no improvement whatever in the state of the cloth market; buyers appear to have no confidence in the present state of affairs, and refuse to give even the smallest orders. The little business that has been transacted has only been at a further retrogression in prices from last week. There are numerous buyers in the market, but they cannot be tempted to operate at any reasonable concession. The prices of cloths are fractionally lower, but not quite to the same extent as the prices of yarn; but that is to be attributed mainly to the fact that, stocks of cloth being light, manufacturers do not press their goods so much upon the market. The chief cause assigned for this flatness is the unsatisfactory state of continental politics. The large quantity of cotton known to have been shipped from India, China, and Japan, and now at sea—altogether 567,000 bales—is also doubtless having a material effect on these markets.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

TWO Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General Jackson, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. Foley, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for 1,000*l.*, while 500*l.* may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for 1,500*l.* a complete Statue of 'Stonewall' Jackson, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for 'General Jackson's Statue,' at Messrs. Coutts & Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £4,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by Henry Hotze, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. Brewer, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and Daniel Hubbard, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

AMERICA.

THE details of the Federal disaster in Florida fully account for the anxiety of the Government to suppress the news. The expedition was undertaken solely for electioneering purposes, and it was not unreasonably assumed that the Confederates would offer very little resistance to a movement that could not exercise any influence on the issue of the war. It was supposed that President Lincoln's private secretary, Mr. John Hay, would be able to announce a bloodless conquest, and to fulfil his mission of 'reconstruction.' That the Confederates have spoiled the game and defeated the Yankee army is as encouraging to the South as it must be discouraging to the North.

When the Federals landed, the first business of the General was to telegraph the complete success of the enterprise to Washington. Next it transpired that the success had been perfect, but unimportant; and the opponents of the Government calculated how many dollars Mr. Lincoln's election campaign in Florida had cost the country. A day or two elapsed, and there was a rumour that the Federal army had met with a slight reverse or a momentary check, and that Mr. Lincoln's election campaign in Florida had cost a little blood, as well as a large sum of money. At length the slight reverse developed into a complete and bloody defeat. The estimates of the numbers killed and wounded differ; but the lists of killed and wounded, as far as known, fill three closely printed columns of the New York papers. Our impression is, that the Yankee estimate of 1,200 killed and wounded is very far below the mark.

On January 31, General Gilmore promulgated a General Order in which he offered pardon and an amnesty to the people of Florida in the name of President Lincoln, and informed them that Mr. John Hay was ready to administer to them the oath of allegiance. On February 17, General T. Seymour, who had charge of the army, issued a General Order, 'heartily congratulating his command on the success which had attended all their movements thus far into Florida,' and telling his men that 'their deeds will be among those remembered by us with the greatest pleasure and honour.' In this spirit of arrogance the Federal army advanced, and on February 20 encountered a Confederate force at Olustee, a place between Jacksonville and Tallahassee. Never was a surprise more complete and disastrous. Suddenly the invaders, who were unprepared for any resistance, found themselves under a heavy artillery fire, which, according to one account, was so destructive that more than one regiment was immediately broken. The fight, it appears, was continued for about two or three hours, but every attempt to penetrate the Confederate position was repulsed with heavy slaughter. Finally the Federal army retired, leaving all its dead and many of its wounded on the field of battle. The victors captured a number of prisoners and several pieces of artillery.

Such is the information that we gather from Northern newspapers about what they call 'the Battle of Olustee.' We must wait for Southern accounts to get a reliable and perfect history of the engagement. At present we do not know the strength of the Confederate army, which, it appears, was under the command of General Finnegan. But whether the Yankee army was beaten by the secret and rapid concentration of a superior force, or whether it was beaten by surprise and the skilful organisation of an inferior force, is comparatively unimportant. Whatever the immediate cause, it is to the Confederates a brilliant success, and to the Federals a severe defeat.

GENERAL GILMORE ordered General Seymour to be arrested as soon as he heard of the defeat at Olustee. He charges him with not taking proper precautions, and with falling into a trap. May not General Seymour plead that his over-confidence was inspired by the conduct of his superior officer? Did not General Gilmore, twenty days before the disaster—that is, on January 31—publish an order in which he treated Florida as a conquered province in Federal possession?

AN incident in connection with this Federal defeat is published in the New York Tribune, which, if we were not acquainted with the inhumanity of Federal officers, we should deem almost incredible. When the Cosmopolitan arrived at Beaufort with a cargo of 240 wounded men, a ball was going on. Generals Gilmore and Saxon, who were present, immediately left the festive scene and went to the boat, and then heard for the first time of the defeat of the army; the only intimation of a reverse prior to this was a telegram from Hilton Head stating that some wounded men were on their way. General Saxon returned to the ball-room, informed the guests of the catastrophe, and ordered the lights to be put out. We will give the rest of the narrative in the words of the New York Tribune:—'A second time he had to give the command before it was obeyed. A surgeon present made a little speech, setting forth the superfluity of the mandate, inasmuch as the wounded men were not to be removed until the following morning. About half a dozen doctors were at the ball. A telegram had been sent from Hilton Head to Beaufort, an hour and a half before the boat arrived, to prepare the hospitals for the sufferers on the Cosmopolitan, and to have ambulances in readiness on the dock. Nevertheless, no transportation was at hand to take away the wounded for three-quarters of an hour after the boat arrived. And the poor fellows were not removed until morning, sure enough.'

THE Providence Journal publishes a letter from Lieutenant Eddy, of the 3rd Rhode Island Battery, giving some account of the battle of Olustee, at which he was wounded. Lieutenant Eddy writes: 'It was our misfortune to have for supports a negro regiment, who, by running, caused us to lose our pieces.'

THE news of the invasion roused the people of Florida to offer a determined resistance to the enemy. The Floridian, published at Tallahassee, thus stimulated the spirit of resistance:—'We tell the people of Florida to be of good cheer. Don't give way to despondency. Don't lend a too credulous ear to false or exaggerated rumours. Rally to the defence of your country. Prepare to act a sublime, an heroic part, in this war. Every man should have his arms and equipments in readiness for immediate use. If a Yankee army ever penetrated into the forests and swamps of Florida, it would be a shame if it were allowed to escape; nor will it if our generals and people do their duty.' It is not improbable that the main body of the Confederate army which defeated the Yankees consisted of newly-enlisted volunteers.

To the long list of Federal failures we suppose we may now add General Sherman's projected attack on Mobile. For the last week the accounts have been unusually confused and conflicting, and all that could be gathered from them was that the Confederates were offering a staunch resistance to the invader at every available point. A cavalry expedition, which set out from Memphis at the beginning of the last month to co-operate with Sherman, has been beaten in several small engagements, and driven back to the place from which it started, [illegible] a large number of prisoners and [illegible], being constantly harassed by the Confederate army under General Polk, and his own [illegible] by Confederate cavalry, has, it appears, [illegible] as he could, and is reported to have [illegible] Vicksburg. About Admiral Farragut [illegible], except that he [illegible] Mobile, on the 23rd [illegible]. The [illegible] Federal fleet was repulsed, which may be true, though denied in Washington. At all events, Mobile appears in no danger of an attack. Nothing is allowed to transpire as to the losses sustained by Sherman, which must doubtless have been considerable.

THE Federal Government gives out that the expedition against Mobile was a mere feint made for the purpose of inducing General Johnston to divide his army. If so, they have learnt that Southern cities can be strongly defended without weakening the principal Confederate armies. But we do not credit this excuse. We believe that the Confederate authorities were justified in treating it as a real demonstration, and by so doing frustrated the scheme. The plan of Sherman was to cut the railways leading to Mobile, and so isolate the city, and prevent its garrison being reinforced. Sherman found himself checkmated by the activity of the Confederates, who threatened to cut off his communications and to place him between the force at Mobile and General Polk's force. It is remarkable that the North continues to regard the caution of the South as a proof of weakness. When it was notified that Mobile was making ready for the assault, and that non-combatants were ordered to leave the city, there was a chorus of triumph raised by the Federal press. The South never underrates the power of her foe—the North always does so. The South often prepares for encounters that never take place—the North is constantly rejoicing over victories that are never achieved. The Southern policy is not only the more dignified, but also the more secure.

THE Northern public has been treated to another 'On to Richmond.' General Meade crossed the Rapidan on the 27th ult., and, having advanced his forces a few miles, marched them back again to their old encampment. According to the official story circulated in Washington, the object of this movement was to cover an attempt of the Federal cavalry under General Kilpatrick to reach Richmond and rescue the Federal prisoners. We should think that even Mr. Lincoln's loyal subjects can hardly give credit to such nonsense. But, whatever the motive, we know the results of the expedition. General Custer, who was to make a diversion in favour of Kilpatrick, was roughly handled at Charlotteville, and had to flee in hot haste to escape capture. Kilpatrick, finding 'Richmond a hard road to travel,' returned to Butler's lines, having, according to his own account, 'destroyed a portion of the Virginia Central Railroad, and lost three colonels and 150 men killed and missing.' It will be strange indeed if, when a true version of the affair is published, it does not appear that the portion of the railway damaged was exceedingly small, and that the Federal loss was much larger than 'three colonels and 150 men killed and missing.'

BESIDES the disaster in Florida, the retreat of Sherman, and the failure of the last 'On to Richmond,' the Federals have met with other mishaps. It was stated that General Johnston had been successfully attacked at Dalton, but it is now admitted by the Federals that we must read unsuccessfully for successfully. General Grant despatched a division of his army under General Thomas to Dalton, and after three days' skirmishing the Federal force retired to Tunnel Hill, and confess to a loss of 1,000 in killed and wounded.

On the 22nd ult., the Confederates surprised and captured a battalion of Federal cavalry near Cumberland Gap. We can understand that in Federal circles 'it begins to be admitted that the spring campaign, both in Virginia and the South-West, has been an utter failure.'

Besides the usual intelligence from Charleston of so many shots being fired into or at the city, we have intelligence of the sinking of the Federal screw sloop Housatonic, by the agency of the Confederate torpedo-vessel Davis, on the 18th ultimo. The Housatonic was a new vessel launched in November 1862, and, besides six broadside guns, carried two pivot guns, one an eleven-inch and the other a 100-pounder rifle. The torpedo struck her under the starboard quarter, lifted her two feet, and she sank in less than eight minutes. It is said that one of her officers and some of her crew were drowned, the rest saving themselves by clinging to the rigging until taken off by boats.

For a political purpose—that is, to conciliate the Germans—General Sigel has been appointed to supersede General Kelley in Western Virginia. The change has caused much dissatisfaction. How unreasonable to object to Mr. Lincoln taking necessary measures to secure his re-election!

The Richmond Examiner of February 17 has an editorial on the Tax Law, of which the leading features are an ad valorem tax on all property, a tax of 5 per cent. on incomes, and a tax of 10 per cent. on the profits of trade and speculation. To illustrate 'the cogency of the measures just enacted,' the Examiner gives the following approximate estimate of the results of this taxation :—

,, income and profits . .	100,000,000
,, tax on currency . . .	250,000,000

This is independent of the revenue derived from the Tax Law of 1863, under which a large amount has been collected. The Confederates are not afraid to face their financial difficulties, and to submit to a sharp and trying remedy.

The Address of the Confederate Congress to the people of the Confederate States commences by showing what is the real as distinguished from the pretended object of the Northern Government. There was a general and sincere attachment to the Union, and therefore the Federal President resorted to the pretext of restoring the Union, in order to obtain soldiers to commence and carry on the war. But it is absurd to suppose that the Government desires to restore the Union when it violates every provision of the Constitution, and conducts the war not 'as betwixt two military and political organisations,' but as 'against a whole population.' The atrocities of the Federals 'are too incredible for narration.' The track of the enemy has been marked by cruelty and rapine. 'Houses are pillaged and burned; churches are defaced; towns are ransacked; clothing of women and children is stripped from their persons, jewellery and mementoes of the dead are stolen; mills and implements of agriculture are destroyed; private salt works are broken up; the introduction of medicines is forbidden; means of subsistence are wantonly wasted to produce beggary; prisoners are returned with contagious diseases; and the last morsel of food has been taken from families, who were not allowed to carry on a trade or branch of industry. The cartel for exchange of prisoners has been suspended, and our unfortunate soldiers subjected to the grossest indignities. The wounded at Gettysburg were deprived of their nurses, and inhumanly left to perish on the field. Helpless women have been exposed to the most cruel outrages, and to that dishonour which is infinitely worse than death. Citizens have been murdered by the Butlers and McNeils and Milroys, who are the favourite generals of our enemies. Refined and delicate ladies have been seized, bound with cords, imprisoned, guarded by negroes, and held as hostages for the return of recaptured slaves. Unoffending non-combatants have been banished or dragged from their quiet homes to be immured in filthy gaols. Liberty to preach the Gospel has been refused except on condition of taking the oath of allegiance.' The Address comments on the emancipation proclamation, which, according to Northern authorities and the law of nations, is not a lawful act of war. One of the reasons assigned by Pennsylvania for separating from the mother-country was, that the 'King had incited the negroes to revolt.' Lawrence, in his notes on Wheaton, says: 'The policy adopted by Dunmore, of arming the slaves against their masters, was not pursued during the war of the Revolution; and when negroes were taken by the English, they were not considered otherwise than as property and plunder.' Napoleon I., in his war with Russia, refused to proclaim the emancipation of the serfs. He said: 'I could have armed against her a part of her population by proclaiming the liberty of the serfs. A great number of villages asked it of me, but I refused to avail myself of a measure which would have devoted to death thousands of families!' In discussing the peace of 1814, the United States maintained the principle that the emancipation of the enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate warfare. In 1820 John Quincy Adams wrote, as Secretary of State, to Mr. Middleton at St. Petersburg: 'The British have broadly asserted the right of emancipating slaves (private property) as a legitimate right of war. No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners in cold blood and without special cause, might as well be pretended to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons to assassinate.'

The Address declares that it is inexpedient for the South to make any further overtures for peace. It says: 'Until some evidence is given of a change of policy on the part of the Government, and some assurance is received that efforts at negotiation will not be spurned, the Congress are of opinion that any direct overtures for peace would compromise our self-respect, be fruitless of good, and be interpreted by the enemy as an indication of weakness. We can only repeat the desire of the people for peace and our readiness to accept terms consistent with the honour, and integrity, and independence of the States, and compatible with the safety of our domestic institutions.'

In conclusion, the Address takes a hopeful but not boastful view of the state of affairs, and calls upon the people to aid the Government by all the means in their power, so that, by 'an all-comprehending and self-sacrificing patriotism, and by the blessing of God,' they may achieve for themselves and their children 'peace and freedom.'

The escape of Federal captives from Richmond has determined the Confederate Government to remove about 6,000 of their prisoners to Georgia, whither they are being sent at the rate of 800 a week. It may seem extraordinary that so many should have been kept at Richmond, seeing that food was comparatively scarce at the capital, and that it was more difficult to insure their safe custody so near the lines; but the explanation is easy. The Confederate Government were bent on carrying out the cartel of exchange, and therefore held their prisoners at a convenient depot.

Up to February 16, forty-eight of the runaways had been returned to the Libby. The Richmond Enquirer of February 12 thus describes a capture by a negro :—

One of the captures on Wednesday was made by 'an American citizen of African descent.' The dusky captor was engaged in a matutinal 'dig' in his potato patch, when he observed the fugitive officer streaking it across the field. Seeing that he wore suspiciously blue garments, the darky hailed him and asked him where he was 'gwine.' Something to the effect of 'nowhere' being the reply, the darky, with courage and patriotism worthy of immortality, brought his hoe to a 'charge,' and responded, 'Yes, you is, dough – you done broke out o' one o' dem prisons—come along—you got to go wid me.' He marched him to the house, handed him over to his master, and returned to his potato patch covered with glory. The Yankee arrived, under due guard, yesterday morning.

The Report of Dr. John Wilkins, the medical officer of the Libby, completely refutes the mendacious stories circulated in the North about the sufferings and mortality of the prisoners. From Feb. 1, 1863, to Jan. 22, 1864, 1,060 Yankee officers were admitted. The number on the sick list during that period was 310, and the total number of deaths was 13.

Before the Confederate Congress adjourned, it resolved: 'That the Congress of the Confederate States of America for its next regular session shall assemble the first Monday in May, Anno Domini 1864, and not the first Monday in December 1864.'

The Tennessee troops, under General Joseph E. Johnston, before their term of service expired, voluntarily re-enlisted for the term of the war, and received the thanks of Congress for their patriotic alacrity. The ardour of the Tennessee soldiers is not singular, and the Richmond Examiner, a paper not given to premature rejoicing, observes: 'The army has cheered the popular heart, put backsliders to shame, and opened a new chapter in the history of the war. Well may the Northern President proclaim another draft, for it is more than probable that the South will be stronger in the campaign of 1864 than it has been in any previous year of the war.'

There is no thirst so insatiable as the thirst for blood. Anticipating the surrender by the British authorities of the Confederates charged with joining in the affair of the Chesapeake, the New York Commercial Advertiser, whilst waiting for the trial, declares the men guilty, and clamours for their execution. It says the plea of the prisoners 'was held to be worthless in the St. John Court, and so it must be in our Courts! . . . . If the Government, knowing precisely what the course of events will be, can make up its mind to do its duty fearlessly and regardless of consequences, then let it accept the pirates of the Chesapeake, try, convict, sentence, and execute them.' The Commercial Advertiser, we are ashamed to say, has found a sympathiser in a British police magistrate. This is a question of life and death, and we beg to direct the special attention of our readers to the following.

The police magistrate (a Mr. Gilbert) at St. John, New Brunswick, has decided that the capture of the Chesapeake by the Confederates was an act of piracy, and that the law authorises him to commit the prisoners to gaol until they are handed over to the United States authorities. We are not surprised that this Mr. Gilbert should be ignorant of the law of nations, or that he should follow the example of Judge Stewart of the Vice-Admiralty Court, and decide the case upon ex parte evidence—or, rather, against the weight of evidence—but we are astonished that any person should violate the decencies of civilisation, as this Mr. Gilbert did in delivering his judgment. Surely he might have been satisfied with committing the three Confederates before him—Messrs. David Collins, James McKinney, and Lewis Seely—to the vengeance of their cruel and relentless enemy. This did not satisfy Mr. Gilbert, but, 'dressed in a little brief authority,' and sitting securely on the bench, he abused his prisoners as 'cowards and villains.' We submit that it was neither brave nor just to so brand men who were about to be remitted for trial in the United States. The St. John (N.B.) Morning Telegraph of February 27 thus comments on the decision :—

Interrogating the magistrate on those matters which lie outside his juri-diction, we ask him how he dared in the face of Heaven order these men to be sent to the States branded by himself as 'cowards' and 'villains?' He has decided that they shall be tried before their enemy's tribunals, but to the evidence collected against them by paid agents he has added that of his own, not, indeed, the evidence of Mr. Humphrey Gilbert himself, for that might not weigh heavily upon their innocence, but the testimony of a British Magistrate, a title everywhere respected abroad, if not always adorned by private virtues in its wearer. Yet, if Collins and McKinney, both respectable men, are finally sent for trial before an American Court, under what circumstances will their defence be conducted? Why, when the counsel rises to address the Court, will he not be met in the teeth with the declaration that the police magistrate of the city of St. John, a British subject like themselves, had not only declared them guilty of mistaking the value of those commissions in the Confederate service which they held, but of his own motion, and after weeks of thought and deliberation, had with much feeling pronounced them outlaws in the sight of God and man! What answer could be made to such an argument? What chance for life under such merciless logic? Yet this is the position in which the magistrate would place these men. Their argument is that they were regularly commissioned officers and men in the Confederate service; that they intended to do nothing that was not agreeable to the laws of war. Mr. Gilbert would send them to Yankeeland branded with the words—'Robbers, pirates, outlaws, assassins.' 'The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel,' but the stupidity or malignity of Mr. Gilbert is, beyond all question, quite outrageous.

It may be too late to save the Confederate prisoners from a cruel death. It may be that the Court of Appeal has confirmed the decision of the police magistrate, and that the men are on their way to a mock trial and to execution. It may be the Federal Government will forget that the Confederate Government is strong enough to punish an offence against its citizens. But it is not too late to do something to vindicate the honour and humanity of England. Doubtless Mr. Gilbert's conduct will be approved by the Federal Government, and will gratify those who are so clamorous for the execution of the Confederates; but we trust that the conduct of Mr. Gilbert will not go unreproved by the British Government.

The suppression of Mr. Seward's despatch of July 11 has made the Northern public angry, and Mr. Seward's friends try to get him out of the difficulty by asserting that the despatch 'was simply for the private use of Mr. Adams.' If so, why was it presented to Congress as though it had been duly presented? And the wording of the despatch demolishes this excuse. After threats of war Mr. Seward wrote: 'Nor will I allow myself to suppose that Her Majesty's Government will for a moment conceive that anything I have written on this point is written in a spirit of mere denunciation.' How could Her Majesty's Government conceive anything about a writing they had not seen and were not informed of? It also happens that on August 20 Mr. Adams wrote to Mr. Seward: 'I now infer that my judgment was correct in postponing further action under your despatch, No. 651 [that of July 11], as explained in my No. 465, of the 31st July.' Mr. Adams's despatch of July 31 was not given to Congress, and it is not unreasonably inferred that it contained Mr. Adams's explanation for not presenting the despatch of July 11 to Earl Russell. Mr. Seward will have to find a better excuse for what his Yankee enemies call 'caving in to the British.'

According to advices from St. Thomas and Bermuda to the 20th ult., the steamers India, City of Petersburgh, and A. D. Vance, have arrived from Wilmington with a large quantity of cotton.

Some ladies in the Confederacy are sending their plate to the Treasury as a free offering to their country to relieve the pressure on the currency. It may be that such relief will be small, and that other resources will rapidly relieve the finances from embarrassment, but the spirit that dictates such an offering is indicative of the unanimity, resolution, and strength of the Confederacy, and adds to the laurels the Southern women have already gained by their steadfast devotion and their noble self-sacrifices during the war.

A resolution introduced by Mr. Farrow, of South Carolina, passed the Confederate House of Representatives recommending that April 18 should be set apart as a day of humiliation, fasting, and prayer. The preamble exhorts the people to prayer by 'gratefully remembering the guidance, support, and deliverance granted to our patriot fathers in the memorable war which resulted in the independence of the American colonies;' and the resolution defines the objects of national prayer to be 'the attainment of an honourable peace,' and the enjoyment of 'the blessings of a free and happy government.'

The Richmond Enquirer of February 12 announces 'the arrival at a Southern port of an extremely valuable and much-needed cargo on Government account.'

The Federal Quartermaster's steamboat Harriet Weed grounded whilst proceeding up the St. John's River, and was destroyed by her crew to prevent her falling into the hands of the Confederates.

The telegraphic summary from New York says: 'The Confederate General Pickett, commanding in North Carolina, in a correspondence with the Federal General Peck, declares it his intention to execute every negro he catches who is proved to have killed a Confederate, and that, should retaliation be adopted, he will hang ten Yankees for every Confederate executed.' Probably this is not true; but if so, it is a lawful threat of punishment. Are not the negroes slaves? Then, according to the laws of all nations, it is a capital crime for them to revolt against their masters. Are the negroes, by virtue of Mr. Lincoln's Proclamation, free citizens of the South? Then, according to the laws of all nations, they deserve the fate of deserters if they go over to and fight in the armies of the public enemy.

The price of gold in New York on the 5th inst. was 62 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

On Thursday, the 10th March, being the first anniversary of the marriage of their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Wales, the infant Prince was christened. The ceremony took place in the chapel within Buckingham Palace, with as much state and magnificence as the size of the chapel would admit, at half-past twelve o'clock. The sponsors, in addition to the Queen and the King of the Belgians, were His Royal Highness Prince John of Slesvig-Holstein-Sönderburg-Glücksburg, representing His Majesty the King of Denmark; the Princess Helena, representing the Crown Princess of Prussia (Princess Royal of England); His Royal Highness the Prince Alfred, K.G.; the Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg-Strelitz, representing the Duchess of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha; the Duchess of Cambridge, representing her Serene Highness the Downger Duchess of Slesvig-Holstein-Sönderburg-Glücksburg, and the Duke of Cambridge, representing His Serene Highness the Landgrave of Hesse. The infant Prince is named 'Albert Victor Christian Edward.'

His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales held the second levée on behalf of Her Majesty on Saturday last, at St. James's Palace.

The Queen has intimated her intention of subscribing the sum of 3,000*l.* to the Bishop of London's Fund. The Prince of Wales has also contributed 1000*l.*

The town of Folkestone rejoices in a Mayor who is a Frenchman, one Monsieur Docidant, the proprietor of the Pavilion Hotel. This gentleman, who is immensely popular among his fellow-citizens, determined to celebrate the christening of the Prince by an international banquet; so he invited the municipal body of Boulogne, who, having obtained the consent of the Minister of the Interior, crossed the Channel at midday in state. The visitors were received on landing by the Mayor of Folkestone, and were greeted with the ringing of church-bells and a magnificent display of flags from the houses in the town and the ships in the port. The dinner was a brilliant affair. The band of the 5th Regiment enlivened the company with their music. The civic uniforms of the French officials contrasted grotesquely with the befurred aldermen and the gowned common-councilmen. The Mayor made several eloquent speeches. The Sous-Préfet, M. le Baron de Friencourt, delivered a warm eulogium on England: and the Mayor of Boulogne presented to each guest a medal struck in honour of the Queen's visit to France. The proceedings of the day terminated with a ball.

A letter has been published from the Archbishop of Canterbury, in which the Primate states that he agreed in the judgment of the Privy Council in the case of the 'Essays and Reviews' on the subject of eternal punishment solely on technical grounds; that to his mind the eternity of punishment rests exactly on the same ground as the eternity of blessedness, that both must stand or fall together, and that the Church of England, as his Grace maintains, holds both doctrines clearly and decidedly.

The Peace Society of this country has presented a memorial to the Emperor of the French, congratulating His Majesty on the proposal for a Congress, and the substitution of the arbitration of reason for that of the sword. The memorial is signed by Joseph Pease, Samuel Gurney, and Henry Richard. The following is the reply of the Emperor to Mr. Joseph Pease:—

'Sir,—Your committee, in the address which it has forwarded to me, congratulates me on having proposed a European Congress. The expression of its sentiments touches me all the more, because your society, occupying itself with an enlightened zeal with the means of maintaining the general peace, is on that very account better able to appreciate my constant solicitude for the attainment of that end.

'Will you be my interpreter to your honourable colleagues, and offer them my sincere thanks?

'Believe me, Sir, with all sentiments, &c.,

'Napoleon.'

We hope we shall not be considered uncharitable in the remark that a similar memorial was presented to the Emperor Nicholas immediately before the Russian war.

Sir Rowland Hill has been compelled by loss of health to resign his position at the Post Office. His name will be ever memorable as that of one of the greatest benefactors of society. He is to enjoy a pension for life, and the pension is to be continued to Lady Hill, in case she survives her husband.

The new turret-ship Royal Sovereign, the first of her kind in the English navy, was launched on March 9. In these columns last autumn a full description was given of this remarkable ship, which is entirely the work of Captain Coles, R.N. She is 450 feet in length, 63 feet in breadth; the outside level of her upper deck is 10 feet above the water-line amidships, 12 feet at the stem, and 8 feet 6 inches at the stern. Her turrets rest their base on the lower deck below the ship's side-armour, and have only 4 feet 6 inches exposed above the level of the upper deck. Her pilot-house is also a separate structure from her turrets. The Federal ships, on the contrary, have turrets 15 feet above the level of the deck, the base of the turrets being on the upper decks, and the turrets are capped by the pilot-house. The armour, moreover, of the Federal vessels is composed of layers of inch plates bolted together; that of the Royal Sovereign is composed of solid masses of metal. The sides of the latter vessel are built of 3 feet of solid timber, strengthened internally with diagonal iron bandings and double the usual number of upper deck beams, and clothed with 5½-inch rolled armour plates from the Atlas Works, Sheffield. There are four turrets. The foremost has two 10·5 inch guns (150 lb. smooth-bore), and the other three one gun each. The first turret presents 115 square feet exposed to the enemy's fire, and the other three 84 square feet. The area of the ports is 6 square feet.

On Tuesday, March 8, Mr. R. E. Turner, on behalf of the Attorney-General, appeared before Mr. Justice Meller at Judges' Chambers (Serjeants' Inn), in the matter of the steam-rams El Toussin and El Mounassir, now detained for the purposes of the information filed against Messrs. Laird under the Foreign Enlistment Act. The application of Mr. Turner was for a Commission to Cairo and other places to examine His Highness the Pasha of Egypt, and other persons, on behalf of the Crown. Mr. Watkin Williams, for the defendants, stated that his clients courted the fullest investigation, as they had a complete answer to the case, but contended that this was merely a vexatious application, adopted solely for the purpose of delaying proceedings. The vessels had been seized early in November, but no information was filed till February. Now the defendants were to be put to further loss and delay. The Judge remarked that the evidence was, on oath, declared to be essential, and therefore that he could hardly refuse the Commission. Mr. Watkin Williams then contended that the names of the witnesses should be given. That of the Pasha of Egypt was illusory, as of course he would not be examined personally. The Crown ought also to state what it intended to prove, and the Commission ought to be returned in time to try the case at the sittings after Easter term. The Judge said that he should grant the Commission, but the Crown must set forth the names of the witnesses and the facts intended to be proved. The Commission also must be returned into court by the 10th May next.

A Conservative, in the person of Mr. Surtees, has been returned as a Member of Parliament for Hertfordshire, by a majority of 260 over the Hon. Mr. Cowper (Liberal). The latter gentleman is the son-in-law of Viscount Palmerston.

The great reservoir of the Sheffield Water Company is situated on the brink of a valley lying between the Loxley and Stannington Hills. It covers an area of 76 acres, and is capable of holding 114,000,000 cubic feet of water. An embankment crosses the end of the valley, and bars the waters with an obstacle 85 feet high, 40 feet thick, and 300 yards in length. Beneath the shelter of this guarding force, the inhabitants of the valley dwelt in apparent security. There were cottages closely packed and densely populated. Imagination never dreamed of danger.

At midnight, when the houses were filled with their drowsy inmates, the enormous barrier gave way. The engineers had left before nine o'clock that evening, and, being hurriedly recalled by a countryman who discovered an alarming fissure in the bank, vainly endeavoured to blow up a weir that crossed the dam. They were too late. A portion of the embankment, 110 yards long by 70 feet deep, gave way at one moment, and the torrent rushed with a roar into the valley below. It is difficult to conceive, and impossible to describe, the terrible effects consequent on this irruption of waters. Whole streets of houses and factories were swept away, the inhabitants being drowned before even an attempt or a struggle could be made for the salvation of life. The flood stood 18 feet above the level of the streets, and even attacked the upper stories of the houses. It was impossible to render assistance — the darkness precluded that. Men ran about eagerly with torches, but only to listen helplessly to screams and cries for help.

Down the course of the rivers for 14 miles the country was laid waste; the entire valley of the Don was inundated. Thousands of acres of growing crops were submerged. Property to the value of half a million sterling was destroyed, and the lives of at least 250 persons were lost. Such was the dire calamity which befell the inhabitants of the valley beneath the waters of the town of Sheffield.

The Liverpool Grand National Steeple Chase was run on Wednesday, March 9. The course was four miles and a quarter in length, the ground very heavy, and the fences sufficiently difficult. The race was run in 11 min. 50 sec., and the value of the stakes was 1,035*l.* Jerusalem, Bantam, and Emblematic were favourites in the order named. Emblematic won, beating Arbury by three lengths, a considerable distance separating the pair from the rest of the field. The winner is the property of Lord Coventry, who purchased her last year for 300 guineas. She is by Teddington, and sister to Emblem, who won this same race last year for Lord Coventry. She is six years old, and, like her sister, is small and weedy. Her performances, moreover, up to this race had been of the most moderate description. She was ridden by G. Stevens, who rode Emblem last year, and to whom Lord Coventry gave £500 after the race. Oddly enough, Arbury was second for this race last year. A large sum of money was won by Lord Coventry, who had every faith in Emblematic after a favourable trial of the mare with Emblem.

The stewards of the Liverpool meeting were the Duke of Beaufort, Lords Sexton, Uxbridge, Westmoreland, and Courtenay, and Messrs. Craven and Payne.

Her Majesty's staghounds met at Cobham on Tuesday, March 8. The stag, after being started, crossed the Thames below Marlow, and, going direct north, passed High Wycombe, Great Missenden, Little Hampden, and Wendover, and was taken at Kymbol, four miles from Aylesbury. The distance from point to point was 19 miles, while the distance traversed by the hounds must have been more than 25 miles. The run occupied three hours.

The Alexandra case came before the House of Lords on Saturday last. The Lord Chancellor, and Lords Cranworth, St. Leonards, Wensleydale, and Chelmsford, were present. The whole question before their Lordships was whether from the decision of the Court of Exchequer on the rule for a new trial an appeal lay to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and thence to the House of Lords. The Exchequer Chamber had refused by a majority of the Court to hear the appeal. On Saturday, then, the Attorney-General addressed their Lordships in favour of the appeal. He reiterated the arguments which he had advanced before the Court below, contending that the Barons of the Exchequer had power, under the Queen's Remembrancer's Act, to make certain rules regulating such appeal, which rules were made after the trial of this case before the jury. The Solicitor-General followed on the same side. On Monday, Sir Hugh Cairns and Mr. Mellish argued against the right of appeal and the validity of the rules. We have already set forth the substance of the speeches on both sides before the Exchequer Chamber, and inasmuch as the point at issue is purely of a technical character, it is unnecessary to repeat them. On Tuesday the Attorney-General replied. Their Lordships took time to consider their judgment.

THE CONTINENT.

It is very necessary, in considering the present state of the Danish question, to keep its various branches perfectly distinct. The quarrel is so complicated, and involves the same parties in so many different characters, that a very little carelessness may cause us to entangle irremediably the thread of the history. Thus we have the relation of Denmark to Austria and Prussia as a belligerent, as a member of the German Diet, and as a European nation. Again, we have the relation of Austria and Prussia to one another as sisters in the same 'Pentarchy,' as they now call, in the slang of German politics, the union of the five great Powers; their common interests as German Powers; and their opposing interests as rivals for the leadership of the Fatherland. No less hard to appreciate is the position of the Federal Diet: supreme over its members, yet powerless to restrain them; created by European diplomacy, and at the same time passed over without notice in treaties that concern it vitally; containing within itself two of the five Powers, yet with less real existence than Switzerland. Where anomalies and contradictions are so numerous, we must be prepared to find a difficulty in the proper valuation and classification of the mass of apparently heterogeneous news which reaches us. The great military fact of the week is that the Austro-Prussian troops under Marshal von Wrangel have at length advanced in force—the Prussians with 60,000 men (including a reinforcement of 16,000), the Austrians with 25,000. The former have the task of mastering the fortifications of Düppel assigned to them: the latter are moving against Fredericia, which is to be invested and regularly besieged. Engagements have already taken place of no great importance, but generally in favour of the Allies: the Prussians took 180 prisoners, with the loss of two killed and twenty wounded. The Austrians, under Lieutenant Field-Marshal von Gablenz, had an encounter with the Danish cavalry about three miles south of Viele, which terminated in a more general engagement; the Danes were repulsed, and driven back upon Horsen. They have since evacuated Scanderborg, which has been thereupon occupied by the Austrians. The Allies have thus committed themselves to the invasion of Jutland — a step of such gravity, that the Austrian Government has found it necessary to send an explanatory circular to the Courts of London, Paris, Stockholm, and St. Petersburg, stating that the course of action thus entered upon is based solely on strategic reasons, and that the Allies disclaim any wish to render the war general. In the meantime, the siege train required for the reduction of Fredericia and Düppel is assembling at Rinhenis, in the shape of numbers of rifled cannon of 60 lbs. calibre, and several mortar batteries. The Danes on their side show no disposition to yield these important fortresses without an obstinate resistance. The description of the defences of Düppel is in itself enough to cool the ardour of a Demetrius Poliorcetes; the first obstruction which its assailants will meet is an irregular line of masked ditches, with sharp stakes firmly fixed at the bottom to impale the unlucky man who may fall through; next come a line of chevaux de frise; then another of large mantraps; and finally a common wire fence—the latter a simple but very effective impediment to both infantry and cavalry. Not content with these lines of circumvallation, the Danish engineers have crowned both scarp and counterscarp of the earthworks with palisades crested with a bristling line of sharp swords, an expedient borrowed apparently from the French defences of the breach at Badajos. Both within and without the works are fixed planks studded with long nails, the points upwards, and concealed by a light covering of earth. When we add to these amenities the mines that underlie all the assailable parts, we may have a faint idea of the difficulties which the Prussians have before them, and of the determination of the Danish army. The numbers of the latter are not exactly known, but it must comprise nearly all the available troops in the little kingdom, as the garrison duty in Copenhagen itself is now performed by the civic guard. The unimportant successes of the Prussians have nevertheless emboldened them already to present medals to some of the soldiers. Twenty men have thus been decorated by the hands of the Prince Royal, and in the presence of the Commander-in-Chief—a piece of premature exultation which has not passed unnoticed in Europe.

The peculiar position of Denmark gives her an advantage in naval matters which she has not been slow to make use of; a general blockade of the coast has been proclaimed, which is to be extended to the several ports as they may respectively fall into the hands of the invaders. Captures have been made at sea, and an embargo has been laid on German ships now within Danish territory. The latter, however, has been, to a certain extent, remitted on the earnest remonstrances of Austria and Prussia, but the ships captured at sea before the proclamation of war reached them have been retained in spite of protestations, and have thus afforded the Allies another reason for taking a substantial guarantee in Jutland. The Prussian squadron is ice-bound at Stralsund, and must perforce submit to the presence of a Danish squadron just outside the bay; an Austrian fleet is hovering about the Adriatic, and has made some captures of merchantmen. Whether they will dare the furies of the Bay of Biscay in the month of March, coupled with a jealous if not hostile surveillance by the English and French fleets, should they attempt to reach the line of blockade before the coast of Holstein, is still uncertain.

It appears to be now clearly understood that the two great Powers of Germany are, though not actually divided, yet inclined to take opposite views with regard to the integrity of Denmark—Austria being still anxious to rest on the treaties of 1851-2; Prussia, on the contrary, wishing to set those treaties at nought. Unfortunately, the latter Power has been up to this time the more successful in carrying out its views. The Danish officials, even the most local, have been dismissed without compensation of any sort; the Danish currency has been prohibited, and declared to be no legal tender on and after the 1st of April next. A decent opposition has certainly been made to the pretensions of the Duke of Augustenburg, but the general and persistent course of action has tended to the 'Germanization' of the Duchies: such proceedings, however, are peculiarly ungrateful to the Austrians, and a Vienna journal has declared, in very precise language, that it is impossible for them with one hand to hold Venetia by the right of a treaty, and with the other to grasp at the Duchies by the right of nationality.

The attempts to bring about a Conference can scarcely be called successful. The Allied Powers have addressed a note to the Courts most interested, expressing their willingness to accept an armistice either on the basis of a military 'uti possidetis,' each party remaining in the ground they may then hold; or on that of an evacuation of Jutland and Düppel, the Danes on their side retiring from Düppel and the Isle of Alsen. It is certain that no such terms will be accepted by the Danish Government. It is confidently asserted by a Viennese newspaper that the bases of a Conference have been proposed by the King of the Belgians and accepted by Denmark, whereby either the Duchies are to be restored to the condition (we cannot say constitution) which they enjoyed before 1848, or a separation is to be effected of Denmark and Holstein, Slesvig being incorporated into Denmark. An important circular has been addressed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Imperial diplomatic agents on the attitude which France intends to occupy. He begins by adverting to the English proposition of a Conference, without cessation of hostilities, made to the belligerent powers. He then proceeds to point out that while the Austrian Government has declared itself in favour of the integrity of Denmark, that of Prussia has not yet spoken out on the subject, while the Federal Diet is in open hostility to it. Denmark is likely to demand an armistice, and he therefore hints at the disfavour with which the French Emperor would view the refusal of it. He concludes by requesting his subordinates to abstain from all action until the acquiescence of the belligerents is declared; 'the French Government will then be found ready to share in any serious attempt at pacification.'

A still greater gloom has been cast over the politics of Central Europe by the decease of Maximilian II., King of Bavaria, who died somewhat suddenly at 11.45 A.M. on the 10th inst., at the age of 52; the immediate cause of his death was erysipelas. The late Sovereign succeeded to the throne during the lifetime of his father, who abdicated shortly after his not very reputable connection with Lola Montez. Although more of a philosopher than a politician, he had strong views on many subjects; a persistent friend of Austria, he resisted all attempts to isolate that Power from the rest of Germany. As the chief of the largest of the smaller German States, he was, to a great extent, their representative and adviser. The recent Conferences at Würzburg were very much due to his activity, and the decisions by them arrived at were undoubtedly the expression of his own wishes. His dislike of the Danish dynasty was more personal than political: the substitution of a Danish Prince for his own nephew on the throne of Greece was esteemed by him as a deliberate injury. He is succeeded by his son, Ludwig II., born in 1845, who is thus the fourth of the dynasty since their Electoral cap was converted by the first Napoleon into a Royal crown. The life of the King of Wurtemburg is also despaired of; his physicians doubt whether he can live through the week; and the interests of the Duke of Augustenburg before the Federal Diet are thus deprived of their most material support. The proposition of the Bavarian representative, involving the recognition of the Duke's pretensions in Slesvig-Holstein, has been held back for the present at the request of Austria and Prussia; the objections to such a proceeding entertained by the former Power have been already mentioned. As to Prussia, the difference of opinion between the Government and the people on this point is notorious, and will, it is said, forbid any idea of a reassembly of the Prussian Houses until the claims of the Duke have been positively negatived by Europe. Whether the following plan for the reconstruction of Germany has in any way influenced the Berlin Government is probably doubtful; but it is curious as coming from a leading journal of that country. Slesvig-Holstein and Lauenburg are, according to this scheme, to be erected into a Grand Duchy, and to be given to the Duke of Oldenburg; Rendsburg and Rastatt to be Federal fortresses, the former garrisoned by Prussians, the latter by Austrians; Kiel to become a Federal Prussian port; part of Oldenburg to go to Prussia, the remainder to Hanover, who should in her turn cede to Prussia her claims to the reversion of Brunswick; Austria to rectify her frontier in Northern Silesia, whereby she would regain some of the territory lost by Maria Theresa to Frederick; and, lastly, the Duke of Augustenburg to be recognised as successor to the Grand-Duchy formed of Slesvig-Holstein, on the extinction of the Oldenburg dynasty, and in the meantime to be presented with a large estate in Prussia. So cool a remodelling of the map of Europe has not been suggested since the time of Napoleon I. En attendant, the relations between the two great German Powers and their small colleagues in the Diet are improving. It is said that the proposition made by them to take command of the Federal reserves in Holstein, and rejected last week by a majority of ten to six, is now assented to by Saxony and Hesse-Darmstadt, thus reducing the majority to an equality. Probably the small States, having made their protest against the despotism of the 'Pentarchy' over Europe, and having lost their most influential member in the King of Bavaria, will return to their accustomed obedience. The waning fortunes of the Duke of Augustenburg have not, it is supposed, received material support from the visit of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg to Paris. It is understood that the object of that visit was to enlighten the Emperor on the feeling of the minor States of Germany, and to engage him, if possible, in favour of the Slesvig-Holstein pretender. His Majesty does not appear to have considered either the grievances of the small Courts of Germany, or the personal and hereditary merits of the pretender, sufficient to warrant a general European war on their behalf.

The danger of Denmark has excited the most vehement sympathy in the sister State of Sweden. An enormous meeting has been held at Stockholm, at which resolutions of the most decided character in favour of intervention were carried. Intoxicated with the eloquence of their leaders, the mob rushed to the King's palace to give him also the benefit of their opinion. His Majesty was, however, unfortunately absent, opening the Norwegian House of Representatives. They therefore, acting on Cicero's advice, who tells us that when we cannot attain the first it is most honourable to arrive at the second, marched straight to the residence of M. von Manderström, the Foreign Secretary, and after breaking in all his windows, apparently to deprive him of the possible excuse that he had not heard them, made him aware of their resolutions: the Secretary most unfairly, as it seems to us, summoned the military to assist him in arguing the other side of the question, and of course was completely successful in silencing his opponents. The Swedish Government prefers to wait—a policy which, whatever its other merits, has not just now that of novelty.

Some surprise has been felt that Prussia alone of the three Polish Powers has not proclaimed a state of siege in that part of her territories. The reason generally given is the reluctance of that State to confess that the management of her Polish provinces has been no more successful than that of Austria. The journals have been at some pains to deny the report that General von Manteuffel's mission to Vienna related in some measure to this point; however that may be, it is believed that Austria has come to no agreement with Prussia for common action in the matter, although it is probable that they have both made some arrangement with Russia with respect to it. The programme of the Russian campaign is simple: masses of troops are to occupy the frontiers and advance slowly inwards, until the rebels are collected, like game beaten out of a cover, under the walls of Warsaw.

The text of the proclamation emancipating the serfs in Poland has been published. It begins with a résumé of the labours of the late and present Czar in the cause of freedom, accuses the landlords of creating the rebellion, and praises the peasants for their fidelity; it then proceeds to give a broad statement of the privileges granted, the most noteworthy of which are—one that refuses municipal rights to all but peasant landholders, thus excluding a great body of priests and shopkeepers, while it gives the Government officials discretion to admit to these rights any persons of the excluded class whom they may think deserving. Another clause provides for the creation of commissions throughout the country to which peasants may appeal, and enacts that, until such creation, they may apply for aid to the military power. It concludes with a pathetic allusion to the universal law that man shall eat bread by the sweat of his brow, recalling to the mind of the reader, in an almost comical manner, the same allusion in General Banks's Edict of Re-enslavement at New Orleans. With all the Imperial solicitude for his Polish subjects, it cannot be said that the situation in that country is much altered: the insurgent armies have been reduced to guerilla bands, but these are excessively numerous, and overtax all the strength that Russia has yet exerted against them. The deportations to Siberia still continue to such an extent that the population will undoubtedly be seriously affected. The state of the prisons at Warsaw, and the nature of the punishments inflicted therein, are such as might excite the envy and emulation of a Butler, but must be allowed by all civilised Europe to be an excuse for any act of desperation. Warsaw itself is tolerably quiet; like the criminal broken at the wheel, it has lost the power of active suffering after the first crushing blow, but the neighbourhood still shows signs of life. The rails were torn up last week on the line between Warsaw and Bromberg, and all communication stopped; the names, by the way, of the insurgent officers under whose direction this was accomplished, are Szukalski, colonel, and Brzesc Kujawski, district chief of the insurgents. The Polish language has certainly an awkward look on paper.

Letters from Venetia inform us that the last link in the chain of fortifications protecting that country is now completed by the erection of certain batteries on the Po. The great depôt of coal has been removed from Venice to Pola. Austria waits for the blow which is to summon her forth to battle. On the Italian side of the river two camps of observation, to contain 80,000 men each, are being formed, one at Bologna, the other near Pavia; 10,000 mules have been bought for the military train; munitions are being brought up on all sides. We hear from Naples that 50,000 yards of cloth have been lately accepted, though already once refused because made of wool 'mixed with cotton.' The omnipotent 'shoddy' is apparently forcing its way even into the halls and temples of Pompeii.

The reception of the Crown Prince in Sicily is described as having been most enthusiastic; the Prince is much more popular with the Southern Italians than his royal father; he has taken more trouble to please them, and enters with less restraint into their feelings than Victor Emmanuel has ever cared to do. Considering the immense personal influence that can be acquired among that sensitive people, of which Garibaldi has given us so notable an example, it is most fortunate that there should be one of the royal family of Italy capable of commanding that influence.

Some curious statistics have been published of the number of newspapers now issued in Italy; they are 365 in number, of which the old provinces of Piedmont claim 119, and Milan alone 60; of foreign journals received in the kingdom 269 are British, and 188 French; America supplies 37; and the remaining States of Europe 146.

On the 3rd inst. a solemn service was performed at Rome in the Church dell' Umiltà, attached to the American College, for the repose of the soul of Monsignor John Hughes, Archbishop of New York. The funeral oration was pronounced by the Rev. William M'Kloskey, rector of the College. The service was attended by many distinguished personages, among whom were several of the best Irish families.

His Holiness, struck with the capabilities of some parts of the Pontifical Territory for the growth of cotton, has offered a reward of 25 scudi for every 'rubbio' of land from which a crop of that plant is obtained. To qualify for the reward, at least 30 'rubbii' must be cropped; the Government supplying the seed, and all necessary instructions for its proper cultivation.

A late despatch from Turin contains the important news that Garibaldi has disappeared from his villa on the Isle of Caprera; he is supposed to have left during the night, and no one knows the direction which he has taken. But the advanced state of the volunteer corps of Genoa and Florence, in spite of all Government resistance, gives reason to believe that he has turned thitherwards. His son Menotti is the only person who has any cognisance of his plans.

The new Ministry in Spain are testifying most energetically to the truth of the old proverb concerning 'new brooms.' A new law has been published, disabling most public functionaries from sitting in the Cortes: to this rule ambassadors and general officers are the only exceptions. Every person who takes any contract under Government also loses his seat. We wonder whether they also exclude from their House railway directors. An entire reorganisation of the military divisions has also taken place; the country is now divided into three Capitanates — North, Central, and South. Another Capitanate, but of an inferior grade, is formed out of the Canary Islands.

An attempt has been made to acclimatise the sugar-cane in Spain by the Marques d'Aziany, which bids fair to be successful. The crop has not yet arrived at full growth, but is considered by the experienced to promise well. The plantation rejoices in the name of Puigpatrent, of which neither the sound nor the meaning smacks much of the sugar-cane.

We are sorry to have to report that His Holiness the Pope has been suffering from a bad attack of fever caught in St. Peter's on Friday, March 11. The reports of his illness have been often unfounded, but we fear that there is too much reason to believe this to be true. His death at this moment would add another to the already too numerous complications in European politics.

The 'entente cordiale' between France and England is now so intimate that the two nations can mutually sympathise not only in the loss of their mightiest men, but also in that of less European and more domestic celebrities. We have this week to record the decease of two men whose loss is felt on the other side of the Channel. M. Cordoën, Procureur-Général at the Cour Impériale, expired somewhat suddenly on the morning of the 11th inst. He had served as Deputy-Procureur in the provinces, and was promoted to the rank of Procureur du Roi in 1841. In this capacity he acted at Bayeux, and again under the Republic at Rouen; in 1856 he was appointed Procureur-Impérial in Paris, and finally in 1862 Procureur-Général at the Cour Impériale. His name is associated with two remarkable trials—the first that of M. de Montalembert, the second that of the four Italian conspirators recently convicted. The immediate cause of death was congestion of the lungs, but he had evidently been failing ever since his pleading in the case of the Italians. His death was noticed by M. Dufaure, at the conclusion of a pleading before the Cour Impériale on the 11th inst., in that graceful manner which is so eminently a gift of the French gentleman. The death of M. Alaux, the painter, is the second loss that we have to record; he was a pupil of Vincent, and early distinguished himself as a prizeman in the Academy; he long enjoyed the private friendship of Louis-Philippe, for whom he executed some paintings at St. Cloud, Fontainebleau, and elsewhere. He was a member of the Académie des Beaux Arts, and was attended to the grave by many of his brethren in that body.

The Archduke Maximilian left Paris at 7 P.M. on Saturday, March 12, and arrived in London on the following day. It is now arranged that he will formally publish his acceptance of the Mexican crown on the 27th inst., and will notify the fact to the five great Powers of Europe, and also to Spain and Belgium. His Imperial Highness has already exercised his power by concluding in Paris a loan of 200,000,000 francs at 6 per cent., to be issued at 70. His passage to his adopted country will be effected, not by the Austrian frigate Novara, as at first intended, but in the French Themis, which will be accompanied by the Novara. He has accepted no easy task, nor one that can be accomplished by the mere repetition by rote of the commonplaces of diplomacy; but the confidence with which he has begun augurs well for his future success. A disciple of Napoleon III., he will never want for statecraft; a descendant of the Hapsburgs, he will fill with dignity an Imperial throne. To those who care at all for the sentiment of history, it is gratifying to see the provinces, once the gems in the crown of Ferdinand and Isabella, restoring their allegiance to the representative of their old sovereigns. It remains for him to resuscitate the still glowing embers of the ancient Spanish pride and loyalty, that the country of Mexico, now half blurred out by Federalism, may reassert itself in its own individuality; and side by side with its neighbours of the Confederate States, then once more peaceful and happy, may present itself to its European parent, neither mother nor child unworthy of the other.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE SEIZURE OF THE VOLANT.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. H. Baillie presented a petition from the owners of the brig Volant, which vessel, after proceeding from the port of London directly to the port of Matamoros, was captured in Mexican waters by the United States gunboat Virginia, on the ground that part of her cargo—that is, some cloth and stockings—was contraband of war. The Volant was sent to New Orleans, and the owners complain of being unfairly subjected to the dilatory proceedings of the American Prize Court, and pray the House of Commons to take their case into consideration.

FEDERAL RECRUITING IN IRELAND.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Roebuck, pursuant to notice, asked, 'as the Solicitor-General has stated that it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to remonstrate with the Government of the Confederate States upon their employment of agents for illegal purposes, if, in the maintenance of strict neutrality, it is intended to remonstrate with the Government of the Federal States upon the employment by them of agents in Ireland for the purpose of enlisting as soldiers the subjects of Her Majesty.' In introducing this matter to the House, Mr. Roebuck complained that the Solicitor-General, a law officer of the Crown, had, in the presence, and therefore with the tacit sanction of, the Attorney-General, given a distinct and official opinion upon a case now pending in our law courts by promising to remonstrate with the Confederate Government about acts which as yet no tribunal in this country had pronounced illegal, and which, so far as the case had yet been tried, had been decided against the Government. The hon. member said he believed Lord Palmerston was ready to uphold the honour of the country, but he felt that the honour of England had been tarnished by the policy of Earl Russell. He called upon the noble Lord to maintain a strict neutrality between the belligerents. He frankly admitted he had no sympathy with the Northern States, and as the Government was about to remonstrate with the Confederates on suspicion, then the Federal Government ought to be remonstrated with on the suspicion of their recruiting in Ireland. He did not ask the Premier to declare his sentiments, but to be really neutral, and not to be a party to that kind of neutrality which is all on one side.

Lord Palmerston declared emphatically that he thoroughly endorsed the policy and proceedings of Earl Russell in American affairs, and that he was responsible for them. He admitted that the Federals had the best of our neutrality, but that was not that our laws were unequal, but that the circumstances of the belligerents were different. The Federals commanded the sea, and therefore the markets of Europe were open to them, whilst the Confederates were shut out from these advantages. [So much the greater reason for not employing any unlawful means for hindering the Confederates from remedying the inequality.] The noble Lord said: It is true that there is a great difference between the obtaining ships from a neutral country and the obtaining of arms and ammunition. I don't dispute that in point of principle and our own municipal law these two things stand on an equal footing—that is to say, that by international law and obligation, if a belligerent goes to a neutral country and buys arms, cannon, and ammunition, wherewith to arm large armies, he derives from that neutral a greater assistance towards deciding the war than perhaps one, two, or more cruisers can have on the ultimate fate of the war, although they may effect the injury of individuals. But we have a municipal law which overrides in some respects international obligations, and we are bound to prevent certain things being done in this country for the benefit of one belligerent against another. We are bound not to permit enlistments and organisation of men, and also to prevent the equipment and armament of ships.' It is easy to prevent the equipment of ships, but difficult to prevent enlistments. It is likely enough that agents of the Federal Government in Ireland are inducing men to go out to America who would enlist, but they were too cunning to enlist them in Ireland. They coaxed the men to go out as labourers by the offer of high wages [We were under the impression that a breach of law. was not covered by a fraudulent pretext.] In the case of the Kearsage a prosecution is going on, and if a conviction is obtained, the Government will remonstrate with the Federal Government. If any proofs can be obtained, he (Lord Palmerston) and Earl Russell will be ready to vindicate the honour and laws of the country by adequate representations.

Sir J. Fergusson censured the barbarous mode of warfare adopted by the Federal Government, and felt confident that if such conduct had been proved against a European power, that House would not have remained silent. The hon. member said: 'It is notorious that enlistments are taking place in this country—that our fellow-subjects are being drawn away to become the instruments of savage cruelty,' and therefore it is fitting that there should be a remonstrance addressed to the Federal Government. Two years ago a naval officer informed him that large bounties were being offered to the men on board his vessel to induce them to enlist in the Federal marine. These things must be known to Her Majesty's Government, and if they were about to remonstrate with the Confederate Government on mere suspicion, at least an equally strong representation should be made to the Federal Government.

Mr. Bright found fault with the tone of Mr. Roebuck's speech, and said that the Federals were only in one sense a foreign nation, 'for they were, after all, another English nation growing up on the other side of the Atlantic.' [If Mr. Bright were an Englishman in anything besides birth and name, he would be quite right in describing the Yankee and English peoples as being identical.] He contended that the emigration from Ireland to the United States was the result of high wages and also of the bounty offered to soldiers. The hon. member said: 'When it was known that the bounty for soldiers in the United States is 100*l.*, the only marvel is that any Irishman not a freeholder or a man of some capital should remain in that blighted and unhappy country.' Mr. Bright thinks it not unlikely that some sharp fellow may have found out that he can get a handsome remuneration for taking over Englishmen or Irishmen who think proper to enlist when they get to America. Mr. Bright concluded his genuine Yankee speech by an insolent attack upon Mr. Roebuck.

Lord R. Cecil remarked that he was not disturbed by the announcement of Her Majesty's Government intending to remonstrate to the Confederate Government, and he had no fear that we should plunge into a war with the Confederacy. 'There is no stronger proof of the Confederate States being among those Powers which are thought too strong to go to war with than the fact that Her Majesty's Government intends to remonstrate with them. There is not a strong Power in the world with which this Government has not remonstrated, and there is no doubt they will go on remonstrating to the end of the chapter, their remonstrances producing not the smallest effect.'

Mr. Kinglake abused Mr. Roebuck, and Mr. Caird expressed an opinion that the high remuneration offered to labourers in America was sufficient to attract emigrants without the intervention of the recruiting officer.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP THE PRINCE CONSORT.

As our readers are aware, Her Majesty's Government, being very much alarmed for fear the steam rams in the Mersey should, in defiance of the authority of Her Majesty's Customs, and in spite of what appeared to all reasonable men adequate precautions, put to sea, suddenly determined to send Her Majesty's armour-plated ship the Prince Consort to aid the authorities in keeping the unfinished and unarmed rams in safe custody. On her voyage to Liverpool, the Prince Consort was caught in a gale, severely damaged, and was, it is reported, in some danger of going to the bottom. On Thursday night, in answer to a question put by Sir J. Elphinstone, Lord C. Paget said: 'There were reports that certain vessels in the Mersey would probably put to sea, and it was necessary that these ships should not be allowed to go. The Prince Consort was not unfitted. She was ready, and, moreover, the Controller of the Navy had expressed a wish that she should have a trial at sea under steam. The crew was put on board—for under our present arrangements we can put a crew on board in twenty-four hours—and she went to sea. It is true that the men, having been only so short a time on board, did not know all the various arrangements of the vessel with respect to stores, and hatches, and matters of that sort; and unfortunately, the moment she left Devonport, there came on a very heavy gale of wind, and when she rounded the Land's End she experienced one of the heaviest gales that have been known for a great number of years. She rolled—I need not tell you that our armour-ships do roll; it is a peculiarity of our armour ships that they do roll. Had she been in a long sea—had she been on the Atlantic, probably she would not have shipped any water, because we know that a long sea is better than those short seas which prevail in the Channel for a large vessel like the Prince Consort. Well, she got into the Race of Holyhead, where, as every one knows, the sea boils. She did take in water in the Race of Holyhead; the water was over her engine-room, and matters began to look serious. She came up to the South Stack, but the captain, finding that he could not bear into Holyhead with safety, hauled his wind and made for Dublin. It so happened that for some time the vessel lay to, and while she lay to she did not take in water, but when her head was forced against the sea she took in water over her bows and over her sides—in fact, she shipped a great deal of water; and when they reached Dublin all on board were very glad, and they got their pumps out and worked them.'

[We quote Lord C. Paget's statement because we think it is evidence that under the influence of panic induced by the threats of the Federal States' Minister, her Majesty's Government placed a costly vessel in imminent jeopardy. That she escaped with damages that could be repaired for 1,000*l.* was a fortunate circumstance, for which the Government is not entitled to any credit.]

DENMARK.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald called attention to a discrepancy between the statements made by Earl Russell and Lord Palmerston as to the proposed Conference. The Foreign Secretary had stated that a cessation of hostilities was a part of the programme, and Lord Palmerston had stated the Government had proposed a Conference without an armistice.—In reply, Lord Palmerston could not explain the discrepancy, but said, that the proposal was for a Conference without a cessation of hostilities.

In the House of Lords, on Monday, in reply to the Earl of Derby, Lord Wodehouse said that the object of the advice of Her Majesty's Government to the Danish Government in December last, was, if possible, to prevent the invasion of Slesvig, and accordingly they had recommended the withdrawal of the November Constitution, in order to remove a ground or pretext for the invasion. In tendering this advice to the Danish Government, he (Lord Wodehouse) could not engage for the German Powers that they would not invade Slesvig.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Ellenborough expressed a hope that Denmark would accept the armistice proposed in the joint note of Austria and Prussia. Without a cessation of hostilities there was little hope of any success from the Conference.—The Duke of Somerset, in the absence of Earl Russell, who is temporarily indisposed, said, without vouching for the exact words, the joint note of Austria and Prussia, as published in the newspapers, is substantially correct.

A PARLIAMENTARY SURPRISE.

In committee of supply on Thursday night there was an incident which resulted in rather a lively discussion. On the vote for 1,275,316*l.* for wages to artificers in Her Majesty's dockyards, Mr. Stansfeld rose as if about to address the committee on this vote, which it was known would not be passed without criticism; but he immediately resumed his seat without speaking, and to the astonishment of the Members, Mr. Massey, the Chairman, put the vote next in order, and in reply to Mr. Lindsay, said the vote for the artificers had been passed. Mr. Lindsay immediately moved that the Chairman report progress, and strongly denounced the conduct of the Government in hurrying the vote through. Sir J. Pakington said it was perfectly well understood that Mr. Stansfeld was to address the Committee on the vote. Mr. Bright said the affair had the appearance of a trick, and was insulting to the House. This observation has resulted in a correspondence between Mr. Bright and Lord C. Paget, in which Mr. Bright retracts his words, so far as they were supposed to apply to Lord C. Paget.]—As Mr. Lindsay refused to withdraw his motion at the request of Mr. Gladstone, the vote was ultimately recommitted.

FLOGGING AND BRANDING IN THE BRITISH ARMY AND NAVY.

In Committee on the Mutiny Bill, Mr. Cox called attention to the subject of corporal punishment in the army and navy. In the year 1862, nearly 35,000 lashes had been inflicted in the navy, and 5,999 in the army. One man had been sentenced to forty lashes for using bad language. Mr. Cox moved the omission of the clause which authorised this punishment. Colonel North said he should be glad if any better punishment could be suggested, but he did not believe it could; our system was more merciful than that of other nations. In France they shot when we flogged. 'In Austria they had a torture chamber, the floor of which was composed of angles, arranged in such a way, that a prisoner could neither sit nor stand at ease, and the punishment was so intense, that offenders could not be retained there for long at a time, but were taken out for a little while and then put back again. In Prussia, again, the non-commissioned officers carried sticks for the correction of private soldiers.' —Mr. Ayrton remarked, that our native soldiers in India were exempted from all flogging, and the discipline did not suffer thereby, and that the native pointed the finger of scorn at the Englishman who was amenable to the lash.—The Marquis of Hartington advocated the retention of the clause, because it was the opinion of British officers that the lash was the only sort of punishment to which many of our soldiers and sailors were sensible. At length the Committee divided, and the clause was retained by a majority of three.

On the 'branding' clause being moved, Mr. Cox said he was utterly at a loss to know what possible reason could be given for retaining the still more brutal punishment of branding. If a man were so bad as not to be fit to remain in the army, they should at once get rid of him, and afford him the chance which privation might offer of retrieving his character. This clause was a disgrace to our statute-book. It enabled courts-martial, in addition to any other punishment, to order the letter 'D.' to be deeply marked on the left breast of a deserter, with ink or gunpowder, or other preparation, in such a manner as to 'be clearly seen, and not liable to be obliterated.' They might also recommend that the letters 'B. C.' (bad character) should be branded indelibly upon his person. He knew one case of a man entering the army who, as the noble Lord said, was rather 'wild,' and who was afterwards guilty of all sorts of military offences. After he had had his flogging he at last came under the operation of Clause 26, and received both the brands of 'D.' and 'B. C.' He turned out some few years later to be an honest, worthy, and hard-working labourer, and as such obtained the recommendation of several respectable persons as a candidate for the police force. He was rejected, but he would unquestionably have been successful in his application but for the indelible marks showing that he had once been a bad man. He maintained that it was not a Christian mode of punishment to brand a man with infamy for life without leaving him a locus pœnitentiæ. Such a punishment could never conduce to the benefit of the army. He moved the omission of the clause.

After a few words in defence of the system from Colonel North and Mr. Headland, Mr. Bright warned the House that, owing to the increase of emigration, the price of labour was rapidly rising in the country, and that in a few years it would be more difficult to recruit our army than it was at present; and this being so, it would be wise to make the service honourable and popular, and not to disgrace it by the infliction of cruel and degrading punishments. Mr. Gladstone expressed a hope that the Committee would not interfere with the discipline of the army without having the matter fully discussed. Upon a division the branding clause was retained by a majority of 30.

THE BURNING OF KAGOSIMA.

Mr. Layard read a letter from Colonel Neale, which stated that the inhabitants of Kagosima did not exceed 40,000, that they withdrew from their huts during the bombardment, and by offerings of fruit to the crew of the British flagship showed that they appreciated the moderation and caution of Her Majesty's agents. [We are glad to hear that the affair was not so bad as reported, but we do not think much of the offerings of fruit. As far as we know, barbarous nations are ever anxious to propitiate cruel Powers.]

THE GRECO CONSPIRACY.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, in answer to Sir J. Palk, Mr. Layard said no correspondence had taken place with the French Government with reference to the charge against Mr. Stansfeld, and that it would be unworthy of Her Majesty's Government to take notice of such a charge. Mr. Hennessy read copious extracts from a work written by M. Mazzini which defended tyrannicide. Mr. Disraeli considered the accusation a very grave affair, and that Mr. Layard's answer to Sir J. Palk's question was very unsatisfactory.

AMERICAN LIFE, BY AN AMERICAN.*

The aphorism that one must live with a man to know him—live with him, not as a guest, but as a member of the family—is as applicable to nations as to individuals. A traveller may be very industrious and conscientious, singularly free from prejudice, and enjoy excellent opportunities for observation, but still the inner life of the people among whom he sojourns will be hidden from him. England and France are near neighbours, yet how little the respective peoples understand and appreciate each other! Nor can we marvel at, however much we may deplore, such ignorance. We boast, and not without reason, that our newspapers are so free and comprehensive that they record the story of our lives from day to day. Suppose a foreigner read our papers to learn our character, can we hope that a favourable impression would be produced? What a fearful record of vice, crime, cruelty, and suffering would meet his eye! Yet we are not so bad as we seem, and the black spots are sores on the surface, and not cancers eating into the very life of the nation. It is true that year by year so many people die in London from sheer destitution, but this does not happen from any harshness in the theory of the law, or from any hardness of heart on the part of the rich. It is true that the reports of proceedings in the Bankruptcy and Divorce Courts reveal some hideous depths of dishonesty and immorality, yet we have cause to be proud of our commercial integrity and the proverbial chastity of our women. Like photography, our press portrays prominent features and not character, and to discover the latter time and study are indispensable.

But the United States are a better illustration than England of the difficulty of ascertaining something about national character. For many years before Secession, steam had effectually bridged the Atlantic, and the New World was inundated with emigrants, tourists, commercial travellers, and distinguished lions of all sorts and conditions. But neither from the settlers, nor from the visitors, nor from the shrewd men of business, nor from writers famed for acute observation and marvellous insight into human nature, did we obtain any exact information about the manners and customs of the inhabitants of North America. Before 1861 we knew not that there were as great international differences between the peoples of the North and South as there are between Englishmen and Frenchmen. Intelligent men were not deceived by the rancorous malignity of the Yankee preachers, lecturers, and novelists, but still there was a prevailing impression that the Southerners, owing to the influence of climate and domestic institutions, were both physically and mentally rather effeminated. We did not credit Abolition stories, but still the general idea was that the negroes were unhappy, uncared for, and insubordinate. The war has taught us that the Southerners are an athletic, heroic, and highly gifted race, and that the negroes were so kindly treated that they have in the midst of hostilities manifested a noble and faithful attachment to their masters. Our opinions, too, about the North have been completely revolutionised. We never doubted that the Yankees were braggarts, and that they deified the dollar, but no one supposed that they would wage a cruel war against national independence, or that they would resign their own liberties without a struggle and even without a protest. We are indebted to the war for this enlightenment; but if Dr. Nichols had published his 'Forty Years of American Life' five years ago, we should have known beforehand that the South would defend her national independence at any sacrifice of property and life, and that Northern liberty would go down at the first attack.

Dr. Nichols was born in New Hampshire in 1815. He relates little about his own career, but we learn incidentally that he has travelled North and South; that he has been a journalist; that he has been acquainted, more or less intimately, with nearly all the American celebrities of the past and present generations; and that when this war broke out he came to England rather than aid the North in her wicked aggression on the South, or than join the South and fight against the country of his birth. He does not think it altogether proper that he should have left America instead of doing what he could to put down 'that miserable usurpation at Washington;' but then, if he had remained, he would have been imprisoned in Fort Lafayette. So he came to the old country, and sought to relieve the tedium of exile by writing one of the best books on America ever published—a book which, if it meets with the attention it deserves, will be exceedingly useful. 'Forty Years of American Life' is not a political essay, or a book of travels, or a history, or a biography, but a series of sketches of what the author has seen and observed. There is something very touching in the enthusiasm Dr. Nichols manifests when he describes his native land. He dilates on the beautiful scenery and the riches of the country copiously and without restraint; but when he speaks of the people, there is an evidence of the pain and regret with which he sets forth the follies and vices of his fellow-countrymen. Better would it have been for the United States if his frankness was not exceptional, and if the Northern people had been inspired by such earnest and unswerving patriotism.

After these general observations, we propose to comment on a few of the leading topics, and we regret that it is impossible in a review to do justice to the whole work. We might as well attempt to criticise in detail a book of proverbs or a cyclopædia. There are fifty-four chapters, and each chapter, though not isolated from the others, has a separate interest, and both volumes abound with characteristic anecdotes. In justice, then, to the author and to our readers, we are called upon to state that our review of this able work is so far from being exhaustive that it only points out some interesting passages and incidents exhibiting the national characteristics of North and South.

It is natural that Dr. Nichols should, almost at the beginning of his book, direct attention to a prominent and ruling passion with the North—hatred to England. From his earliest years the Northern American is taught to regard this country with enmity, and it is true that 'there has not been an election in America in forty years—no, nor in eighty—in which a sustained charge of friendship to England would not have defeated the most hopeful prospects of success.' Nor is it difficult to account for this sentiment of hostility. The history of the United States dates from the War of Independence, and the only wars in which they have been engaged, except the Mexican, were with England. We may be their best customer and their best friend, but we are unquestionably their only historical enemy. The results of the wars with England were calculated to foster a spirit of rivalry and vanity that is incompatible with cordial amity. In the War of Independence, the colonists, though not without foreign aid, were successful. In the war of 1812, England was fighting Napoleon, and the United States came out of the struggle triumphantly; and the disaster of New Orleans after peace had been concluded in Europe gave them additional éclat. It is true that we held our own in Canada; that we could have maintained the struggle with the colonies much longer had it not been for the intervention of France: that in the last war we should have done much better had our arms not been engaged in Europe; but we must not wonder that the issues of our contests with the United States should induce the people to think their military prowess superior to ours. Another reason for their enmity to England is, that we hold a large portion of the continent, and the Yankee believes that the whole continent is his property. On September 18, 1860, Mr. Seward delivered a speech at St. Paul, Minnesota, in which this idea was fully embodied. He declared the power of the United States Government 'is not to be established on the Atlantic or the Pacific coast,' but 'at the sources of the Mississippi and the St. Lawrence;' and he concluded by saying: 'I had never, until now, occupied that place whence I could take in and grasp the whole grand panorama of the continent, for the happiness of whose present people and future millions it is the duty of the American statesman to labour.'

Nothing made the secession of the South more galling than the mortal blow it dealt at the popular view of the Monroe doctrine, and the barrier it seemed to throw up against the conquest of Canada. What more natural than that England should rejoice in an event that decreased the power of an aggressive and unscrupulous rival? What more natural than that the great cotton and tobacco consuming country should form a defensive and offensive alliance with the great cotton and tobacco producing country? And if this happened, what prospect was there of turning the British out of Canada, seeing that England could sweep the seas with her fleets, and that the Northerners could not invade Canada without simultaneously providing against a Southern invasion of their own territory? Hence the jealousy with which the British Government has been watched, and why, in spite of its friendliness to the North, it has been bullied and insulted, whilst France has been treated with the utmost courtesy, although the establishment of the Empire of Mexico is an infraction of the Monroe doctrine. It is so palpably the interest of England to be on good terms with the South that, no matter how meek and submissive our Government is, the North will not believe in its sincerity, and longs for the opportunity to avenge our hypocritical neutrality. Perhaps our Government may succeed in making a friendly alliance between this country and the Confederate States impossible, and so give a tremendous triumph to Mr. Seward's diplomacy. By so doing, however, the bitter hatred of the Yankees will not be lessened, but rather stimulated.

Dr. Nichols gives a graphic survey of religion in the United States. The Pilgrim Fathers were relentless spiritual tyrants. They claimed religious freedom for themselves, but denied it to others, hanging Quakers and whipping heterodox women.

While adopting the Bible as their code of laws; robbing and murdering the Indians on the plea that the earth was the heritage of the saints; compelling men to go to meeting on Sundays under pain of fine and imprisonment; permitting none but Church members to vote for magistrates; driving Baptists out of the colony; hanging witches by dozens, according to the laws of Moses; enslaving the Indians, or importing negroes from Jamaica, and doing very much as their brethren were doing on the opposite side of the Atlantic, the Yankee colonists were laying the foundations of that group of free, prosperous, and happy Republics which Mr. Bright expects to spread over the Western hemisphere.

Puritan intolerance begat that species of Deism called Unitarian Christianity, and in Boston there are fifty Unitarian churches. The denominations in the North are almost innumerable; and many sects, though retaining the name and some of the forms of Christianity, profess doctrines that are altogether opposed to the doctrines of the Bible, and which are in fact infidel. In respect to religion, the difference between North and South is remarkable. 'The great bulk of the Southern people are Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, and Roman Catholics. The great bulk of the Northern people at this day are none of these. They are Rationalists and Spiritualists.'

Amidst the war of sects, the Roman Catholic Church has continued to steadily progress, and there appears some ground for the boast, that what Catholicism has lost in Europe it is fast recovering in the New World. In 1808, the Roman Catholic Church in the United States had 2 bishops, 68 priests, 80 churches, and 2 ecclesiastical educational institutions; and in 1861, it had 45 archbishops and bishops, 2,317 priests, 2,517 churches, 1,278 stations and chapels, and 48 ecclesiastical educational institutions. Nor are these figures the only, or even the most important, indications of progress. Besides 28 hospitals, 102 orphan asylums, 100 other charitable institutions, 100 monasteries, and 173 convents, there were, in 1861, 96 colleges and academies for young men, and 212 female academies. In America it is customary for Protestant parents to send their children to Catholic schools, where they get an excellent and refined education. Dr. Nichols assures us that the directors of these establishments do not use the opportunity for converting their pupils, but they necessarily exercise a powerful and abiding influence over them. Hence there is none of that bitter animosity which in this country Protestants display towards Catholicism. The increase in the Roman Church in America is mainly due to the immigration of Catholics, though the conversions are numerous. The priesthood, however, do not exert any marked political control over their flocks. They have been stoutly opposed to the doctrines of Abolitionism, and at the time of secession vainly sought to avert hostilities. The late 'Archbishop Hughes was opposed to Abolitionism and to the war; and yet his influence was used by adroit management to fill the ranks of the Federal army.'

We shall not comment on the social condition of the people of the North. That it is one of degeneracy is unquestionable. That falsehood and commercial dishonesty are prevalent is undeniable. But we are more immediately concerned with their political morality, which is a fair subject for criticism, and which is also a sure test of the morals of the community. When a popular government is corrupt, it needs no argument or facts to prove that the people are not virtuous.

Europe has been startled at the corrupt practices that have been revealed since the commencement of the war. 'Honest Abe' has violated, with reckless audacity, the Constitution he swore to defend, and is resorting to scandalous and arbitrary measures to secure his re-election. Mr. Seward has been guilty of deceit and misrepresentation such as no other diplomatist has ever descended to. Federal generals have shown themselves dishonest and mendacious. The 'loyal' supporters of the Lincoln Government have been growing rich on peculation. But it must not be supposed that this widespread corruption is the result of the war, for in fact the war is the result of the general corruption. For many years offices have been sold to the highest bidder, and office-holders have held themselves entitled to make the best of their bargains.

Hired gangs of rowdies, fighting men by profession, have long been the most active and influential politicians in the large American cities. They live upon plunder. No man can be nominated or elected to the lowest office without paying them. When a man who depends upon his office for bread pays more for a nomination than the entire salary of his office, it is easy to see that he must reimburse himself by some kind of corruption or robbery of the public.

As with the minor officers, both State and Federal, so it is with the higher officers and with members of Congress. Dr. Nichols says, and he supports his statement with copious extracts from Northern journals:—

I am not speaking of idle rumours or party slanders. Every person who has been intimately acquainted with American politics for the last ten years, knows how public, notorious, and unquestionable these matters have become. Money is paid for nominations even to important judicial offices. The very thieves of New York are bribed to nominate the judges who are to try and sentence them. Money is paid for votes, and in certain States the man or the party that can pay the most money can make sure of carrying an election. Money is paid to secure the passage of legislative enactments for charities, appropriations, contracts, and monopolies.

But it may be asked whether these observations do not apply to the South as well as to the North. Both sections were living under the same Constitution, and if one is so corrupt, is it likely or possible that the other can be virtuous? National character is the result of circumstances and disposition, and is very little affected by forms of government. A people cannot be made virtuous or vicious by a parchment deed, though we are willing to admit that with such a mixed population as that of the North universal suffrage is quite inimical to good government, and that the South owes much of her political purity to the circumstance of having a large labouring population not entitled to vote. But, whatever the causes, it is true that the political degeneracy of the North did not find a home in the South. The art of wire-pulling was not in vogue south of Mason and Dixon's line, and, as our author observes, in that part of the continent 'political caucuses and nominating conventions are almost unknown.' In the South the 'isms,' including freelovism, communism, and Fourierism, have never found disciples. When a Southern gentleman wants to go to Congress, he openly canvasses the constituency, and if he performs his duties satisfactorily he is certain of re-election.

This frank and open way of political management suits the temper of the Southern people. They detest cunning and underhand measures as unworthy of white men and freemen. It is thought by many that they are more choice of the dignity of freedom, because surrounded with slaves. It is also to be borne in mind, that when the Southern States formed a constitution, they abolished the corrupting practice of giving offices as a reward for partisan services, by making appointments to all but a few of the higher offices during good behaviour, and providing that office-holders should not be removed for merely political reasons.

Dr. Nichols illustrates his political strictures by some sketches of politicians. Englishmen will not be shocked to hear of firemen, barmen, and eating-house keepers attaining high positions. In this aristocratic country there are a host of what are technically called self-made men. We have peers who have risen from the ranks, and many more whose fathers were the architects of their own fortunes and the founders of noble families. When it was announced that an ex-railsplitter had been chosen for President of the United States, no one condemned the choice on account of the humble beginning, and Mr. Lincoln's origin is only remembered because in high office he plays the part of a West-country clown and of a provincial attorney. But for the bestowal of offices on men tainted with corruption and crime there is no excuse, and there are men in Mr. Lincoln's service who would not be tolerated in any European society. And where there is neither peculation nor crime, we find, as in the case of Mr. Seward, a want of political integrity that is hardly less disgraceful. Mr. Seward has been the ready tool of his party, and for his own advancement has flattered the worst passions of an ignorant and misguided mob. Dr. Nichols cites a letter from Mr. Greeley, in which he charges Mr. Seward with base ingratitude and false dealing. We do not sympathise with Mr. Greeley's political sentiments, but still we admit that he has been tricked and cheated by Mr. Seward out of the honours and emoluments that he had earned by arduous and unscrupulous party services.

Dr. Nichols devotes several chapters to the negro question, and he is peculiarly fitted to deal with the subject. He has seen the negro North and South, and he tells us that he knows something of the condition of the race, 'in Ashantee and Dahomey, in Cuba and Brazil, and in the British West Indies and in Hayti.' Moreover, he was brought up in an Abolition school, and although he has changed his opinions he has not become a violent partisan of the Southern institution. He places before his readers such an array of facts, that any one giving them due attention and consideration can form an independent and satisfactory judgment.

In the North the horror of the negro is deep and abiding. It is not on account of the colour of the skin, for there is no such dislike to the Indian. Americans are not ashamed of an alliance with Indians, 'but let it be known that there is even one infinitesimal drop of blood of Central Africa flowing in the veins of an American, and it were better for that man that he had never been born' Of the hundred hotels of New York, there is not one in which the negro can obtain a bed, unless he is engaged on the establishment as a cook or waiter. 'He may cook every meal; he can't eat one out of the kitchen. He may stand behind the chair; he must not sit at the table.' Some years ago Barnum engaged a genuine negro to dance, but before he dare present him to a Northern audience he was obliged to disguise him so that he appeared like a counterfeit negro. In the South there is none of this feeling, except as to the amalgamation of the races, because the Southerner associates with the coloured race from his infancy. But it is a work of supererogation to show that the negro is kindly treated in the South and hated in the North.

Dr. Nichols brings out a fact that deserves special notice. A Society is being organised in the United States for promoting the amalgamation of the negro and white races, though we are confident that the most advanced Abolitionist would be indignant and disgusted at the idea of his daughter marrying a negro. And this disgust is natural and well-founded. In America, the pure-blooded negro attains the greatest longevity of any race, and, on the other hand, the mulattoes, the offspring of the negro and white, are the shortest-lived race. In Philadelphia, the deaths of coloured people to those of the whites is 196 to 100, and in the penitentiaries 316 to 100. In the North the coloured race has hardly increased at all, whilst in the South the black race has increased from half a million to four millions. In the North, and particularly in the New-England States, there has been an amalgamation of races, and the offspring, the mulattoes, have died out: in the South, the purity of the black race has been preserved, and it has increased eightfold. How a fact like this disposes of the Northern calumnies about Southern immorality, and at the same time exposes the way in which the negro has been debauched in the free States!

As to the moral and religious condition of the negroes in the South, we shall quote one fact, but that one is conclusive. Our author finds, from a late return of the Methodist Episcopal Church, that in Mississippi, Louisiana, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, there were 111,000 negro church members of that particular denomination. 'Allowing proportionate numbers in other States and to other denominations, the aggregate will be very large, reaching to at least half a million, and will show that there must be a powerful and pervading religious influence over the whole negro population.'

Dr. Nichols writes much more that is interesting and informing on the subject of negro slavery in the Confederate States. He discusses the question of secession, both theoretically and practically, in a very able manner. He cites numerous Northern authorities to prove that, before 1861, the North admitted and insisted upon the right of a State to go out of the Union. He gives a brief but clear summary of the resources of the country. Amidst the more serious portions of his work, he introduces some amusing narratives — such, for example, as accounts of the receptions given in New York to distinguished foreigners. But we have no space for further comment; and we therefore conclude this review by recommending those who want an amusing book, or who desire to be well informed of the character of the American people, to read Dr. Nichols's 'Forty Years of American Life.' It is rare indeed that we bestow such unmixed praise, and for the reason that we rarely meet with a work that so nearly merits unqualified commendation.

THE RECORD OF STARVATION.

(From the Times of March 12.)

SCARCE a day passes without there appearing in the papers, like a spot in the sun or a mote in the eye, a dismal little paragraph, headed 'Death from Starvation.' When some poor helpless and neglected creature has died at last, and must be buried, and his death accounted for in some fashion, then there is a gathering of neighbours, and an inquest, a verdict, and a nine days' indignation. It is the revenge which the weakest take at last, and must take. Simple as the story usually is, there is always a good deal to notice about it. One must be grateful to find that the most miserable and forlorn unit in our two or three millions all under one smoke cannot fall to the ground without being observed, and even lamented. Then it must be said that there is generally, if not always, an apparent absence of reason for the death, though, as we shall presently see, a significant and very suggestive absence of reason. The story reads as if there was no lack of social machinery of some sort. Poor Laws, officers of charity, asylums for poverty, sound roles, and neighbourly kindness, all frustrated by some accident, or personal quality in this instance, that defied all attempts to do good, whether those of the State or the smaller acts of private kindness. Many readers stop at that point, pause on the subject no longer, and pass on lightly to the description of a new war steamer, a railway work, or a Royal ceremony. But a very trifling and intelligible incident may show, like a straw, which way the wind lies, or may suggest, like Newton's falling apple, most serious and important speculations. If there was no occasion that these poor creatures should die of starvation, why did they die? What was the want in our system, or the neutralising cause, that did such sad work, when to our imagination all had been done that could be done? When a shed, or a hovel, or a thing of lath and plaster tumbles down, or cracks, or leans, we expect it, and are not alarmed. But when we have built for ages, laid our foundations deep and strong, and spared neither brick nor iron, but nevertheless detect the ugly 'settlement' stealing through the solid masonry, and threatening to rive the whole edifice in twain, then we are alarmed, because it ought not to have been so, and because the fullest enquiry brings out the important truth that nobody was to blame. We shudder at the calamity which we did our utmost to avert, and which certainly ought not to have been. We shudder, because it betrays the working of influences that we had not taken into account. A new power intrudes into our little sphere, which we had so thoroughly mastered, which we had so fully arranged, so amply provided for.

The 'death from starvation' yesterday was that of a dressmaker, aged 50, who had presented herself to a lodginghouse-keeper, who knew nothing about her, at Edmonton, last year. Her landlord allowed her to fall into arrears with her rent — sixpence a week — offered her food and fuel, which she refused, saying she had her own, and when, finally, he perceived from her moans that something was amiss, forced the door, found her dying, gathered the neighbours, and sent to the workhouse. The people there took their time about it, and only sent for the poor creature when she was indeed at the point of death. She had an ulcer on her foot, but there is no doubt, from the report of the medical officer, that she died from want of food. The Coroner animadverted very properly on the inhumanity of the officials in leaving her seven hours in such a condition. One feels, however, that a neglect, or stupidity, or delay, comprised within seven hours, cannot be the worst incident in such a story, except as showing probably that the world was the same to the end, as it generally is with poor creatures of this sort. Charlotte Hampton was very proud, the neighbours said. She was at once above and below her lot, for she would not accept relief but could not help falling into debt, and could not do or keep her work. But what a story was there if one did but know it! After 50 long years all she had was her pride. She had lost property, friends, employment, health, strength, and the commonest power of taking care of herself, and all that remained was the sense that she had been something, and ought still to be something, and, if she had her right, would be beholden to nobody. We may suppose, if we please, that she had been self-willed, headstrong, perverse, ill-tempered, disagreeable, and a good deal more: but we have an equal right to suppose that she had suffered all the wrongs that women are pretty sure to suffer if they have none to protect them, or, what is even worse, if they have none but weak and wrong-headed protectors. We know nothing about her, except that she was too proud to thank the landlord of the lodginghouse for a meal or a little warmth, but that her pride did not save her from dying in a workhouse.

The other day there was a 'death from starvation' and pride, with some striking differences. Naomi Norman died from rupture of the heart, accelerated by want of food, warmth, and clothing, at 63 years of age. She had not been able to work for many years, but she had a sister who gave her a shilling a week, as much as she could spare. She had another shilling a week and a loaf from the parish, but she had to pay 9*d.* a week for her lodging, leaving, at the most, 1*s.* 3*d.* and her loaf to live on. But she kept within limits, and had a stock on hand. That she died of cold and want was evident, but there were found in her box two gowns, and a little bacon, tea, and sugar. She had often said she would never enter the workhouse—she would rather starve to death. Whatever may be said as to the sufficiency of the outdoor allowance, it was not enough to sustain life, even with an amount of private assistance that few of the poor can afford to give an old relation. Another 'death from starvation' is that of a labourer, destitute and ill, and therefore incapable of work. Though only 32, he looked 60. He had been sleeping about the streets for several nights in succession, miserably clad. He was carried to the workhouse to die there; and it was then found that the whole system—head, brains, spinal cord, chest, and lungs—was in that state that he could not have worked, and had wanted nursing. Of course, that poor man wanted somebody to tell his ailments to, and to be believed; and, wanting that, he died. The fourth 'death from starvation' in our columns the last week is that of a Sarah Dove. Her husband was a casual labourer at the docks, earning, when employed, 2*s.* 6*d.* a day. What he got on the average is not stated. His wife had to maintain herself and two growing daughters, and to pay 2*s.* 9*d.* a week for rent out of the precarious allowance. She had had asthma for years, could not work herself, and wanted proper food, as well as bed and body clothing. At last she obtained an order for medical attendance, and as soon as the district surgeon had made himself acquainted with her case he said that she must go into the parish infirmary. The Bethnal Green authorities, however, would not take her into the workhouse without her husband and children. The husband would not go in, and the wife was sacrificed to the economic rules of the Union, and the personal pride and independence of the husband. As everybody will feel that the husband was right under the circumstances in preferring to work and keep the children out of the workhouse, it follows that in a case very likely to occur, and not at all reflecting on the sufferer, the rules of the Union must inevitably involve lamentable and unmerited death. The humane portion of the British public will regard such a result with something more than sorrow. They will wish to see its recurrence guarded against, as far as possible. We feel sure they will join in the verdict, which deserves to be repeated in this place. It was, 'That the deceased, Sarah Dove, died from the effects of exhaustion, consequent on continued want of food, clothing, and warmth; and the jury are of opinion that the husband was not solely wanting in care over his wife; that Mr. Cowley was to blame for not having made himself fully acquainted with the deceased's condition on his first visit; that Rowney Otheris ought immediately to give admission to a patient on the recommendation of the medical officer; that as the present case has developed defects in the law empowering relief that in such cases the relief of the workhouse is inadequate and not properly adapted to its end, as it has been thereby verified; and the jury request that the Coroner forward this verdict to the Poor Law Board.'

CONFEDERATE CAPTURE OF AMERICAN VESSELS.

(From the New York Daily News.)

A DOCUMENT of unusual interest was lately published in the Congressional proceedings, which gives an alphabetical list of vessels captured by Confederate privateers reported up to January 30, 1864, with the port of clearance, destination, place of capture, and tonnage, prepared by Captain J. H. Upton, Secretary American Shipmasters' Association. This list, far from being complete, we think gives as the total number of vessels captured 193: total tonnage 89,704: value of vessels at fifty dollars per ton, $4,485,200: cargoes at one hundred dollars per ton, $8,970,100: total value, $13,455,300. Of the vessels thus captured, thirty-five were from New York, and their tonnage was 19,361, which, at the estimate given in the table, amounted to $968,050; the cargo to $1,936,100. Twenty-three of the captured vessels cleared for New York, the tonnage of which amounted to 12,312, worth $615,600; the cargo, $1,231,200. Thus, in tonnage to and from New York, there has been a loss of $1,583,650, in cargo, of $3,167,300, showing a total loss of $3,755,950, caused by the few vessels of the Confederate navy, so often sneered at by those whose voice is still for war, as long as a shoddy contract is to be given, or shoulder-straps bestowed as a reward for supporting the Administration.

With but a limited commerce, the Confederates have suffered comparatively little in comparison with our own shipping interest. Of the one hundred and ninety-three vessels thus captured, all save seventy-four fell a prey to the three famed Confederate steamers, Alabama, Sumter, and Florida: the Alabama capturing sixty-two, the Sumter twenty-six, and the Florida twenty-two—in all, one hundred and nineteen vessels, by three Confederate cruisers.

With but a limited commerce, the South, in the loss of vessels, has suffered comparatively nothing. Most of the blockade-runners captured by the Federal fleet were owned in England. Two successful trips, at the high prices the South pays for English goods, will pay for loss of vessel and cargo in a third unsuccessful voyage, and still leave a large margin of profit. While the people of the United States are taxed, and the Treasury bled to the amount of more millions, to build and buy ships and support the navy, than it would cost to pay the whole expenses of the Government in time of peace, still we have the record of Captain Upton to show a loss of one hundred and ninety-three vessels, worth in vessel and cargo over thirteen-and-a-half million dollars. The Confederate Government scarce pretend to have a navy, and all they have has been improvised since the war commenced. Over one-half of the vessels captured were prizes to a single vessel—the Alabama—which the Federal navy has been in pursuit of since first she was launched, but managed never to catch. The loss is startling; yet great as it is, we doubt not if the whole truth were told it would be much greater.

NAVAL RECOGNITION.—Notwithstanding the fact that the Great European Powers still withhold the political recognition of the Southern States of America, in every other respect they are fast receiving the justice due to them. Socially they have been long recognised by the civil and revenue regulations of all countries, their commercial status is universally acknowledged upon the same basis as an independent Power (by being recognised belligerents), and we see by the last number of Marryat's naval signals for 1864, just received in Nassau, that their different standards are engraved and displayed in that work along with those of other independent Powers, as entitled to respect and recognition. This latter fact also embraces the privilege of insurance and the maritime rights consequent thereunto.—Bahama Herald.

PRESIDENT DAVIS.—In 1860, Mr. Jefferson Davis made a speech at Vicksburg, Miss. Little did he think, while graphically painting the wrongs of the South, what a series of struggles that gallant little city would witness. He said: —'If Mississippi, in her sovereign capacity, decides to submit to the rule of an arrogant and sectional North, then I will sit down as one whose brand of infamy and degradation has been written, and bear my portion of the bitter trial. But if, on the other hand, Mississippi decides to resist the hands that would tarnish the bright star which represents her on the national flag, then I will come at your bidding, whether by day or by night, and pluck that star from the galaxy, and place it upon the crest of battle, and, gathering around me a nucleus of Mississippi's best and bravest, will welcome the invader to the harvest of death; and future generations will point to a small hillock upon our border which will tell the reception which the invader met upon our soil.'

MEXICO.—Notwithstanding the knowledge professed in some quarters of the alleged private intention of the Archduke Maximilian not to proceed to Paris, and of a proximate renunciation by him of the Mexican throne, the Archduke has arrived, and there is no renunciation at all. In this respect, therefore, our often-expressed anticipations have been fully borne out by the facts. As regards the alleged postponement of the public and official completion of the act of acceptance until His Highness's return to Miramar—a delay which has given rise to a number of other wise predictions—we certainly do not see how so solemn and important a proceeding could be expected to take place in a foreign country. On the contrary, we consider the Duke would necessarily wait until his return home before receiving the deputation, and putting the irrevocable seal to that which is already virtually concluded. With regard to the financial part of this question, we can only express our belief that nothing has as yet been concluded, and we would especially counsel bonâ-fide holders of Mexican Bonds to place no credence in the countless rumours which are circulated, but to rest content with the fact that their claims are now transferred from a worthless Government to one whose very existence will depend on a just and proper estimate of the responsibilities they have assumed with the acquisition of the country.—Money Market Review.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through HENRY HOTZE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 3s. 6d. payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. HOPKINS, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 17, 1864.

The Spring Campaign.

IT is once more our pleasing task to record a series of reverses to the Northern armies, as decisive, if not as disastrous, as any that have befallen the invading hordes since the war began. North, south, east, and west, their generals have pressed forwards and been heralded with such glowing anticipations of overwhelming success, as are to be met with only in the columns of the Yankee press; and everywhere they have encountered resistance, and marched but to defeat. The spring campaign, it is now admitted by the Northern authorities, both in Virginia and in the South-west, has been an utter failure—but a failure which will assuredly stamp the operations of the year with its own aspect, and materially influence the struggle yet to come. The Federals may be said to have made an attack along the whole Confederate line. The right wing, under General LEE, menaced by MEADE in front, was further assailed by two large bodies of cavalry operating on both its flanks. The centre, under General JOHNSTON, at Dalton, was threatened by the direct advance of General GRANT's army from Chattanooga; whilst the left was imperilled by SHERMAN's and GRIERSON's columns moving upon Alabama in parallel lines from Vicksburg, and along the Memphis and Charleston railroad. To add to the formidable nature of the attack, Mobile was assailed by a powerful flotilla under Admiral FARRAGUT, and may be said almost to have been taken in reverse by the landing of a Federal army in Florida, which threatened the left flank of the Confederate line, and had in fact turned it. This was, we presume, the grand project, the result of General GRANT's deliberations during the winter months, which was announced with so much confidence as the spring programme. We pointed out, a week or two ago, that it was one of those magnificent hallucinations which have never yet achieved anything but disgrace and ridicule for their originators. The idea of invading half a continent with four or five big armies, of operating against a line some 1,000 miles in length, by detached bodies never less than 500 miles apart, is a taking one with the Northern people, but is singularly illustrative of the utter want of generalship which has characterised their conduct of the war. Everybody familiar with modern history knows what grand schemes of conquest have been marred, and what brilliant combinations have been upset by the impossibility of moving brigades and divisions of troops with the regularity and precision of pieces on the chessboard, even on such a circumscribed field as the plains of Lombardy or the marshes of the Ticino. But where there are distances to be traversed, such as no modern general has attempted, primeval forests to be penetrated, rivers to be bridged, an entire army to be maintained, and with no supplies to be had, except such as are transported thousands of miles, and will 'give out' the first week's march from the base of operations, it is little less than a certainty that the whole affair will end in failure and confusion, as it has done in the present instance.

The movement which was surrounded with the greatest mystery, and, as a natural consequence, inspired the greatest amount of alarm, was SHERMAN's advance from Vicksburg. The Northern journals estimated his force at 35,000 men, and GRIERSON's cavalry, which was to cooperate with him, at 10,000. All that we know of SHERMAN's army is that it reached Meridian. A rumour was current, and of course readily believed in New York, that it had penetrated as far as Selma and was bound for Montgomery, Alabama. That was too extravagant, however, to disquiet any one who knew the distance of the march, and the impossibility of feeding an army of 35,000 men. How under such circumstances he was to find his way to Selma or Mobile, it is not easy to see. Luckily for himself and his army, he, too, adopted the prudent resolve of retreating in time, and is already reported to have arrived at Vicksburg. The details of his march will be highly interesting, if they are ever allowed to reach the public, after all that has been written about the weakness of the South. It was supposed that SHERMAN would make a new military programme, that with Charleston and Mobile threatened, with Florida invaded, and with JOHNSTON watching GRANT at Chattanooga, there wanted nothing to oppose the triumphant march of the Federals into the heart of the country, and that the troops could subsist for a week on the scant verdure of the month of February, in the sunny South. GRIERSON's cavalry did not fare well. Assailed within a few miles of Memphis by small bodies of Confederate horse, under MOSLEY and LEE, it struggled on to West Point, Mississippi, firing homesteads, destroying grain, pulling up railroads, with the Confederates every day growing in numbers and audacity, until at last its progress was partly arrested; and after some desperate fighting, a retrograde movement began. From all that we can learn, this movement partook very much of the nature of a rout, the Federals losing many officers and men and three cannon, and only stopping in their flight when they reached the defences of Memphis. After this breakdown, SHERMAN's position was obviously one of extreme peril. His cavalry force was insignificant. Every mile he advanced, the numbers of his assailants increased. They hung upon his rear, cut off stragglers, plundered his very scanty train, and threatened him with absolute destruction. The results show how terribly the resources of the Confederacy have been underestimated. Not only does JOHNSTON confront THOMAS and drive him back beaten—not only are the Federals disgracefully whipped in Florida—but 50,000 Federals, moving through Mississippi, are resisted foot by foot, and eventually compelled to retreat, disgraced if not routed. Of GRIERSON's force we have heard the safe arrival. But we are curious to know if SHERMAN has really reached Vicksburg, and, if so, in what condition his troops marched in.

General GRANT's advance from Chattanooga was not more fortunate. As usual, the first accounts received in the North were most satisfactory. General SHERMAN was said to be driving all before him, General JOHNSTON being weakened by the withdrawal of two divisions despatched to the relief of General POLK. We know now that General JOHNSTON held his ground firmly; that something like a battle took place on the 23rd, 24th, and 25th ult.; and that, finally, General THOMAS fell back upon Chattanooga with an admitted loss of 2,000 men. The direct advance upon Dalton is not likely to be renewed. General THOMAS found the Confederates occupying an immensely strong position, which could only be taken by assault, and at such a tremendous cost as would effectually dispose of the army of the Cumberland for some years to come. Under these circumstances, the Federal force at Chattanooga is not likely to give any trouble for some time to come unless it turns northward. But it is to be expected that the Confederate commanders will avail themselves of the present spring to assume the initiative, and that General JOHNSTON will follow up the blow struck at Dalton by a movement against some portion of the Federal lines in Tennessee. The movements of LONGSTREET, which have for the last few weeks sorely puzzled the Yankees, may possibly result in a junction with the Confederate force at Dalton and a combined movement against Chattanooga. But we are still inclined to believe that Knoxville will be the point first assailed.

The Florida expedition fared still worse. Whether it was designed as a great political coup, or as part of 'Anaconda' scheme No. 2 invented by General GRANT, it has opened the campaign with a signal disaster for the North. It will be in the recollection of our readers that a considerable force detached from Charleston landed a few weeks ago in Florida, and marched inland. Rumour said that this force was to be followed by large reinforcements, and that Jacksonville was to become a new basis of operations against the Eastern States. It was thought that the 'rebels' would have enough to do at Mobile, in Alabama, and Mississippi, and Georgia, and that the march through Florida would be unopposed. Thoroughly confident, the Yankees marched up the country, and about forty-five miles north of Jacksonville encountered a large Confederate force. The Federal papers say that their army walked deliberately into a trap, and that the numbers were three to one. However this may be, it is certain that the contest was never an instant in doubt—that the Federals, though claiming a superior force of artillery, were driven from one position after another with fearful loss, and that when the fighting ceased, they were flying, a panic-stricken rabble, to their gunboats and defences at Jacksonville. The Federals admit the loss of 5 guns out of 16, although they state that the Confederates brought only 5 into the field; and they estimate their own loss at upwards of 1,200, a heavy proportion of the 5,000 said to have been engaged. At Jacksonville the Federals are tolerably safe, but they are not likely at present to renew the advance into the interior.

In the meantime, General MEADE had made another 'feint,' and two bodies of Federal cavalry had endeavoured to cut the communication of General LEE's army, and, if possible, reach Richmond. General CUSTER, with 1,500 troops, was so severely mauled as to be compelled to fall back upon his old quarters with all possible speed, and in imminent risk of capture. General KILPATRICK fared little better. He accomplished the destruction of a few hundred yards of the Virginia Central Railway, with the admitted loss of three colonels and 150 men, and succeeded, with some difficulty, in regaining the Federal lines, hotly pursued by Confederate cavalry. MEADE's 'feint,' we need hardly say, deceived nobody, and the only result is that he has been summoned with hot haste to a Council of War at Washington, presided over, of course, by Mr. LINCOLN. The disasters in Virginia conclude the series of mishaps. Since the memorable first battle of Bull Run there has been no such quick succession of reverses; and we can understand that the Council of War is somewhat nonplussed as to a new programme. Probably the North will now wait to be attacked, a prudent resolve, but somewhat inconsistent with its programme of invasion and conquest. How many more campaigns will be necessary to prove to the English public that Southern independence is established?

The Alleged Mallory Report.

THREE weeks ago the ATTORNEY-GENERAL read, from his place in Parliament, an extract purporting to be a part of the official Report of Mr. MALLORY, the Confederate Secretary of the Navy, which, he argued, fully justified the arbitrary course HER MAJESTY'S Government had seen fit to adopt towards the ship-building interest of this country. A short time afterwards, another high officer of the Crown, the SOLICITOR-GENERAL, also from his place in Parliament, announced that HER MAJESTY'S Government were about to address remonstrances to that of the Confederate States, on the evidence afforded by this same Report. A document which, on the one hand, serves as the best justification for a most dangerous, and in later years unprecedented stretch of executive power, and, on the other hand, warrants a step only short of actual hostilities towards a friendly foreign Government, is necessarily one of considerable importance, and of the origin and authenticity of which there should not exist even the possibility of a doubt. HER MAJESTY'S Ministers, indeed, do not appear to have entertained any doubt, and to have accepted the paper without hesitation as part of the public records of the Confederate States. Now it is remarkable that no publication authorised by the Government of those States comprises a document of this character or one even resembling it, nor does any one pretend to have seen an official copy. It is still more remarkable that no newspaper in the Confederacy has published it, and yet it is not alleged that the Report is a secret one intercepted or otherwise furtively obtained. It is further to be observed that the so-called Report is addressed to the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives, the lower branch of the Confederate Legislature—a mode of address which is not only inexplicable on the face of it, but which is actually in violation of the usages and the Constitution of the Confederate States, every Cabinet Minister, excepting the SECRETARY of the TREASURY, being responsible, not to the Congress, but to the PRESIDENT, to whom alone they report on the subject of their official duties. These facts, coupled with the extreme improbability of the Confederate SECRETARY of the NAVY, at such a critical juncture, and with so many political and judicial issues pending, voluntarily presenting his enemies with all the evidence against himself which they had heretofore failed in obtaining, were, to say the least, not circumstances in favour of the presumptive genuineness of this questionable document. But this is not all. On January 29, shortly after its first republication in this country from the Federal newspapers, Captain M. F. MAURY, one of the most distinguished officers of the Confederate naval service, emphatically denounced it as a forgery, in a letter of that date, which appeared in the Herald, the Standard, and other London journals. Surely, Captain MAURY may be assumed to be a competent judge of the genuineness of a document purporting to emanate from his own official superior, and his world-wide reputation may be accepted as a guarantee that he would not stake it on a hasty assertion, much less a knowingly false one.

Thus, then, so far as the public knew, when the correspondence on the Birkenhead iron-clad vessels was, after a protracted struggle, laid before Parliament, there was not only no evidence of any kind of the genuineness of the alleged Report, but there was a direct and public denial of its genuineness, in the most emphatic terms, by a man to whom the whole civilised world by common accord assigns one of the foremost places among his contemporaries. We naturally open the Blue Book on North America, No. 5, with much curiosity to ascertain what rebutting testimony induced Her Majesty's Ministers, in spite of so many suspicious circumstances, to give unqualified credence to the impugned paper. We find that they obtained their information from two sources. On December 24 Lord Lyons transmits, with short comments, an extract from the Washington Star of December 19, headed, 'A Miserable Couple—Memminger and Mallory in a Muddle.' This, in Lord Lyons' language, 'purports to be part of a Report of the Secretary of the so-called Confederate Treasury and Navy.' We will not stop to notice the uncalled-for discourtesy of this allusion to a Government whose de facto existence and functions no one, at Washington at least, has a right to dispute, and the still greater discourtesy of making a newspaper article of so scandalous a style the subject of diplomatic comment. On the 31st of the same month, Lord Lyons writes again, and transmits—what? Another newspaper extract. This time, the New York Times is his authority, and any latent doubts appear to have been removed. Without stating the reasons for his positive assertion, he 'has the honour' to enclose 'a complete copy of the Report of the Secretary of the so-called Confederate Navy.' Three days after the receipt of this, Mr. Adams transmits the same extract, in the same form, to the Foreign Office. He, however, is more guarded in his language introducing it. If the document is forged or garbled, and Her Majesty's Government choose to accept it as genuine, his, at least, will not be the fault. Here are his very words:

> I have the honour to submit to your consideration a copy of what purports to be the Annual Report of Mr. S. R. Mallory, the person who is known to be officiating as director of the naval operations of the insurgents in the United States. Although this paper has been received only in the form here presented, I entertain little doubt that in substance it may be relied upon as authentic.

This is literally every tittle of reason that Her Majesty's Government have yet been able to adduce, for receiving as part of the public records of a friendly nation, and as a basis for acrimonious remonstrances with that nation, a paper which first saw the light of day in a press notorious for unparalleled falsehood and systematic forgery—a paper which has been disclaimed by the highest authority in Europe competent to do so. Even the man who of all others had the greatest interest in assuming the authenticity of this paper, the representative of a country in deadly feud with the Confederate States, who had just bullied this Government into acting without that evidence which this paper pretended to supply, even he did not venture to accept it without such reservations as virtually to destroy all its diplomatic or judicial value. 'In substance' the Report may be authentic, for if there is a Report of the Secretary of the Navy, it must have recited events which are a part of history, and known to all the world, and which a forger must needs have embodied. But the omission of a sentence, or the interpolation of one, or the change of a phrase, might so alter the whole import of the document, as to make it a base fabrication, while 'in substance' it would still remain 'authentic.' Is there a court of justice in any country where such a paper, under such circumstances, would be admitted as evidence? It is precisely as though a defendant was convicted of an offence on the evidence of a confession produced by his accuser without even the pretence that it was in his handwriting, and without the shadow of proof to combat his disclaimer of it. Not so reasons Earl Russell. In his reply to Mr. Adams, he does not say that he cannot take cognisance without further investigation of a paper so questionable in its form, so uncertain in its origin, so wholly unvouched for on one side, so emphatically denied on the other. On the contrary, he quotes from the document, and it 'appears to Her Majesty's Government to contain the strongest proof,' &c. And 'Her Majesty's Government are fully sensible of the nature and importance of the admissions made in Mr. Mallory's Report,' &c.; and 'Her Majesty's Government have already taken steps,' &c.

Is there an Englishman so infatuated with the beauties of Mr. Bright's 'warm neutrality,' that he does not blush for the want of dignity and decorum here exhibited? Suppose the document to be precisely what Mr. Adams wishes it to be believed without vouching for it, was it consistent, not merely with the courtesy due to another State, but with self-respect, to accept it in this form and on such evidence, and to proceed to semi-hostile measures on the strength of it? In private life, would a gentleman use a paper thus obtained against an enemy, much less against a professed friend? The very necessity under which the Goverment felt to defend themselves against the constant attacks on their policy towards the ship-building interest, and to sustain themselves under the repeated checks this policy has suffered in the courts of law, obliged them in decency to avoid the suspicion of seizing over-hastily and unscrupulously a weapon which there was too great and obvious a temptation to use.

We will still, for the sake of argument, suppose the genuineness of the Report, although every naval officer of the Confederate Government in Europe avers his inability to reconcile the statements it contains with the knowledge he has of the operations and plans of his Government. We will so suppose, because we wish to direct attention to a fact which the curious incidents of the publication appear to have caused to be forgotten. On this supposition of genuineness, then, what ground for remonstrance does the Report afford? Earl Russell distinctly states that he will remonstrate against 'the endeavours of the Government of the so-styled Confederate States, by their agents in this country, to violate in various ways Her Majesty's neutrality.' If Mr. Mallory's Report is correctly given, he has expressly enjoined upon his agents to take 'precautions against contravening the laws of England.' Now what the laws of England are in regard to the building of ships that may be subsequently fitted for belligerent uses, and whether any of these laws have been heretofore violated, form at this moment questions under the consideration of the highest judicial tribunal in the land, and which, so far as yet decided, have been decided adversely to the position taken by Earl Russell. The most able and effective advocate of his peculiar form of neutrality, the Saturday Review, admits that the laws, as they at present stand, have been violated, not by the ship-builders or the Confederates, but by Earl Russell himself, and justifies him on the ground of political necessity which required a modification of the laws, and the introduction of a new and heretofore unthought-of article into the international code. But even when the question is thus removed from the judicial to the political arena, it has not yet been decided by the Parliament or the country, and Earl Russell has not yet ventured to ask for a sanction of his course on these grounds. What possible pretext for remonstrance, then, can this Report give, even supposing it genuine? On that supposition, it is an admission, most opportune for Earl Russell's purpose, that the rams in the Mersey do, or did at one time, belong to the Confederate Government; but what else? That the Confederates are anxious and trying to build ships in England, if they can do so without contravening the laws? This has never been denied, and could not be, unless the existence of the Alabama and the Florida was equally denied. If the building of ships is to be ground for remonstrance, why has not Earl Russell remonstrated before? Why wait, having such very palpable facts as ships actually at sea and cruising, for such extremely unsafe and more than doubtful ones as two unfinished hulks of disputed ownership? And, remonstrating at last, what is he to remonstrate about? That Mr. Mallory, through his agents, has done what neither the courts of justice, nor Parliament, nor the country, have yet construed any law to forbid, and which, by Earl Russell's own admission in words and deeds, the laws, as they now stand, are insufficient to prevent? We remember having seen the identical suggestion, that if legal measures failed the Government, its diplomatic powers were under less inconvenient restrictions, thrown out many months ago in a letter of Historicus to the Times, while Earl Russell still held out against Mr. Adams's gentle persuasion. Is it possible that Historicus, not Earl Russell, is the real Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs?

We have only one word more to say about this correspondence now laid before Parliament. On Mr. Adams's part it evinces certainly greater diplomatic ability than we had given him credit for. He thoroughly understands his man, and treats him accordingly. When he wants a favour, he asks many times as much as he expects will be conceded, and does so in threatening tones. The things that are not granted and were not expected, he quietly allows Earl Russell to plume himself upon as triumphs of his, Earl Russell's, surpassing diplomacy. An amusing illustration of this amiable arrangement occurs in the two last despatches. Mr. Adams had the astonishing impudence to flatly request of the Foreign Secretary that the agents of the Confederate Government should be dismissed from the soil of Great Britain and her dependencies. Earl Russell could not quite do this, but so far from resenting the insult, his refusal is couched in the politest, almost apologetic, terms. 'Her Majesty's dominions must necessarily continue to be open to the subjects of both belligerents.' 'But' he promises to enforce the laws to the fullest extent upon the subjects of either. How this but is meant to soften the refusal we learn from the eulogistic apology made by Earl Russell in the House of Lords for the Yankee captain who at Queenstown shipped seventeen British seamen without knowing it, though they 'passed the doctor,' received rations, and were afterwards landed in the United States uniform. There is a personal feeling of spite and dislike to the Confederates, a readiness to find them in fault and to excuse their adversaries, which is scarcely disguised in this correspondence, which has recently manifested itself more and more often in the utterances of the noble Lord and some of his colleagues, and which is the least excusable feature of the American policy of the Foreign Secretary.

The masterpiece of this correspondence, however, is the following brief despatch from Mr. Layard to Mr. Stuart, Her Majesty's Chargé-d'Affaires at Washington, written the very day that Mr. Adams's threatening despatch of same date was received, and three days before Earl Russell informed him in three lines that the threat had succeeded. We give it in full:—

> Foreign Office, February 5.
> We have given orders to-day to the Commissioners of Customs at Liverpool to prevent the two iron-clads leaving the Mersey. These orders had scarcely been sent when we received the note from Mr. Adams, of which I send you a copy. Mr. Adams is not yet aware that orders have been given to stop the vessels. You may inform Mr. Seward confidentially of the fact.

What an admirably-placed feather-bed for British honour in this desperate leap to light upon! Of course this refutes all the malicious inferences which evil-minded persons would draw from the suspicious propinquity of dates, and the apparent relation of cause and effect between the Federal despatches and the seizure of the rams. Of course, we are not permitted to suspect this note as an afterthought. We have Mr. Layard's well-known veracity and candour as a guarantee that it belongs just into the place where it fits so well, in the correspondence. Mr. Layard says so, or at least implies so—

> And Brutus in an honourable man.

The Empire of Mexico.

The Archduke Maximilian's brief visit to this country concludes his leave-taking of Old World Royalty. In a few days he will take his place among the crowned monarchs of the earth, and only a few days more will see him on his way to the most gorgeous dominion of the New World. In spite of sneers, doubts, and evil prophecies, the far-seeing plans of the French Emperor have thus far met with a success which the most unfriendly-disposed towards him cannot dispute; and the curtain drops on the first act of a drama which, in grandeur of conception and magnificence of incident, bids fair to be unsurpassed in modern history. Even yet the matter-of-fact temper of our age is slow to comprehend the full importance of the revolution which the last three years have been rapidly accomplishing on the Transatlantic Continent, and of which the regeneration of Mexico is a necessary, though in some respects an incidental part. But French policy may at least triumph in the universal admission that the Mexican Empire is now a living and recognised fact. The bitterest of its enemies in English journalism is forced to concede this much, and oddly enough predicts for the new monarchy additional vitality from the only and highly improbable event which its friends consider a serious danger. 'By the aid of the banished generals and dispersed armies of the Southern Confederacy,' the Daily News thinks that 'a new balance of power on the American continent' may be established by Mexico. We quote the passage for the small but valuable truth it contains. Generals such as Lee and Longstreet, and armies such as theirs, would indeed be an accession of strength to any country; but if they failed in rescuing their own inheritance from the clutch of the Northern spoiler, they could not save a foreign land. The grain of truth lies in this, that whenever peace solemnises the independence of the South, there must be great numbers of veteran soldiers, and many able and experienced commanders, who will prefer a service promising military activity to the tame routine of civil life. The South will not, for this generation, require a disproportionately large standing army, her whole population being trained to arms and ready at the first alarm. She can supply, therefore, from her abundance one of the greatest wants of her neighbouring State; and the relations of the two countries are likely to be of so closely intimate a character as to make the cause of one virtually the cause of the other. The News, therefore, has hit unconsciously upon the suggestive fact, that, once Confederate independence secured from all danger, whoever attacks Mexico will have to fight the best native soldiers of America.

The military power of the young Empire thus established beyond a doubt, there is only one other vital want to be supplied, and that is credit. In this respect Mexico is in the position of a spendthrift, who, having unbounded estates, has mortgaged every inch of them, owes everybody, and has not the wherewithal to buy a meal. Even this, the most serious difficulty, may be overcome with a little patience and good management. No country on the habitable globe has been so bounteously favoured by Nature. A geographical situation unequalled in its facilities for commerce, a healthful mountain climate, an inexhaustible soil, and fabulous mineral wealth, all unite in forming what the writers of the Middle Ages, with very little stretch of poetic fancy, described as El Dorado. Says a French writer, from whose excellent pamphlet on 'La Question Mexicaine' we have before had occasion to quote: 'When the indigenous civilisation of which Mexico was the cradle when CORTEZ landed on its shores, crumbled under the rude contact with Europe, what remained of its fragments and ruins sufficed to make Spain for a time the foremost maritime and commercial nation. In spite of the most rapacious and improvident administration, Mexico continued for four centuries to pour treasure into the lap of the Old World. It is not more than forty years since argosies laden with the precious metals still crossed the Spanish main. During these forty years steam, electricity, mechanism, have realised miracles of swiftness, accuracy, saving of labour and of time—have a hundredfold increased man's power to develope the resources of the soil. Striking contrast! Precisely during these forty years, which to the rest of the world opened a new era of progress and prosperity, Mexico has to record only anarchy, disorder, intestine wars. Once the proud queen, whom great potentates sought as a bride, she became a beggar, despised and despicable. But her elysian climate is still there, the perennial spring still reigns in those tropical Alps, her fertile soil preserves its pristine freshness, the bowels of her mountains are still pregnant with the choicest treasures of Nature's laboratory. Like the enchanted palace of the fairy tale, she awaits but the touch of the magic wand to spring again into life and prosperous activity. And if the past, with means so defective, and used with so little intelligence, has done so much for the country, what may we not expect from the future, aided by the appliances of modern civilisation!' The answer to all the evil auguries about Mexico is written in this passage. If it was the richest country before steam and electricity had been forced into man's service—if all the natural elements of wealth are still there—why should they not come forth more plentifully than of old at the bidding of those powerful agents? Only a few years ago California and Texas were desolate, scarcely inhabited Mexican provinces. The magic wand of which the author speaks, touched them, and lo, the one becomes the land of gold, the other the land of cotton.

It is a characteristic of our time that we are prone to forget the past and to despise its lessons. Thus, Mexico in the mind of the masses of our generation is associated only with wretchedness, brigandage, and debt. Of what it once was and what it may be again, few have any distinct impression. We have always thought that the unpopularity attaching to the Mexican expedition in France, and the indifference with which it has been generally regarded elsewhere, were mainly due to the neglect of the proper means of popularising information concerning the country. The surprising success of the expedition up to this point will do much to direct public interest to that quarter. Brains and capital, the adventurous and the prudent, will soon experience the attractions of an irresistible temptation: and we doubt whether any colony now open to the European emigrant will be able to compete within the next few years with Mexico in seducing alike the imaginations of those who have nothing to lose and the expectations of those who risk much to gain more. There can be no fear of the finances of such a country, and a brief period of quiet, which only the consciousness of solid strength at home and abroad can give, is all it needs.

In the bright horoscope we have cast for the nascent empire, we have left out of consideration, as wholly unworthy of notice, a suggestion which has of late been frequently repeated. This suggestion, as impolitic as it is base, is, that Mexico might purchase external tranquillity by committing herself beforehand to act the part of a treacherous neighbour to the Southern States. There are those who actually believe that the French EMPEROR has entered into a compact with the Washington Government at the expense of the just rights and legitimate title of the Confederacy. In one respect, we admit, such a convention would be flattering to French amour propre, which might justly claim that while England had purchased peace with the North at the price of bitter humiliation, the North had humbled itself to purchase peace of France. But so far as the North could offer any valuable quid pro quo in the transaction, the idea is simply absurd. Pending the present war, the hostility of the North is harmless, and it would cheaply exchange recognition of the Mexican Empire for non-recognition of the South. But if the subjugation of its enemy left it with a victorious unemployed army, what would restrain the rapacity and the arrogance of a people then more than ever confirmed in their delusion that they were the providentially appointed rulers of a Continent? Even if an Administration had gained credit for such a shrewd Yankee bargain, and was disposed to respect it, would not, at the termination of its four years of power, a President be elected on the express pledge of repudiating an engagement no longer profitable or convenient? The French EMPEROR is too sagacious a statesman to commit so gross and fatal a blunder; and if the North flatters itself that any diplomatic nods and winks or a few vague phrases have bound him hand and foot, we may rest tolerably sure that in the end not France, but Mr. LINCOLN and his advisers, have been overreached and outwitted. The writer in the Daily News, who speaks of banished Southern generals and dispersed Southern armies supporting the Mexican Empire, evidently hugs some such delusion, and is scarcely able to disguise the premature triumph of Yankee astuteness over French diplomacy. In him this is to be expected and excused; but when friends of either Mexico or the South give currency to such a suggestion, they plant a fruitful seed of discord and distrust between both countries. The worst enemy of Mexico could do her no more fatal injury than by associating her regenerated existence in the minds of the Southern people with the cruel wrongs they are now enduring and will long thirst to avenge.

SLAVERY AND PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S PROCLAMATION.

By Hon. C. S. MORHEAD, ex-Governor of Kentucky.

No. II.

The subject of Slavery has very often been treated in this country in a manner to convey the idea to the uninformed mind that the Southern States were now engaged in reducing to bondage for the first time a race of people which happened to be in their power, and that the Northern States were heroically and magnanimously resisting the oppression. It is scarcely necessary to say that when the thirteen colonies succeeded in separating themselves from Great Britain, African slavery existed in them all. 'The Institution,' as it is called, was, perhaps, infused with more vigour in Massachusetts than in any of the other colonies, from her early code of rights, styled 'fundamentals,' by which the slave-trade and the bondage of negroes and Indians were legalised. Under this code, the African slave-trade at a very early period became a regular and not an unimportant branch of her foreign commerce. While she and other New-England States thus early and eagerly engaged in a lucrative slave-trade, capturing young Indians to be transported and sold as slaves in the West Indies, Virginia as persistently protested against their introduction into her territory. It is too well known to need particular citation, that her colonial legislature passed numerous laws forbidding their introduction, all of which were vetoed by the royal authority of the mother-country. This action on the part of England was the subject of frequent and of just remonstrance; and when the causes of complaint against the parent country were solemnly arrayed in the Declaration of Independence, a clause was contained in the original draft, as drawn by Mr. Jefferson, denouncing the King of Great Britain for prostituting his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or restrain the slave-trade, which was pronounced an execrable commerce, made more horrible by the effort to excite 'those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them by murdering the people on whom he also obtruded them; thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another.' This clause was struck out by Mr. Jefferson himself, and he has left to posterity the reason which induced him to do it in the following words:—'Our Northern brethren, I believe, felt a little tender under those censures; for though their people have very few slaves themselves, yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others.'

Prior to the adoption of the Declaration of Independence by the colonial Congress, the substance of the omitted clause above quoted was unanimously adopted by Virginia as one of the causes justifying the revolution. She complained of the King of Great Britain for 'prompting our negroes to rise in arms among us—those very negroes whom, by an inhuman use of his negative, he had refused us permission to exclude by law.'

As late as 1850, when her Constitution was revised, the same declaration of opposition to the slave-trade was made, and that the original importation had not been of her own choice, but in obedience to sovereign orders. If any one fact is clearly and conclusively established, it is that the Southern States are not responsible for the introduction of this foreign element of African slavery into their social organisation. It was forced upon them against their repeated and urgent protestations. It existed in every State when independence was achieved, and in every State but one when the Federal Constitution was adopted. In the Convention which framed that instrument, the States represented voting as such in all cases, the question of the foreign slave-trade naturally enough came up. Upon this subject there seem to have been three parties in that body—one for its immediate prohibition, another for tolerating it until the year 1800, and a third to the year 1808. The contest in the Convention was between these two designated periods. Seven States voted for the longest period, among which were Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and Connecticut; and four against it, among which were Virginia and Delaware. Maryland was equally divided, and gave no vote. But connected with the slavery clauses of the Constitution was the great and absorbing question of the regulation of commerce. The Constitution, as well remarked by Daniel Webster, was 'a series of mutual agreements or compromises'—mutual agreements made by sovereign States, 'one thing being yielded by the South, another by the North.' The Southern States were agricultural and not commercial. Their interest always was, what they think it now to be, free trade. It is not therefore surprising that, in the Convention which made the Constitution, they should have insisted on a clause which might protect them from oppression. Accordingly we find a proposition, offered by Charles C. Pinckney, of South Carolina, requiring the concurrence of a majority of two-thirds of each House to pass any law regulating commerce or navigation. This gave rise to an excited controversy between the sections. Every clause of the Constitution relating to slavery was assailed with some degree of acrimony, when Mr. Gouverneur Morris, of Pennsylvania, proposed that the whole subject should be committed, including the clauses relating to taxes on exports, and to a navigation act. 'These things,' said he, 'may form a bargain among the Northern and Southern States.'

The bargain was formed, and the result was that commerce and navigation were left to be regulated by an ordinary majority; that a provision was made that three-fifths of the slaves should be estimated in fixing the ratio of representation in the Federal Congress, and in the assessment of direct taxes—that those who escaped into another State should not be made free on account of any law existing in said State, but should be delivered up, on the application of the legal owner, and that the foreign slave-trade should not be prohibited until the year 1808. Mr. Webster, in speaking of this compromise, said: 'The South agreed to form a Government that should regulate commerce according to the wants and wishes of the Northern States, and when the Constitution went into operation, a commercial system was actually established on which has risen up the whole glory of New York and New England.' This commercial system was the result of the bargain suggested by Mr. Morris, South Carolina having agreed to yield the two-thirds restriction, and voting with the North.

What was done for the North under this compromise cannot be better told than in the language of Mr. Webster himself, in his speech to the young men of Albany, New York. 'What,' says he, 'did Congress do under Northern lead with Southern acquiescence? What did it do? It protected the commerce of New York and the Eastern States by preference, by discriminating tonnage duties; and that higher duty on foreign ships has never been surrendered to this day, except in consideration of a just equivalent. So in that respect, without grudging or complaint on the part of the South, but generously and fairly, not by way of concession, but in the true spirit of the Constitution, the commerce of New York and the New-England States was protected by the provisions of the Constitution to which I have referred. But this is not all.—Friends, fellow-citizens, men of New York! does this country not now extend from Maine to Mexico, and beyond? Have we not a State beyond Cape Horn, belonging to us, nevertheless, as part of our commercial system? And what does New York enjoy? What do Massachusetts and Maine enjoy? They enjoy the exclusive right of carrying on the coasting trade, from State to State on the Atlantic, and around Cape Horn to the Pacific . . . . . It is this right to the coasting trade, to the exclusion of foreigners, thus granted to the Northern States, which they have ever held, and of which up to this time there has been no attempt to deprive them; it is this which has employed so much tonnage and so many men, and given support to so many thousands of our fellow-citizens. Now what would you say, in this day of the prevalence of the notions of free trade—what would you say if the South and South-west were to join together to repeal this law? What would you say if they should join hands and resolve that these men of New York and New England, who put this slight on their interest, shall enjoy this exclusive privilege no longer—that they will throw it all open, and invite the Dane, the Swede, the Hamburger, and all the commercial nations of Europe who can carry cheaper, to come in and carry goods from New York coastwise on the Atlantic and to California on the Pacific? What would you say to that?'

In addition to this, a law was enacted, July 4, 1789, allowing a drawback on fish exported equal to the supposed quantity of salt used. In 1792 this drawback was changed to a direct bounty per ton on all vessels engaged in the fisheries, which has been continued to the present time. The Federal bounty on fishing-vessels amounts in the aggregate to $12,944,998, of which Massachusetts and Maine received $12,101,323.

The North being thus left, 'without grudging or complaint,' in the full and undisturbed enjoyment of every stipulation of the Constitution made for their benefit, it is not surprising that the people of the South should have had their passions excited to exasperation by continued vituperative denunciation against the free enjoyment of their part of the compact—at first, it is true, by a small party, but one which they saw year by year increasing in numbers and fanaticism, until that fanaticism became a political element, and finally culminated in the election of a sectional President for the purpose of arraying a common Government for all the States in antagonism to the property of nearly half the States composing a part of that Government. They saw 'Helper's impending crisis,' well known in the North as 'the Republican bible,' endorsed by sixty-eight members of the House of Representatives of the Federal Congress, and made the subject of a special letter of commendation by William H. Seward. In that book, the design of making an exterminating war against slaveholders is avowed. They are denounced as destitute 'of every spark of honour or magnanimity.' In speaking of immediate and unconditional emancipation, it exclaims: 'Compensation to slaveowners for their negroes! Preposterous idea! The suggestion is criminal—the demand wicked, unjust, monstrous, damnable! Shall we pat the bloodhounds for the sake of doing them a favour? Shall we fee these curs of slavery to make them rich at our expense? Pay these whelps for the privilege of converting them into decent, honest, upright men?' Such ribaldry would scarcely have attracted the notice of the South, but for the endorsement of the leaders of the revolutionary party in the North, and the emphatic commendation of Seward after having 'read it with deep attention.'

During the canvass which resulted in the election of Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Seward made a series of speeches in the North-west, in which he displayed such bitterness of feeling towards the South as could not fail to produce, as long as human nature remains as it is, its corresponding effect. At Lansing in Michigan, September 6, 1860, he announced the Republican policy to be 'to decrease and diminish slavery in all the States' as far as could be done within the limits of constitutional action; and this constitutional action was to be by disbanding the army of the United States, because he said 'that its only purpose was to prevent the freed and emancipated negroes in the Free States from entering and introducing civil war in the Slave States.' From this suggestive declaration it was evident that he was opposed to using the power of a common general Government to suppress a servile insurrection brought on through such an intimation from him by the freed and emancipated negroes in the North. This was, it is true, supremely ridiculous in the eyes of the South, but it was received as conclusive evidence of the malignant feelings of that party of which he was the acknowledged leader, and which was soon to come into power. But in the same speech he announced his purpose of abolishing the navy. No man in the South could object to an abstract opinion on such a subject; but when he gave his reason for the destruction of the navy, it manifested to the South that the common Government under the incoming dynasty was to be administered solely for the benefit of the Northern section, and that the interests, and the rights, and the protection of the Southern section constituting a portion of that common Government, were to be utterly ignored. He asks what do we keep up a navy for? 'There is not a nation on earth that dare attack any one of the Free States, if they were all separated and disunited from the Union. Not one: and yet we are keeping up a navy . . . . because if we provoke a foreign war, the Southern frontier is exposed to invasion from England, France, and Spain. That is the whole object of our navy. Have I not a right then to say that I would rather have no navy?'

In the same speech, he tells his hearers 'that one single Administration will settle the slavery question finally and for ever'—settle it, according to his suggestion, by raids similar to John Brown's, by exciting servile insurrection. I do not refer to these things for the purpose of setting forth the causes which brought about the existing revolution in the South—that is altogether foreign to my present design. I only wish to show the character of that violent hostility arrayed in the North against the Southern section of the then Union, and leave all calm and dispassionate minds to reflect upon the likelihood of changing by such means the feelings of the South upon the subject of slavery. It it were the humane and philanthropic object of the North really to ameliorate the condition of the slaves of the South, was the engendering of violent animosities between the sections the mode to do it?

The Republican press for many years teemed with the expressions, in speaking of the people of the South, 'nest of thieves, brigands, paupers, ruffians, assassins, barbarians, brutes, tyrants, scoundrels'—epithets which were not certainly very persuasive arguments to Southern minds. Jefferson, a statesman eminent for sagacity, and believed to be not adverse to emancipation, as early as 1821 spoke of the slavery question 'as a mere party trick.' He adds: 'They are taking advantage of the virtuous feelings of the people to effect a division of parties by a geographical line; they expect that this will insure them, on local principles, the majority they could never obtain on principles of Federalism.' I do not doubt that there are good men in the North who have been deluded and betrayed into political action through advantage being taken of their virtuous abhorrence of slavery by reckless and ambitious demagogues, the effect of which was the very reverse of what they hoped for.

The agitation in the North, as it was carried on, never had any other effect than that of binding more firmly the chains of slavery. I can state from my own personal knowledge, that when I first had a seat in the Legislature of my native State (Kentucky), now more than thirty-five years ago, a majority of one branch of that body was in favour of a system of gradual emancipation. The agitation in the North, however, became more envenomed and denunciatory, and their pulpits were filled with pugilistic divines, who, utterly regardless of their own sins and shortcomings, seemed only anxious about the sins of their neighbours. The natural repugnance to an offensive foreign interference in a matter which, by constitutional compact, belonged exclusively to themselves, produced such a revulsion of feeling, that when a Convention was called in 1850 to revise the Constitution of the State, not one delegate was elected in favour of emancipation on any terms, notwithstanding the powerful influence of Henry Clay, which had been considered almost omnipotent in the State, was thrown on that side. It is undeniable that the insane fury of the North not only retarded the emancipation movement in Kentucky, but produced, to some extent, the very opposite feeling in Maryland, Virginia, and Missouri. The North was the aggressive party, and the South threw itself naturally in a belligerent attitude of defence. In such a warfare of opinion, I am well aware that it would be unfair to take the extreme utterances on either side as a correct standard of public sentiment; but when twelve of the Northern States nullified, by solemn legislative enactment, the only law of Congress for the protection of the property of the South, in defiant disregard of the Constitution, the character of Northern aggression was certainly placed in a shape so tangible as to be no longer mistaken.

It was in vain that the North was told that slavery had been forced upon the South against its repeated protestations—that by Northern vote in the Convention of States which framed the Federal Constitution, the foreign slave-trade had been tolerated for twenty years for their exclusive benefit—that they had grown rich upon that commerce—that they were in the undisturbed enjoyment of all the advantages resulting from the stipulations of the Federal Constitution made for their benefit, and that if the compact was binding on one side, good faith and common justice required that it should be equally obligatory on the other. The South said, If you insist upon violating the compact between us by your unconstitutional interference in a matter which you have agreed was reserved for our own exclusive control, refund the money which you have received for the sale of your own slaves, and for those which during a period of twenty years you imported from Africa and sold us; give up your discriminating tonnage duties, your fishing bounties, your monopoly of the coasting trade, and your right to make a tariff for the protection of manufactures in which we are only interested by the enhanced price of the goods we buy—place us, in fine, where we stood before the compact between us was made, and you might then claim to come into the moral forum as one must go into a court of chancery, with 'clean hands.' However the question may have been argued on the one side or the other, slavery in the abstract has never been the issue between the contending sections. While incidental questions have sprung up, about some of which there might be an honest difference of opinion, the great and radical issue, so far as it relates to slavery, involved only the right of Northern interference in the social organisation of the South.

When the Constitution of the United States was made, the Confederacy was composed of thirteen sovereign and independent States with plenary power to legislate on all subjects. Property of every kind was under the exclusive control of each State. The Federal Constitution was framed with reference to the existence of property in the several States. It did not pretend to define what was or was not property. Property, such as was made so by State authority, preexisted, and was left under the sole and exclusive control of the several States. The only property made by the Constitution was that to authors and inventors, by securing for limited times the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries. In the Amendments to the Constitution, there is a clause that 'no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation,' and this is the only clause in which the word is used. What was property was left to the regulation and control and under the sole jurisdiction of the States. They made the laws of succession and of testamentary disposition, and the State Courts had full jurisdiction over all rights of property. As already stated, slave property existed at that time in all the States but one. The Constitution was made with reference to that state of things, and, of course, slave property, like all other property, was left to the exclusive control of each State. When, therefore, those who had sold many of their slaves, and were in the enjoyment of the riches resulting therefrom, undertook to claim the exclusive right of manufacturing morals as well as cotton goods, there was necessarily that just feeling of indignation which it might be supposed would naturally arise under such circumstances. Their interference was boldly and defiantly met by the South. With fearful odds against them, they dared the contest. They know the strong feeling of the civilised world against slavery, and they know that that feeling has been invoked against their heroic efforts for freedom; yet during the whole unequal contest you have seen them stand self-poised, claiming the right to decide for themselves all questions of domestic policy. When that right is yielded, either to the North or to any foreign nation, they would cease to deserve the liberty for which they are struggling. It is no part of my purpose to discuss the merits or demerits of slavery as it exists in the Southern States. That issue, for a period of more than thirty years, has been banished by the course pursued by the North, and the question of foreign interference has taken its place. I say foreign interference, because upon that subject the non-slaveholding States of America stood in relation to the slaveholding States as foreign powers. They had no more right to interpose on the question of slavery in the South than they had to interfere with it in Cuba or Brazil. On that subject there has been no diversity of opinion in America. In his inaugural address Mr. Lincoln said: 'I have no purpose directly or indirectly to interfere with the institution of slavery where it exists. I believe I have no right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so.' In a conversation, invited by himself, with the members of Congress from the border slaveholding States, March 9, 1862, he volunteered the declaration 'that emancipation was a subject exclusively under the control of the States, and must be adopted or rejected by each for itself; that he did not claim, nor had the Government any right, to coerce them for that purpose, and he wished this to be clearly understood.' In answer to a remark of Mr. Hall, of Missouri, he said, 'slavery existed, and that, too, as well by the act of the North as of the South, and that he recognised the rights of property which had grown out of it, and would respect those rights as fully as similar rights in any other property.' Thus it is seen that the constitutional right of exclusive State control over the subject of slavery was clearly and fully recognised by the chosen leader of the Black Republican party; but of what avail were these declarations from such a source? When Charles I. endeavoured to prevent the passage of the celebrated Petition of Right, a message was sent down desiring to know whether the House would rest on the royal word, as declared to them by the Lord Keeper. Pym answered, with consummate address, 'We have His Majesty's coronation oath to maintain the laws of England: what need we then to take his word?'

Mr. Lincoln had taken the solemn oath to obey the Constitution: how could freemen take his word when his oath had been violated by trampling under foot every vital principle of the Constitution? His own acknowledgment to Congress of this violation, and the paltry excuse for it, will in future ages constitute not the least remarkable feature of this Black Republican revolution. But the Personal Liberty Bills of twelve of the Northern States were nearly all, if not all, still in force, nullifying a law of Congress for the benefit of the South, while those very States claimed all the benefit of the compact of the Constitution, and were in the enjoyment of that commercial system, to the actual detriment of the South, which, in the language of Mr. Webster, constituted the 'whole glory' of the North. The abstract right of the South to non-intervention by a common Government for all the States, was acknowledged at the very moment that the whole power of that Government was exerted, in violation of all the purposes for which it was framed, to destroy (with the existing relation in all the border States. I repeat, therefore, that the question between the sections was never one of slavery, but, so far as the South was concerned, the resistance to the unconstitutional interference of the North in what is conceded to belong solely and exclusively to separate State authority. England, until a comparatively recent period, held slaves in her West Indian colonies. For very many years there was a strong and growing feeling against its continuance, until, finally, a compensated system of emancipation was devised by the wisdom of Parliament. Suppose, before Parliament saw proper to act, France had indulged in the bitter denunciations against England which have characterised the Black Republican party of the North when speaking of the South; suppose organised bands had been employed to seduce the slaves from their owners, and that poison, to be used against their owners, had been distributed among them as was done in Texas—that raids like John Brown's into Virginia had been made with the avowed purpose of exciting servile insurrection and indiscriminate massacre, and that all the newspapers of the party about to succeed to political power should have either openly applauded the act or palliated its horrors—a contest arising between the two countries, growing out of such conduct, would scarcely, even among Exeter Hall abolitionists, be considered as involving the question of slavery; and I am wholly mistaken in English character if all parties had not in that event cordially united in repelling indignantly any such interference. Yet the case between the North and the South is a parallel one, with the superadded obligation on the North arising from the common compact. As England would claim the right, without the officious interference of an unfriendly foreign nation, to exercise her own sound judgment and discretion, when and how she thought proper, in acting on a matter of her own peculiar cognisance, the same Anglo-Saxon blood which flows in the veins of the people of the South makes them not less earnest in vindicating the same inherent principle of national individuality. They are contending in a terrible and bloody strife for the guaranteed right of deciding for themselves, in their own way and in their own time, what, according to their own sound judgment, may be best for the two races which have been thrown together without any fault of either.

BUTLER'S LAST INFAMY.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—I have to request you, as a duty which you owe to your position as a journalist, to place on record the following order of one of Butler's immediate subordinates, and promulgated under his eye, and therefore with his implied sanction. I cut it from the Norfolk Old Dominion newspaper, where it is published by authority. The Rev. Mr. Wingfield—who is sentenced without trial, on the mere suspicion of having used 'seditious language,' to the punishment of sweeping the public streets—is a gentleman of refined education, high social standing in the community, and universally respected by his fellow-citizens. Please notice also the hellish malignity of the sneer which envenoms this brutal order. It is of a par with the ingenuity which forced in the same town a professor of Union sentiments to help building the gallows of a condemned 'rebel' and 'traitor.' Heretofore, the English press, which was so prompt in avenging New Orleans, has given little or no heed to the murders, the robberies, the infamies of the same man at Norfolk. I hope that the subjoined will rouse the generous impulses of your contemporaries in vindication of outraged humanity.

Yours, &c., Norfolk.

Head-quarters Norfolk and Portsmouth,
Norfolk, Va., Feb. 25, 1864.

Special Orders, No. 44—[Extract]—IV. It having been reported to the General Commanding that S. H. Wingfield, of Portsmouth, is an avowed secessionist, and that he takes every opportunity to disseminate his traitorous dogmas, much to the annoyance of his loyal neighbours, and that on one occasion, at a place of worship, while the prayer for the President of the United States was being read, his conduct was such as to annoy and disgust the loyal portion of the congregation, and believing a wholesome example is necessary for the benefit of Mr. Wingfield in particular, and the class in this community he represents in general, men of education and ability, who use the talents God has given them for the purpose of stirring up strife against the Government of the United States, it is therefore ordered that the Provost-Marshal arrest Mr. S. H. Wingfield, and that he be turned over to Colonel Sawtelle to work for three (3) months cleaning the streets of Norfolk and Portsmouth, thus employing his time for the benefit of that Government he has abused, and in a small way atone for his disloyalty and treason.

By command of
Brig.-Gen. E. A. Wild.

EQUIPMENT VERSUS ENLISTMENT.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—In a leader on Mr. Roebuck's motion, and the contemplated remonstrance of Her Majesty's Government to that of the Confederate States, the Times of 15th inst. says in substance, that for the offence charged against the Confederates, we have the 'tangible thing,' to wit, the ships built in English ports and now cruizing in their service; while in the offence charged against the Federals, viz. the enlistments in Ireland, there is no such 'tangible thing;' that therefore the Government in the latter case 'have no facts upon which to proceed.' I should gladly have you quote the passage, if it will not occupy too much of your space; but you will find that I have correctly stated its meaning. Now I merely wish to ask whether 100,000 able-bodied men annually leaving Ireland—which is the lowest number stated in Parliament, and this without denial—and finding their way into the Federal service, does not form quite as much 'a tangible thing' as a vessel of war, and is not quite as strong a fact upon which to proceed?' Yours, &c., D.

LETTER FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Richmond: Jan. 26, 1864.

WHO IS QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL?—PROPOSAL TO LIMIT THE TERM OF SERVICE OF CABINET OFFICERS—THE EXEMPTION BILL—THE TAX BILL—THE INFLATION OF THE CURRENCY—THE SPIRIT OF THE ARMY AND OF THE PEOPLE—CHARLESTON—YANKEE RAVAGES IN VIRGINIA—THE CARTEL OF EXCHANGE—GENERAL SORROW FOR THE DEATH OF THACKERAY.

'Who is Quartermaster-General?' is the question which now occupies the public mind of the capital, apropos of a report made to the Senate of the Confederate States by Mr. Sparrow, of Louisiana, in which the President's appointment of General Lawton is declared to be null, and all the expenditures of money made since the latter entered upon the duties of the office are pronounced illegal. The report has been adopted by the Senate, and the Administration and that body are therefore directly at issue, though such variance does not involve the reinstatement of Colonel A. C. Myers in his old position. The matter will come, in due course of time, before the courts of law for their adjudication, and meanwhile the action of the Senate will be of no practical effect.

Another report made to the same branch of Congress has created considerable discussion. It refers to the limitation of the term for which Cabinet officers shall serve under the appointment of the President, recommending that all secretaryships shall be deemed vacant at the expiration of two years from the time they were originally filled, and that the President shall be under the necessity of submitting other nominations to the Senate for its approval or rejection. The report evinces great ability and research on the part of its author, Mr. Semmes, of Louisiana; but it may be reasonably doubted whether the time of its preparation has not been thrown away. The object it has in view immediately is beyond all doubt to get rid of those members of the present Cabinet who have lost the confidence of a certain party. That the President retains these gentlemen in office, is satisfactory proof that he regards them as valuable public servants.

While these, and other matters equally unprofitable at the present moment, have been engaging the attention of Congress in open session, the vital subjects of taxation and the currency and the exemption have been before both Houses, sitting with closed doors. The Exemption Bill is still pending in the House of Representatives, but will very certainly not pass in the form in which it was reported by Mr. Miles, the chairman of the Military Committee. Congress will not commit into the hands of the President the sole authority of declaring what classes of men may be spared from the army, and what individuals shall represent these classes in maintaining the industrial and agricultural interests of the country. Beyond all peradventure, the list of exempts will be narrowed down to the smallest possible limits the dental surgeons throughout the Confederacy have memorialised Congress to be relieved from the operation of the conscript law, and though the class is so restricted that it may be counted in hundreds, and though their memorial was endorsed by the Surgeon-General and the Army Board of Medical Examiners, Congress refused to relieve them — but it will not be so cut down as to render necessary the total discontinuance of the daily newspapers, nor, let us hope, as to check seriously the cultivation of grain and the raising of beef cattle. The Currency and Tax Bill passed the House of Representatives several days ago, and is now under discussion in the Senate. Its leading features are not known to the public, although it is said that a perfect copy of the Bill as it came from the House is in the hands of the brokers of the city. But the rumour runs, that a general tax of five per cent. has been laid on all descriptions of property; that the profits arising from all manufacturing and mercantile business are yet more heavily burdened; that no imposition has been made upon the currency itself, but that this is required to be funded with all possible promptness.

Whether this general outline of the Currency and Tax Bill is correct or not, we can but await the action of the Senate to ascertain, but it is in the highest degree desirable that the Senate should pass it in some form or other, and give repose to the public mind. A sale of furniture, belonging to a departing Hebrew jeweller, took place a few days ago, at which the prices obtained for articles were absolutely bewildering. Two mirrors, not of the largest size, brought $10,000. An étagère, with the rubbish of Parisian statuettes, shell-work, odour-bottles, and other inutilities on its shelves, sold for $6,500. A set of chamber crockery, consisting of seven pieces which need not be specified, neither Sèvres nor Dresden, was knocked down at $13,000. A corresponding inflation of prices in all goods, fabrics, manufactured wares, necessaries and luxuries, is to be remarked. Nor is this referable in any manner to scarcity. There never was a time when the cost of living was so small, estimated in gold or sterling. Board at our first-class hotels is $20 a day, but this dwindles down to ninety cents in coin or foreign exchange—about one-third of the charge in time of peace. Reduced to the same standard, coals are less than $2 a ton of twenty-five bushels, flour $8½ a barrel, beef fifteen cents a pound, oysters eighty cents a gallon, and so on, through the whole range of what we eat and drink and wear. It is clear that, if the currency were restored to a healthful condition, prices would subside to figures very near those which obtained before the establishment of the blockade.

Despite this precarious state of the finances, the general condition of the Confederacy is hopeful, and the spirit of the people undismayed. The question of supplies for the army is not wholly free from embarrassment, but unless Congress shall legislate the whole male population into the army, there is no danger of a famine. The tanneries established by the Government are supplying the Confederate shoemakers with leather of good quality, and in abundance, and these shoemakers are turning out not less than four thousand pairs of shoes weekly. We are, therefore, independent of Europe for the means of protecting the feet of our soldiers. The nitre beds in our mountain regions are yielding a sufficient quantity of nitre to the Government powder-mills at Augusta and elsewhere, and the powder made at these establishments is of superior strength to that used by the Yankees. The temper of the army is buoyant. One has only to visit the lines of General Lee to shake off the despondency which may have been superinduced by 'too curiously considering' the depreciation of the currency, or nursing his disappointment over the course of the English Cabinet. The brave fellows are animated by the liveliest confidence of the repulse of the enemy at all points on the opening of the spring campaign. They want the Yankees to come on, and 'come a-running.' In our towns and cities the new conscripts, under the Act abolishing substitutes, are winding up their business affairs preparatory to going into the field on February 1. Throughout the Confederacy all classes recognise the solemn responsibility of putting forth the whole vigour they possess to meet the last desperate onset of the foe. Something perhaps of the cheerfulness of the troops may be attributed to the careless abandon of the military life, which breaks out in the chorus of

Why, soldiers, why,
Should we be melancholy, boys,
Whose business 'tis to die?

But there is a calm composure among the masses of the people at home, both among men and women, that springs not from ignorance of the extreme peril, nor from the reckless indifference of despair, but from that unwavering faith in their ability under God to maintain the right which has nerved their arms and cheered their hearts since the beginning of the conflict. That the Christian nations of Europe should regard with apathy a struggle which involves nothing less than the existence of 8,000,000 of human beings, the countrymen of Stonewall Jackson—that they should coolly calculate the probable extermination of a gallant people, and the devastation of half a continent, as they would the chances of a race at Epsom or Chantilly—is one of those moral phenomena which stagger our belief in the gradual but certain improvement of mankind.

Almost perfect quietude prevails along the whole line of military operations. From the direction of Knoxville we hear that Longstreet's cavalry have been within four miles of the town, and have cut off a provision train of the enemy, capturing 500 head of cattle, and 100 wagons with their teams. There is a blockade of the Mississippi river at Milliken's Bend, and the Yankees below that point are beginning to feel the want of supplies. At Charleston, the fire of the batteries upon the city, after having reached a maximum of 250 shells per day, has slackened, and a purpose is now indicated of making another grand bombardment of Sumter. The enemy were lately engaged in hauling ammunition to Gregg and Cumming's Point, and considerable activity was observed among the fleet, three Monitors having anchored inside the bar. The damage done in Charleston, so far, by the shells, is inconsiderable, and but little attention is paid to the falling missiles. Business has been moved higher up town; but the daily papers are published as usual, the boys trundle their hoops or play at marbles in the streets, wagons move about on their accustomed rounds, the trains arrive and depart upon their schedule time, all goes on as if ne'er a Yankee were within a thousand miles of Charleston, and Gilmore had never ordered its destruction. Now and then a shell, thrown farther than common, drops in among the mules and the urchins, or comes crashing through a house, and creates a momentary excitement, perhaps kills somebody. But the bombardment has become a matter of rather contemptuous familiarity. A correspondent of a Columbia journal writes that he saw a shell flying over a dwelling-house, in the open upper portico of which a lady sat sewing. Disturbed by the whizzing sound of the immense projectile as it hurtled above her head, the lady laid aside her needlework, walked across the portico to see where the shell struck, and then, immediately returning, resumed her seat and her occupation. A considerable force of the enemy has occupied the Northern Neck of Virginia since Christmas, plundering the dwellings of the inhabitants and destroying all grain and meat that could be found. In like manner, they have moved up the peninsula, and made predatory landings on the lower James River. One of the finest seats in this region was Lower Brandon, in the county of Prince George, the former dwelling of the Harrisons, and, before the war, the abode of a profuse and elegant hospitality, where Millard Fillmore and Edward Everett had been honoured and welcome guests. The estate was large and productive, the dwelling was an antique and rambling structure, dating back to the time of George II. Here the Yankees last week destroyed all the farm buildings, together with 3,000 bushels of Indian corn and a considerable supply of meat, rifled the mansion-house, laid waste the beautiful grounds, and carried off by violence, against their earnest protestations, more than 100 slaves. There are many gentlemen in England who remember with delight the charming repose and high social enjoyment of the Brandon household, and who will learn with equal indignation and regret that the ruthless Yankee has devastated its acres and profaned its halls.

So much for the hostilities of the past fortnight. Some ten days ago, on the flag-of-truce boat from Fortress Monroe, came to Richmond, by special permission of Lincoln and Butler, Mr. Henry Warfield, of Baltimore, well known for his sufferings and his endurance as one of the gentlemen immured for fourteen months in Fort Warren. The object of Mr. Warfield's visit is not known to the public, but it is supposed that he was allowed to approach our Government in the character of mediator with regard to the resumption of an exchange of prisoners. Whatever his purpose was, he has not been successful in accomplishing it, and will return home as soon as the flag-of-truce boat comes back to City Point. It is generally understood, both here and in the United States, that General Butler was selected as Meredith's successor expressly because of Lincoln's and Stanton's belief that he would not be recognised by our authorities. The Cabinet at Washington does not desire that the exchange of prisoners should be resumed, and this appointment was resorted to as the surest means of preventing it. Humanity cries aloud against such conduct, but what care Abe and his coadjutors for humanity?

Another extensive financial swindle has just transpired. Large sterling drafts were sold, several months ago, to parties in this city by a Captain Decie or Dicey of England. The drafts have come back protested for non-acceptance, and the Captain is awa'.

A public meeting was held last week, and an association formed here for the praiseworthy object of procuring artificial legs for the mutilated soldiers of our army. Speeches were made by Senator Henry of Tennessee and others, and a considerable sum of money was subscribed on the spot.

The trial of Forde, charged with the murder of Dixon, late Clerk of the House of Representatives, is now in progress before Judge Wm. H. Lyons. A great array of talent appears in the prisoner's behalf. Wm. W. Crump, Allan B. Magruder (a brother of the General, and one of the counsel in the case of Sickles in Washington City), George W. Randolph, Ex-Secretary of War, Senators Simms and Burnett, and Humphrey Marshall, of Kentucky, conduct the defence; Littleton Tazewell, Attorney for the Commonwealth, and Judge Dougherty of Georgia, carry on the prosecution. The trial excites but little attention in the whirl of events and the multiplicity of crimes.

There has been a very destructive fire, the result of accident, near Columbia, S. C., in which cotton to the value of $3,000,000 was consumed.

President Davis and Governor Smith have established public receptions or levees at their respective residences. The President receives every Tuesday, and the Governor every Friday evening.

The death of Thackeray has created a general sorrow among the reading men and women of the Confederacy. All the public journals contain paragraphs on the event. His popularity here, as you know, was unbounded.

The intense cold of four weeks ago has been followed by a succession of the balmiest and loveliest days, and the softest moonlit nights. Temperature and atmosphere, and the radiance of sun and moon, conspire to make this January a bright halcyon season of physical enjoyment.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: March 1, 1864.

THE FEDERAL MILITARY MOVEMENTS—SHERMAN'S EXPEDITION—THE FLORIDA DISASTER—ITS EFFECT ON MR. LINCOLN'S ELECTION PROSPECTS—REPUBLICAN OPPOSITION TO THE RECONSTRUCTIVE SCHEME—MR. CHASE AND THE PRESIDENTIAL ELECTION—THE GROWING FEROCITY OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY—THE POSITION OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

The past week has been fruitful in military excitements. In the coming week we look for stirring events. The army of the Potomac is said to be again in motion towards Richmond. Union forces are on the move, and very strong demonstrations have been made, with no decisive result yet except in Florida, where they have met with a disastrous defeat. Sherman's great expedition, which left Vicksburg four weeks ago today with 30,000 men, to march across the State of Mississippi into Alabama, threatening Mobile from the rear, and menacing an approach towards Atalanta, in concert with sustaining armies advancing in different directions, has not yet been heard from. He carried twenty days' provisions with him, and cut himself off from communication with his base on the river. He has been variously reported to be at Meridian, on the Mobile and Ohio railroad, 140 miles east of Vicksburg; and again at Selma, on the Alabama river, still east by at least 100 miles; but no intelligence has been received authenticating either of these facts, other than the Confederate report from Richmond that a portion of his force was at Quitman, which is a station on the railroad, 15 miles below Meridian, and 109 miles from Mobile. It is certain that the large cavalry force which was despatched from Memphis to form a junction with him, has been met by the Confederates and repulsed. The whole force returned to Memphis, with the usual Federal report, that it was a triumphant raid, and had succeeded in destroying or carrying away an immense amount of corn, cattle, and other property of rebels. The indiscriminate plunder or destruction of private property is the boast of almost every general order which announces the result of any Federal incursion into the interior of the South. It is a poor compensation for leaving General Sherman without support at a time when his provisions must be nearly, or quite, exhausted. The total failure of all communication with him for so long a time, and the doubt whether any forces can be sent to his relief, create great apprehensions about his position. General Grant made an advance about the same time towards Dalton, and very boastful telegraphic despatches were sent forward, amusing the public with accounts of his triumphal progress, the capture of the important point of Dalton, and the opening of his great march on to Atalanta. The advance appears to have been a feint, or it is a failure. Grant's forces are on their way back again, and some of them may probably be sent to try and reach Sherman.

The incident in Charleston Harbour, of the blowing up of a Federal ship by a torpedo, is of not much military significance, except as an inspiriting proof of the activity of the Confederates, and the infusion of a new alarm into the Federal navy, who have already had some unpleasant misgivings about this mode of warfare.

But the heaviest disaster of the Union troops has befallen them in Florida. There are no official accounts published; and the military authorities have taken extraordinary measures to suppress private intelligence. What news we have comes from Hilton Head. Before the steamer left which brought the reports, she was visited by order of General Gilmore, all private letters were seized, and the officers of the boat strictly forbidden to furnish any news for publication. The Government only has any authentic news, and this is withheld. But from verbal accounts by passengers, and such private letters as escaped the search, it is known that General Truman Seymour, advancing towards Lake City, was encountered near Olustee, twenty-eight miles from Jacksonville, on the 20th of February, by a strong Confederate force, and was badly beaten, and driven back upon Jacksonville, with a very heavy loss of men and artillery. It is conceded in these reports that his loss of men is not less than 1,200, and that his possession of Jacksonville is not secure. It is certain the expedition has come to an ignominious stop, and cannot be proceeded in without large reinforcements. It is not known what was the number of the Confederates, or who commanded them. It is said, of course, that they had a great superiority of numbers. They always have, by Union computation, when they are victorious. At the same time it is very curious that, whenever there is no fighting just over and to be explained, these Union accounts continually describe the Confederate armies as dispirited, deserting, and running away. Apropos of this, there is a characteristic anecdote told of Mr. Lincoln. In the earlier part of this war, when the Confederates were winning victories, and the defeated generals were always accounting for disaster by this story of the overwhelming numbers brought against them, a Western farmer asked Mr. Lincoln confidentially to tell him, for his private information, what he thought was the real strength of the Southern armies. Mr.

Lincoln gravely replied that, by the best computation, they must have 1,200,000 men. The farmer stared, on which Mr. Lincoln added: 'I come by these figures this way. I know we have 400,000 men, and my generals who are fighting report that everywhere the rebels have three to our one.' If not true, this is well invented.

There have been but few Confederate troops in Florida. It is rumoured that this force was sent down from the army about Charleston. The Union reports make Beauregard or Hardee the commanding officer. The brief accounts from Richmond seem to name General Finnegan as sole in command.

The victory is an important one for the Confederates. It is very damaging to the military cause of the Unionists, and a severe check to the political campaigning of Mr. Lincoln for re-election to the Presidency.

It has come to be seen and acknowledged at the North, and charged boldly by the malcontents with Mr. Lincoln in his own party, that this Florida expedition had really no military object, and that no success, in a military point of view, would compensate for one-tenth of the cost, or any part whatever of the loss of life. It is averred that none of the military authorities who have the direction and execution of the regular plans of campaigning for the war were consulted, or even informed of the movement, before it was ordered by Mr. Lincoln. The motive was explained in General Gilmore's order to be that of affording protection to loyalists in Florida, who might be disposed to accept President Lincoln's Proclamation of Amnesty, and take the oath of allegiance to the United States on the terms therein prescribed. What was unexpressed is not less evident—that there was the personal expectation, of more importance than the result, either military or political, to the Union cause, that a thousand men—Mr. Lincoln's prescribed number for a Florida constituency—might be gathered in that State to profess loyalty, make any pledge to save themselves from robbery and exile, and become oath-bound supporters of the personal policy, and by consequence of the partisan schemes, of the President. There was already a revolt within his own party to wrest power from his hands at the next election; and this Florida expedition, as an enterprise and as a failure, will be a strong weapon in the hands of those of his own household who would slay him if they could for their own gain. It has already been muttered among them that Mr. Lincoln has wasted an army and lost a thousand lives for the sake of making three votes to help him to a re-election.

This ignominious failure will encourage the opposition, which has recently been shown among the leading Republican politicians who are not in Mr. Lincoln's interest, against this whole scheme of making spurious States, through his military subordinates, by executive will, within the districts of the Southern States which are occupied by his armies. There were two very admonitory signs of this in some proceedings in the House of Representatives on the presentation of members for admission from the State of Arkansas, lately 'reconstructed' at Little Rock on Mr. Lincoln's model, and under the direction of his army officers; and in the proceedings of the National Republican Committee at Washington. When the Arkansas credentials were offered, Mr. H. Winter Davis, of Maryland, a Border-state convert to extreme Radicalism, opposed the reception, and inveighed bitterly against the unconstitutionality and dangers of the military interference of the President, and sought to have the subject referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the purpose of having an official enquiry into the lawfulness of these transactions. The House was not prepared to make this appearance of open conflict with the President, and the motion of Mr. Davis was lost. The credentials were referred to the Committee on Elections; but events have hurried on with such rapidity since, that a considerable body of the Republicans are not only ready, but eager, to damage the President with the country, in view of defeating what they call his attempts to re-nominate and to re-elect himself, and they will undoubtedly make fight on this whole scheme of the military manufacture of States under executive proclamations.

The regular National Committee of the Republican party, appointed at Chicago, in 1860, to call future conventions and fix the place of meeting, have named the 7th of June, and selected Baltimore. It is proclaimed as a move necessary to check the schemes of the President's personal followers to frustrate the action of the Convention, by getting up nominations for him by popular meetings and State Legislatures, so as to furnish a plea that a convention nomination is superfluous, or to exert an outside pressure to compel it to take him up, as already designated by the voice of the people. They adopted another measure, which is held to be a rebuke of the President, and a sign of opposition to his re-nomination. They made a rule that no delegates shall be received at the Convention from States not represented in Congress. This shuts out the expected Lincoln delegates from Arkansas, Louisiana, Florida, Texas, and Tennessee, in all which States the Lincoln process of 'reconstruction' is in various stages of advance. It stigmatises, too, the costly and bloody experiment upon Florida, as a great political blunder, no less than a military failure, and an official crime.

Simultaneously with the outbreak of these signs of discontent with Mr. Lincoln is the sudden development of a wide-spread concert of effort among the friends of the Secretary of the Treasury to have him nominated by the National Convention over Mr. Lincoln, on grounds boldly stated, which read very much like charges against Mr. Lincoln's Administration, and which, if uttered two years ago, would have subjected a democrat to the perils of a midnight arrest by a file of soldiers, and confinement during the will of the President in some military dungeon. I mentioned in my last the circular issued by a committee at Washington of the friends of Mr. Chase, of which U. S. Senator Pomeroy, of Kansas, was chairman, which was the first public breaking of ground in favour of Mr. Chase for the succession. It contained some severe reflections on Mr. Lincoln's capacity, and some offensive imputations against his administration as corrupt and feeble. It was met—not exactly answered—in the House of Representatives last Friday by a speech of General Frank Blair, representative from the St. Louis City district in Missouri, brother of Montgomery Blair, who is the Postmaster-General in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet. It was a tremendous philippic against Secretary Chase, whom he denounced as a dangerous and ambitious intriguer, and boldly charged with corruption in office, saying that for the truth of the charge he held himself responsible as 'a soldier, a gentleman, and a representative.' Such language reminds one of the furious debates of the Mountain during the stormy days of French Jacobinism.

In aid of Mr. Chase, a pamphlet has been issued by his friends, and circulated among the members of the Legislature of Ohio—Mr. Chase's State—to influence them against the nomination of Mr. Lincoln for re-election. It is said to be an emanation from the Central Committee of the supporters of Mr. Chase near the Department in Washington City. It contains a formidable recapitulation of the many reasons for the opinion that Mr. Lincoln ought not to be nominated, and if nominated cannot be elected without the use of unlawful and unconstitutional means, which it insinuates that he is apparently ready to use; and that his re-election, with or without such appliances, would be a public calamity. It asserts that the nation is weary of his feebleness and incapacity; charges that he has had no policy, but has been swayed to and fro by interested persons, or by considerations of personal interest in retaining office; draws an unfavourable comparison between him and President Davis; ridicules him as a 'jocular President;' pronounces the epithet of 'honest old Abe' as a cant, which was 'at first amusing,' then became ridiculous, and is now absolutely criminal; and calls for the nomination for President, in place of Mr. Lincoln, of 'an advanced thinker, a statesman profoundly versed in political and economical science, one who fully comprehends the spirit of the age in which we live.'

The name of this august coming man is not given, but the fingers which traced these lines were mentally describing the name of Salmon P. Chase.

The war grows thus in bitterness every day, and will continue until the nominations are made in June, if some convenient arrangement between the chief belligerents does not in the meantime furnish a plea for the reunion of the factions on one or the other of them, or on some third man who will engage to restore harmony by a reasonable provision out of the abundance of the spoils of success for the chiefs of both sides—of course, purely for the patriotic purpose of the better enabling them to save the nation.

You will observe that, in all this revolt against the Administration, there is not the slightest trace of reaction against the war, or against the wicked and cruel passions of which it is made the instrument, or the horrible purposes for which it has come to be waged, as a war of spoliation and extermination against a gallant people struggling heroically for independence. The stimulus to revolt is, on the contrary, simply another form of that frightful passion for power and plunder, and that shocking indifference to crime and carnage, which the war has developed as a national trait. The chiefs of the movement rather assail Mr. Lincoln, because they believe he sometimes hesitated before going forward in the career of violence, bloodshed, and spoliation—because he is suspected of having had a lurking willingness to close the rebellion, if possible, by restoring the States as they were with their original rights, if they could be induced or compelled to submit; and that it is not with his whole heart, and only for the chances of renewed power, that he has become the Radical which his recent measures would show him to be. They denounce a portion of his policy, not because it is unjust, inhuman, lawless, and tyrannical, but because it is selfishly devised for his own profit, and is employed to retain in his own hands the tremendous powers which they are eager to seize and clamorously pledged to employ, if they can attain them, with a fiercer and more unrelenting energy of destructiveness against the Southern people than Mr. Lincoln is capable of exerting.

It is history repeating itself. In all popular frenzies, when a nation goes mad, the demagogues who first excite them are speedily outstripped in zealotry by the disciples they make. Unless they march onward with the accelerated pace of the multitude, they are pushed out of their places, and left by the wayside. When this conflict first commenced as a war of opinions, Mr. Seward was the Radical whom constitutional and moderate men shunned as the most dangerous fanatic of the day, although his fanaticism was only a cold-blooded calculation of political profit. The popular passions which he kindled got beyond his control, and undoubtedly went far beyond his original wishes, and he was left behind when the man of action was wanted. Mr. Lincoln was taken up, in preference, as the representative man of Northern designs against the South, and Mr. Seward, taunted and suspected, was dragged after Mr. Lincoln into excesses such as he had pronounced to be calumnies when imputed by his adversaries to be the inevitable consequences of his artful appeals to the frenzy of the fanatic and to the sordid appetites of the greedy. Now comes another brood of fiercer and greedier chiefs of furious factions, who are clamouring to set aside Mr. Lincoln, as Mr. Seward was set aside for Mr. Lincoln, for some more 'advanced' prophet and statesman—the more violent faction always coming in to displace and absorb their rivals who may not, in the language of the Chase pamphlet, sufficiently 'comprehend the spirit of the age.'

There might be the hope of some possible good to come out of these quarrels among the wrangling factions of the dominant party, if there were virtue enough among those who affect to oppose them on principle to seize the opportunity and use it courageously in an effort to restore the national sanity—in discouraging by every possible means the evil passions which made and which support this war, and invoking peace, even at the cost of giving up the struggle for territorial dominion over an unwilling people, and taking the broad ground that the first duty of the people is to stop this horrible bloodshed and turn their sobered thoughts to repairing their own shattered institutions, regaining and consolidating anew their own lost liberties, and labouring in patience to recover some portion of that social and material prosperity which they have recklessly cast away in the obstinate perpetration of a self-avenging wrong.

But there is no such courage or virtue in the Democratic party. There are a few men of rare qualities within it who give sane counsels, but they are overpowered and outvoted in the organisations which direct the combined action of the party, and which are under the sway of leaders who have not convictions strong enough to enable them to face a popular clamour, and are mostly mere traders in obsolete maxims and traditions for the sake of gaining power. These men are making haste, and taking the party along with them, to get rid, for the purposes of the coming Presidential election, of the apprehended odium that they too are not zealous for the unconditional prosecution of the war upon the Southern people. Ex-President Fillmore, the very type of Conservatism, who has recently acted with the Democrats on general questions, expressed the whole idea in a brief passage of a speech recently made at a meeting at Buffalo for the sanitary relief to the soldiers. He declared for unrelenting war to the attainment of utter subjugation, leaving all questions of lenity and justice to be settled afterwards, and, in the meantime, an unreserved grant of all the men and money the Administration needs, 'even though we may not always approve of the use that is to be made of either.'

This is the political position of the Democratic party, and it is powerless for any possible good.

NEGRO LONGEVITY.—In the mortuary report for the past week, the names of two coloured women occur, one free and the other a slave, who died at the respective ages of 120 and 115.—Mobile Register, February 3.

LETTER FROM HALIFAX.

FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.

HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA: March 3, 1864.

NOTHING has transpired here in relation to the Chesapeake since the last mail to England, by which I forwarded the final decision of Judge Stewart in the Court of Vice-Admiralty. The steamer still lies alongside one of our wharves.

Lieutenant Parr, one of the parties concerned in her capture, has arrived at Richmond. It is not probable that any demand will be made by the Confederate Government for the restitution of the Chesapeake, but they will not suffer her captors to be treated as pirates in case they should fall into the clutches of the Federal Government.

Sad havoc has been made in the blockade-running fleet. The last mail from Bermuda brings intelligence of the capture of ten fine swift vessels, within as many days. Not one fell into the hands of the Yankees, all being burned or sunk rather than the enemy should get possession of them. Of course, in running the blockade, there are many risks to be run, but brandy is more to be feared than the vigilance of the Yankee blockading squadron, and it is an undoubted fact that Yankee gold has had an evil influence upon more than one pilot and engineer. The American Consul at Halifax is said to have bribed the engineer of the Robert E. Lee to betray his trust, and there is much circumstantial evidence which tends to strongly substantiate the assertion. Some measures should be taken to exercise a sharper supervision over the conduct of those engaged in blockade-running. It is a shame that through drunkenness, knavery, or stupidity, so many valuable cargoes and swift steamers should be destroyed within sight of the Southern coast.

Colonel Kane and a party of Confederate officers who made their escape from the Federal prisons at Camp Douglas and Johnson's Island, passed through this city en route for Bermuda a few weeks since, and are reported to have safely arrived in the Confederacy.

The captain of a captured blockade-runner, lately arrived here, tells fearful tales of the outrages committed by the blockading squadron—of cold-blooded murders, almost by dozens—of men shot dead after their ships have been surrendered, or while making their way to the shore through the boiling surf. Then the bodies of the murdered are counted, as an Indian reckons up the number of his scalps, and a lying tale of so many 'drowned' goes to the Yankee press. Are these men or fiends that do such foul deeds?

Earl Russell has his disciples and followers in these provinces as elsewhere. Witness the decision of the Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court in this province, before the case was submitted for his judgment. Witness also the decision of the police magistrate in St. John's, an official who claims to interpret international law, and is yet unable to prepare an ordinary law document by which to commit three men to a common gaol! A writ of habeas corpus has been granted in this case, and it is now being argued before a judge of the Supreme Court.

The telegrams from Yankeedom bring us tidings of Confederate victories in Florida and Mississippi.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS: March 15.

THE elections for two of the circumscriptions of Paris takes place next Sunday. No official candidate has been presented by the Government, which seems to have decided on pursuing the same system of laisser-faire in the partial elections which circumstances render necessary, as in the question of Danish duchies.

The maintenance of peace seems still somewhat problematical; but as men sleep through a storm, or in the trenches, when exhaustion or habit has rendered the danger familiar, so public opinion seems to be recovering a sort of apathetic tranquillity. The publication of Lord Cowley's despatches has no doubt contributed to this feeling, as every line of them goes to prove that in the Danish quarrel France is determined to look on from an upper window. This conviction, added to the action of the great banker in favour of a rise, has improved the money market, and the public funds are a half per cent. higher than they were a week ago. M. Fould also remains in office, which seems to many a guarantee for peace. On the other hand, the din of preparation is loud in Italy; large purchases of mules are being made, both in the Peninsula and in the South of France, for the military equipages of the Italian army; and the withdrawal of the Austrian forces from Slesvig, which is said to be the subject of negotiation with the smaller States of Germany, seems to indicate that their presence will be wanted in Italy. The prospects of peace or war in Europe seem therefore still as equally balanced as they were a week ago; the wishes of Government and people are on the side of peace—war has the chapter of accidents in its favour.

The French jurisprudence is acknowledged, notwithstanding the undisputed excellence of the Code, to be still open to many emendations, both in the criminal and commercial law. One of the petitions lately discussed in the Senate had reference to time bargains, which it was sought to legalise. Another reform of far greater value is now before the Council of State, which has the function of preparing new laws. It is called a law for the mise en liberté provisoire, and is intended to do away with the system of preventive imprisonment, of the hardships of which we have daily examples. It will be for France something like our habeas corpus, and will secure liberation on bail, until trial, for all misdemeanours and several minor crimes. On the present system, the previous inprisonment is often a greater punishment than the law awards on conviction, as in the case of M. Myres, when it resulted in ruin to himself and a large number of his shareholders. A curious instance of the working of trial by jury occurred this last week at Havre. It arose from some excise frauds, and the jury had to decide on 878 points which were submitted to them. They got through this more than Œdipean task in something less than four hours, or rather more than three questions and a half in a minute.

The evening before they left Paris, the future Sovereign of Mexico held a levée of his new subjects at the Austrian Embassy.

American affairs continue to attract little attention. The Moniteur, in the form of letters from New York, gives its usual well-written summaries of the news brought by each mail, but nothing which betrays a bias in favour of either party. President Davis's address to the army was printed entire in its columns, but without any comment. The Presse, in one of its exhortations in favour of peace, recalls the 60,000,000f. spent in the Crimean war, and holds up the 400,000,000f. of Northern debt as a warning to the too well taxed people of Europe; but it is only to point a moral incidentally that the Presse remembers America this week. If the French papers are too intent in watching the affairs of Denmark to give a thought to the gigantic struggle in the West. I observe that the Italian papers still turn a sympathetic eye to the war of liberation which the Confederate States are waging. The constitutional Liberals seem, without an exception, to appreciate, in their true light, both the conduct of the Washington Government, and the gallant self-assertion of the men of the South.

This last has been a week of suicides. A banker, a lawyer, and a man of letters, are among the list of these casualties of cowardice.

Manchester: March 16.

So far from resting either upon its own successes or upon the expressions of increased favour and acceptance the Confederate cause is receiving in Parliament, the Southern Independence Association is giving token of renewing its exertions with redoubled energy and vigour. It is confidently anticipated that within a few weeks after the Easter recess, the Society will be in a position to lay before both Houses the most unmistakeable evidence of the popular will throughout the whole of the manufacturing districts in the North. Arrangements are now in progress for the attainment of that object, and, apparently, there needs nothing but methodised action and sustained zeal to conduct the affair to a prosperous issue.

Mr. T. B. Kershaw's has been the chief labouring oar in this agitation, and at this time it is superfluous to add that, as an advocate or a debater, Mr. Kershaw is, upon the American question, more than a match for any force the enemy can bring against him. One of the most ably reasoned and popularly received lectures he has yet delivered, was given by him on Saturday evening at Burnley. The town-clerk of the borough, Captain Creek, occupied the chair, and the meeting, which was a crowded one, bore unanimous testimony in favour of the lecturer and his cause. Mr. Kershaw opened his subject by briefly reviewing the circumstances under which, exactly a hundred years ago, the revolted American colonies began their War of Independence. Why, he asked, did they throw off their allegiance? For precisely the same reason that the Southern States have separated themselves from the Union. The lapse of a hundred or any larger number of years could have no effect in altering men's feelings upon questions of practical injustice. In the autumn of 1860, when South Carolina exercised her right of sovereignty by disconnecting herself from the Union, she did so upon the same principle as that which governed the thirteen States in their revolt from the mother country. The lecturer then proceeded to review the position in which the South was placed by the preponderating political power of the North, and in illustrating and enforcing this portion of the subject he quoted largely from M. Victor, whom he held to be a most acceptable authority upon such a matter, considering that his paramount object in writing his book was to make out a good case for the North. Then he passed to the immigration question and produced tables of population showing the rate of increase in the North in contrast with that in the South, and dwelt with considerable emphasis upon the tyranny of the 'resistless majority.' For the last forty years the taxation levied by Congress had been laid with a view to promote Northern interests, three-fourths of the taxes being spent in the North; and it was for the sole purpose of continuing its selfish advantages that the North was now making war. The lecture occupied two hours in the delivery, and at its close the lecturer received a cordial and unanimous vote of thanks.

Applications are still pouring in from all quarters, from persons of rank and gentlemen of standing in their respective counties, requesting that their names may be enrolled on the books of the Southern Independence Association. A noble lord writes as follows:—'I have long agreed with the first and second paragraphs of your excellent, truthful, and humane circular. . . . The present Lord Abinger, in a sensible and warm-hearted speech in the House of Lords, in February 1862, declared that, from personal observation, he felt convinced that the North never could by force of arms subjugate the South. . . . I hope it may not be out of place here to observe, that I think our consuls should be in direct correspondence from the Southern States with Great Britain, in the same way as the United States Ministers were with the South American Republics long before their recognition by Spain, from whom they revolted. . . . As to the last paragraph but one in your circular, I think that the interest of the negro is safer in the hands of the South than of the North, for I believe that the "wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God." I may add, that my brother, Admiral D——, who is no mean authority on the condition of the negro, long ago expressed an opinion in favour of the immediate recognition of the Southern States.'

An eminent Conservative historian writes as follows:—'I hesitate to become a member of your Association from a doubt whether I should take that open step to which my inclinations strongly prompt me, or adhere to the neutrality in public life to which, as holding a high and responsible judicial situation in this country, I have hitherto invariably confined myself. And after mature consideration I am of opinion that it will be more decorous to abide in this instance by my former rule. I am the more inclined to follow this course from the reflection that by not appearing in public as an advocate of the Southern States, I shall be able to serve their cause more effectually in my literary character. And the printing of a new edition of my "History" (which is now going on), will afford me several opportunities of doing so, of which I shall not fail gladly to avail myself.'

A Gloucestershire baronet writes as follows:—'I will confess that all my sympathies are with the South. Some years ago, I spent some time in Charleston, and Georgia, Alabama, &c., and a more gallant, hospitable, and kind set of gentlemen I never met with. All the slaves I saw, on all the slave plantations, were happy and well fed and housed and cared for, and far better off than most of our labourers; and if some alterations were made in the slave laws, the bugbear of slavery would lose all its supposed horrors . . . I have said thus much because I have some knowledge of the country, and because I earnestly desire the success of the South.'

An Irish M.P., after congratulating the Association upon the success that has attended its efforts to educate the popular mind, writes in the following cordial strain:—'With sincere pleasure I beg you will enrol me a member of your Association. I have dwelt with extreme anxiety upon the prolonged struggle of the noble people of the Southern States; have rejoiced at their successes, have deplored their reverses, and think, indeed, it would be shameful for a free nation such as ours to allow a people who are so gallantly struggling for liberty, for independence, for the rights of man, and for the privilege of free-trade, to perish without a word of remonstrance against its Northern tyrants. Their War of Independence is to be waged, not only on their own well-fought fields, "where valour's self could do no more," but a struggle equally energetic must be made in our House of Parliament, and pledges should be exacted from the representatives of all counties, cities, and boroughs, to urge the speedy recognition of the Southern Confederacy. Your powerful Association should withhold all parliamentary support from any government that pursues a craven policy, and, alarmed by the vain threats of the Yankees, unjustly refuses to recognise the independence of a nation equally entitled to self-government with its Northern neighbour.'

The Yankee recruiting movement—that is, the Fenian part of it—is said to be attempted in Manchester. A correspondent of one of the morning papers, who signs himself 'An Irishman and a Catholic,' and who 'has it upon the most reliable authority that some Hibernico-American agents have taken up their quarters in this city,' writes:—

'I respectfully call upon the Catholic clergy to be on the alert against those wolves who are prowling among their flocks, and I entertain a strong hope that the police will be enabled to ferret them out, and bring them to condign punishment, as a warning to others, and as the surest means of preventing the simple, the illiterate, and the unwary from falling into a trap. . . . I have always been happy at finding Englishmen, Irishmen, Scotchmen, Welshmen, &c., spending their national festival days in a patriotic and convivial manner. Should, then, the gathering that will take place on St. Patrick's Day in the Corn Exchange be a large assemblage of well-conducted men—of men of principle, fully resolved to resist every effort that may be made to induce them to trample upon divine and human laws—I most heartily wish them every success. But should it be a Fenian convention, got up under false pretences—and rumour more than whispers something of that kind; indeed, the absence of any respectable patronage is a ground for strong suspicion—then I hope that it may be a miserable failure, and that its originators may be sent back to that obscurity out of which neither God nor nature ever intended they should emerge.'

The Manchester Courier of this morning, referring to the Solicitor-General's statement that Her Majesty's Government would endeavour to 'remonstrate' with the Government of the Confederate States, on their alleged employment of agents in this country for illegal purposes, asks whether there will not be some little difficulty about this? If Earl Russell, adds the Courier, had been moderately civil to Mr. Mason, instead of driving him away by his downright rudeness, the thing could have been done at once. But it is not now quite so easy a matter, and it is strongly to be suspected that if Earl Russell do not take care what he is about, he will get what is commonly called a slap in the face. The same journal concludes its complimentary speculations as follows:—'Who is now to communicate with the Confederate Government? and how, and in what sort of phraseology, is it to be approached? Is Mr. Jefferson Davis to be addressed as His Excellency the President of the Confederate States of America? and is he, as the representative of that Government, to be dealt with as one established Government usually deals with another? And if that is the case what will Mr. Adams say? The probability is that that particularly sensitive gentleman will think that it would have been better not to have addressed the representatives of the Confederacy at all, but, notwithstanding the formal recognition of its "belligerent" character (which, by the way, cannot be got over), to have treated them and all connected with them as "rebels" and "pirates." It is not very difficult to foretell what the answer of Mr President Davis will be. He will excuse himself and demand to be treated in the same way, in all respects, as the other belligerent. And, perhaps, at this point Lord Russell will begin to think that he had better have left remonstrance in that quarter alone.'

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

The money market is looking easier, the large influx of gold is evidently exerting a beneficial influence. It is generally conceived that the time has nearly arrived when the Directors of the Bank of England will feel themselves justified in making a further reduction in the minimum rate of discount; but still the large and daily increasing introduction of new Joint Stock projects renders it necessary to act with great caution. The applications for accommodation, both at the Bank and out of doors continue good, but without anything approaching to pressure. Amongst the brokers the lowest terms are 5¾ to 6 per cent.; they are, nevertheless, well supplied with capital; and should the weather continue fine, the aggregate seeking employment may be expected to be still better. The Joint Stock Banks have also good resources, and they are dealing with their advances at 5¾ per cent. On the Stock Exchange there continues a good demand for loans, and the terms for accommodation have improved from 3 to 5 per cent. The late Australian and West India arrivals will be sufficient for present necessities, as there is now no external draw of importance.

THE SOUTHERN STATES AND MEXICO.

While it is allowed that the proposed negotiation of a loan for Mexico will be a very satisfactory thing, as placing the new Emperor in a very favourable position, there is likely to be further benefit from an alliance between the Southern States and Mexico. The price of Mexican Stock has advanced on this prospect of affairs, and it will be highly beneficial to the interests of the South if no delay ensues in the final arrangements. The whole would, therefore, appear to be working well, and it is not improbable we may find shortly a great change, not only in the condition of Mexican, but also in Confederate Stock.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been steadily improving this week upon extensive purchases both here and in Liverpool—the highest price being the closing quotation, 50½ to 51½. At these prices purchases have been made.

The news received from America this week are of an encouraging nature, and have doubtless tended to cause this improvement.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The operations in bullion and specie continue to be of a very satisfactory character. With the large amounts of gold just arrived, and the absence of any demand of consequence for shipment, there is every probability of a further reduction in the rate of discount at no distant period. The amount sent into the Bank this week has been 115,000*l*.; but, on the other hand, there has been a withdrawal of 50,000 sovereigns for transmission abroad. The total arrivals of specie this week amount to 1,343,823*l*., of which 59,446*l*. is from New York, 11,400*l*. from the West Coast of Africa, 1,038,897*l*. from the West Indies and Pacific, and 234,080*l*. from Australia. The Syria, with the Peninsular and Oriental mails, has taken out 185,310*l*., of which 2,580*l*. was in silver for Gibraltar, 66,700*l*. gold for Alexandria, 61,130*l*. gold for Bombay, and 104,900*l*. silver for the same destination. The silver market has been less active during the last few days. The bar silver disposed of has been purchased at previous rates. Mexican dollars have also been in less demand, and the price has declined to 5*s*. 4*d*. per oz. The following is the only gold ship at present known to be on its way from Australia, viz., the Star of Peace, which will bring 75,000*l*.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 30,00,000 rupees in bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were to Calcutta, 16,00,000 rupees; to Bombay, 12,00,000 rupees, and to Madras 2,00,000 rupees. The minimum price was as before, viz. 1*s*. 11½*d*. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s*. 11¾*d*. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 230 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta, at 1*s*. 11¾*d*., will receive about 7 per cent; on Bombay, at 2*s*. 0⅛*d*., about 12 per cent.; and on Madras, at 2*s*., about 56 per cent., and all above these prices in full.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A prospectus has been issued of the Warrant Banking Company, with a capital of 2,000,000*l*., in 40,000 shares of 50*l*. each; but the first issue will be limited to 20,000 shares. The establishment is formed for the purpose of making advances on merchandise and securities, and relieving bankers and discount brokers disliking to make advances upon merchandise, having no organisation for examining goods and properly estimating their value. The chief business of the company will, therefore, consist in making advances upon the staple articles of produce, but these advances will be made in acceptances by the company of the drafts of its customers, and since every bill will represent merchandise readily convertible, and be at the same time secured by the whole capital of a powerful Company. Advances will also be made upon stocks and shares in permanent undertakings, readily convertible; and branches, it is proposed, shall be established at Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow.—The General Credits and Finance Company of London invite subscriptions for the British Columbia and Vancouver's Island Investment Company. The capital is to be 500,000*l*., with power to increase; the first issue, 250,000*l*., in 10,000 shares of 25*l*. each. The undertaking is established for the purpose of extending to British Columbia and Vancouver's Island, principles of business long since adopted in other Colonies with beneficial results to English capitalists and the local property-holders. The rates procurable for money in British Columbia and Vancouver's Island average from 12 to 16 per cent., on the most unexceptionable securities. The Company propose also to act as agents in all matters of investment and finance as between home capitalists and the colonial property-holders.—The Fore Street Warehouse Company have just issued their prospectus, asking for a capital of 600,000*l*., in shares of 20*l*. each, of which it is stated 400,000*l*. has been privately subscribed. The object of the undertaking is to purchase the good-will, stock of goods, freehold and leasehold premises and entire business of Messrs. Morrison, Dillon and Co., from which Mr. Charles Morrison is about to retire, leaving Mr. Brown and Mr. Slater, the present active partners, to continue their connection with the business, as Directors in the Board of the new Company. The purchase-money is to be payable by instalments at intervals of six months, spread over five years, and the profits, which have averaged more than 71,000*l*. per annum for the last five years, are to date to the Company from January 9 last. The prospectus has been issued of the English Opera Association, with a capital of 50,000*l*., in shares of 2*l*. each, the intention being the establishment of an English Opera at Covent Garden during the period of the year when the Italian Opera is closed. The amount of rent to be paid is made contingent on the success of the enterprise.—Another Joint Stock Company has been established, with a capital of 1,000,000*l*., in shares of 100*l*. each, for the purchase of the extensive iron, steel, and armour-plate works of Messrs. Charles Cammell & Co. at Sheffield, known as the Cyclops Works.—A Company has also been formed, to be called the Avonside Engine Company, and the capital is fixed at 150,000*l*., in shares of 10*l*. each. The object is to take over the business of Messrs. Slaughter, Grüning & Co., locomotive manufacturers of Bristol. The Company will undertake the construction, maintenance of locomotive and marine engines, and such other work as is usually comprised in the business of engineers and contractors. Mr. Slaughter, the present managing partner, will be Managing Director.—The prospectus has been put forward of the Dutch Tramway Company, with a capital of 50,000*l*., in shares of 10*l* each. The object in the first instance is to carry out a concession which has been obtained for a double tramway from the Hague to Scheveningue, and for the full completion of which for 40,000*l*. an agreement has been made with English contractors.—Another prospectus is that of the West of England Woollen Manufacturing Company (Limited). The proposed capital is 100,000*l*., in 10,000 shares of 10*l*. each; the first issue to be 5,000 shares only. It is proposed to establish works for the purpose of manufacturing, with improved machinery, various descriptions of woollen fabrics, by felting, by which the process used in spinning and weaving is dispensed with, and a saving of time and material effected of at least 30 per cent.—The British Copper Company has been started with a capital of 100,000*l*., in 20,000 shares of 5*l*. each, and it is intended to work several copper mines, including the Lochfyne sett, the Rednal and other mines; for the purchase of these properties a provisional contract has been entered into of an advantageous character.—The North Australian Company (Limited) have issued their prospectus this afternoon. The proposed capital is 200,000*l*. in 20,000 shares of 10*l*. each; first issue, 10,000 shares; deposit, 10*s*. per share on application, and 1*l*. on allotment; but it is not intended to call up more than 5*l*. per share.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Although the news with reference to the war in Denmark is not of a character to inspire much confidence in monetary circles, still the market for the English Securities has shown more animation within the last few days, and prices exhibit an improving tendency, but this is to be chiefly attributed to the more satisfactory state of the money market and the large arrivals of gold. Consols closed this evening at 91⅞ to 91½ for money, and 91⅞ to 91¾ for the account, which is an advance of ⅜ per cent. as compared with this day week. Exchequer Bills remain very firm at 5*s*. dis. to par. There has also been more animation exhibited in the Foreign Stock Market, but within the last day or two the dealers have been more particularly engaged with the periodical settlement, and which, it is believed, has proved a very heavy affair. Nevertheless, prices have generally improved—Greek to the

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

BUST OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE only Bust extant of the President of the Confederate States, modelled by Volk, at Richmond, and the most faithful Likeness of this eminent Statesman, has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund of Liverpool. In conformity with the intentions of the donor, the Bust has been registered under the Designs Act, and a number of casts (quarter size), limited to 500, are offered to the public at the following rates:—

Plaster	5s. 6d.	Carriage free to all parts of the United Kingdom.
Ditto Enamelled	7s. 6d.
A l'Ivoire (composition of Wax and Plaster) .	1 s. 6d.

The Bust may be seen at the studio of JAMES REDFERN, Esq., 29 Clipstone Street, Fitzroy Square, W., who will also receive orders to execute it in marble; and at the INDEX OFFICE, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The proceeds of the sale of the 500 casts being for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, all orders must be addressed, and money orders made payable, to Mr. HENRY HOTZE, 17 Savile Row, W.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

TWO Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General Jackson, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. Foley, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for 1,000*l.*, while 500*l.* may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for 1,500*l.* a complete Statue of 'Stonewall' Jackson, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for 'General Jackson's Statue,' at Messrs. Coutts & Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

Amongst the slain in the late abortive and ridiculous attempt to reach Richmond was Colonel Dahlgren, and in his pockets were found papers explaining the objects of the expedition. If it was not conceived and arranged by Butler, then there is in the world a more infamous wretch than Mr. Lincoln's favourite general; and if it was planned by Butler, then we cannot but feel astonished at the ingenuity with which he makes a name execrated by mankind still more execrable. Not that Butler is the only or even the chief criminal. The New England faction at the White House who employ him are more culpable than their tool; and the men who joined the late enterprise, well knowing its objects, deserve as well as Butler the opprobrium of mankind.

The scheme was not to capture Richmond, but to destroy the city, and murder the inhabitants. The instructions found on Dahlgren are very precise, as the following quotations will show:—

> Guides and pioneers, with oakum, turpentine, and torpedos, signal officer, quartermasters, commissaries, scouts and pickets and men in rebel uniforms—these will remain on the north bank, &c.
> All mills must be burned and the canal destroyed, and also everything which can be used by the rebels must be destroyed, including the boats on the river.
> The men must be kept together and well in hand, and once in the city, it must be destroyed and J. F. Davis and his Cabinet killed. Pioneers will go along, with combustible material. The officer must use his discretion about the time of assisting us. Horses and cattle which we do not need immediately must be shot, rather than left.
> The pioneers must be prepared to construct a bridge or destroy one. They must have plenty of oakum and turpentine for burning, which will be soaked and rolled into balls and be given to the men to burn when we get into the city.

We will not comment on the above, but extract a few sentences from an editorial published in the Richmond Sentinel:—

> The papers found on the person of Colonel Dahlgren, copies of which we publish to-day, reveal clearly the character and objects of the late expedition against this city, and make more evident the grossness of its folly and the completeness of its failure. The enemy moved from Culpepper, according to the programme, in two columns of picked men, three hours apart in time, and diverging in different directions. Colonel Dahlgren led the advance column. A part of his object was to destroy our artillery at Frederickshall, but he found the artillery in a hollow square, with muzzles outwards, and he passed on. Another purpose was to cross James river with his main force, and move down in great secrecy and take Richmond by surprise. . . . . The soldiers were to scatter firebrands everywhere, our bridges were to be burned, our President, the commander-in-chief of our army, was to be killed. His Cabinet was to share his fate. So far as they were concerned, the black flag was to be raised and no quarter given. Man proposes, but God disposes. Lincoln, through his armed emissaries, has told us what he would like to do, and he has made the attempt to do it. Morally, therefore, he and his officers are guilty of the crime. As for Dahlgren, he has paid the penalty. He has found the death he came to deal. Instead of writing his name among the stars, as he fondly hoped, he has been buried like a dog, without priest or coffin, in the swamps of Virginia. His name will stink and his memory will rot. The odium due to him attaches in greater force to his superiors, both civil and military. Let Lincoln and Kilpatrick remember that they have bidden their subordinates give no quarter to the Confederate chiefs. Perhaps even a Scotch cap and a military cloak will not prevent a just and stern vengeance from overtaking them for this revolting outrage on civilisation and the rules of war. . . . . The orders which Dahlgren proclaimed to his men and the purposes avowed are unexampled in the history of the world. Cities have indeed been sacked, but it was only after an obstinate and useless resistance had inflamed the passions of the soldiers and made them uncontrollable by their commanders. Dahlgren expected to take Richmond by surprise, not after an [illegible] defence, or, indeed, any defence. Yet he proclaimed that it was his purpose to sack, burn, and [illegible] will. What imagination can paint the horrors of which this city would have been the scene on Monday, if Dahlgren's purpose had succeeded? History furnishes no example of the murder, arson, robbery, rape, and conflagration which would have prevailed. The President and his Cabinet were doomed by name, and were to fall at the hands of the [illegible]. Does any one believe that any official of any grade would have escaped the [illegible] of prisoners?

It is announced in the New York papers that General William Preston and Captain Walker Fearn were officially presented by the Confederate agent at Havanah to the Captain-General, and officially received at the Viceregal palace. As the distinguished diplomatic character of these gentlemen gives more than ordinary plausibility to the report of their mission to the Empire of Mexico, this exhibition of Spanish courtesy has doubtless some of the significance which the New York press appears to attach to it. The report acquires further probability from the well-known and sincere desire of the Confederate States to establish and to maintain the most cordially friendly relations with their neighbour. But we risk nothing in asserting our well-founded conviction that in the formal expression of this desire the future Emperor must himself take the initiative, and that the Confederacy will not expose itself to the risk of a rebuff from the youngest and least mature of Governments. It is Mexico, far more than the Confederate States, which needs an indulgent construction, on the part of other nations, of her title to rank as their peer. It is impossible to conceive of any single substantial advantage that Mexico has it in her power to confer upon the Confederacy by recognition. The Emperor Maximilian, on ascending his throne, finds as his neighbour a Power with a more united population, with a Government more firmly seated, with greater military and financial resources, than he for some years can hope to command. He has not the excuse of European monarchies of being hampered by preexisting obligations, for the Confederacy is actually older than his Empire. To invite intercourse with one of the fragments of the late Union, and to ignore the political existence of the other, as a leading London journal a few days ago informed us was his intention, would, therefore, in his case at least, be not only a departure from the strict neutrality which it must be his policy to preserve, but it would be a deliberate and gratuitous insult to the Power which he can least afford to offend, and which alone in America has alike the wish and the ability to befriend him. Even that alliance between Mexico and the South, which, with equal disregard of the circumstances and requirements of either, has been talked of by over-zealous friends, would not be so absurdly purposeless and suicidal a step. We refer to this matter only because a stray paragraph in last Saturday's Globe has given a certain degree of currency to an idea which is, to say the least, not flattering to the tried sagacity of the French Emperor and the high expectations universally entertained of his Imperial protégé. The same subject is treated with remarkable clearness and breadth of view by another of our London contemporaries, to whose generally just appreciation of American politics we only pay a deserved tribute by adopting its article in extenso into our columns.

The inferences drawn from the appointment and arrival at New York of a Consular representative of the Mexican Imperial Regency, appear to be premature. The appointment, as we learn from the New York papers by the last mail, is that of a 'commercial agent,' who, though possessed, in regard to his Government and compatriots, of all the powers of 'Consul,' requires for the discharge of his duties no exequatur, and therefore implies neither a request nor a grant of recognition. This convenient form of representation is employed either by a Government unwilling to recognise the de facto or de jure authority of another, or, vice versâ, by a Government whose own authority is not diplomatically recognised. It has frequently occasioned surprise, that the British Government has not availed itself of this legitimate and universally admitted means of being represented in the Confederate States without any committal to recognition.

> To the President.
> Tallahassee, Fla.: February 21.
> I have just received the following despatch from General Finnegan, dated yesterday: 'I met the enemy in full force [illegible]
> [illegible]

The Richmond papers publish accounts of the battle in [illegible] at 7,000 [illegible]. The Federal loss is computed at 2,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners, besides [illegible] hundred stand of arms, and a vast quantity of ordnance, quartermaster's and commissary stores.' The Confederate loss is estimated at 'about 75 killed and 150 wounded.' The engagement lasted for nearly four hours.

General Finnegan, the Confederate commander at the battle of Olustee, is an Irishman by birth. In early life he enlisted in the United States regular army as a private, and after his discharge went to Florida, where he obtained a local reputation as an engineer, and became a prominent citizen. When the war broke out he joined the Confederate service. His merits secured him rapid promotion, until at last he was made Brigadier-General.

Where is General Sherman? The accounts are various and conflicting; but they agree in one point—that he has reached, or is rapidly retiring to, Vicksburg. But in what condition? The Washington Government, whilst professing ignorance of Sherman's late movements, pretends that he is returning laden with spoils, and after inflicting great damage on the railroads. But the Northerners, though generally willing to credit any story that consorts with their wishes, are not consoled by these official rumours. Besides, it is stated very positively and persistently that Sherman was badly beaten near Meridian, and that he has retired to Vicksburg, harassed on his way by Confederate cavalry, with only a remnant of his army. That this was believed in New York we know by the rapid advance in the price of gold.

The letter of our New Orleans Correspondent gives an account of General Sherman's movements as far as they had transpired.

Admiral Farragut has bombarded Fort Powell, but at the latest dates had not produced any effect. Even if he could reduce and pass Fort Powell, he would have to traverse a narrow channel nine miles long, and fortified on either side, to reach the city. A Federal gunboat has been sunk. The Confederate ram Tennessee, plated with six inches of iron, and carrying seven 100-pounder Parrotts, is lying under the guns of Fort Morgan.

It is reported, viâ Baltimore, that the torpedo boat Davis, commanded by Lieutenant Dixon of Mobile, which sank the Housatonic, has been lost. The Charleston papers of February 27—that is, ten days after the event—had only just heard from Northern sources that the sinking of the Housatonic had been caused by the torpedo.

The attempt to conquer Texas has been abandoned, and a part of the 'army of occupation' has already been withdrawn, and had arrived at New Orleans on February 21.

The Federals in North Carolina report that the Confederates are preparing to attack Newbern, Plymouth, and Washington. They say that, besides the land forces under General Pickett, the Confederates have three powerful rams, one in the Neuse river, another in the Roanoke river, and the third in the Tar river.

We have to record another daring naval feat of the Confederates. The steamer Iolas (not S. P. Thomas, as reported by telegraph), employed as a despatch steamer between Fortress Monroe and Cherrystone Point, and the steam transport Titan, loaded with commissary stores, were lying at anchor at Cherrystone Point on the morning of March 5. The crews were awakened about 4 o'clock, A.M., and found the vessels in possession of a body of Confederates. This gallant adventure was achieved by thirty men under the command of Captain Fitzhugh and Captain Taylor Wood of the Confederate navy. Captain Webster gave bonds for $70,000 for the Iolas, and the vessel was released. The Titan, a strong and useful vessel, and having on board a valuable cargo of army stores, was taken into the Rappahannock river.

Besides capturing the two vessels, the Confederates destroyed the telegraphic station at Cherrystone Point, and the submarine cable, which was the only means of communication between Fortress Monroe, Baltimore, and Washington.

The Savannah News gives the following account of a fight below Savannah, that took place on February 22:—

Early on Monday morning the Yankees landed a force from 300 to 400 on the island from a number of barges. A force of about 150 men from the 85th Pennsylvania, under the command of First Lieutenant Michener, immediately advanced and drove in our pickets. So rapid were their movements that they succeeded in cutting off about 150 negroes, together with their overseers, who were engaged at work in that vicinity. These negroes, however, and their overseers, succeeded in making their escape, and reached our lines in safety. Our troops soon opened on the enemy, and repulsed them. We captured Lieutenant Michener, a corporal named Shallenberger, and a private named J. C. Bailey, of the 85th Pennsylvania regiment. Several of the enemy were wounded. We lost one man killed, belonging to Maxwell's Light Battery. This was the only casualty on the Confederate side. No negroes were lost. Lieutenant Richardson brought the prisoners to this city; and they are now confined in the barracks.

Northern papers are constantly assuring their readers that the negroes are anxious 'to escape' into the Federal lines. It will be seen from the above, so far from having any desire to join the Federals, that even when captured by the enemy, they return to the Confederate lines if they have the opportunity.

From the Richmond Whig of March 2 we learn that the recent raid of Kilpatrick's cavalry upon Richmond failed primarily through the treachery or ignorance of a negro guide. Colonel Dahlgren, one of the officers in command, appears not to have hesitated between these two alternatives, for at Goochland, on the march, he had the negro hanged forthwith. The Whig adds: 'It is not to be supposed that it would have been successful had it been otherwise. The whole force is estimated at about two large brigades, and, whatever the object, they have won a title to considerable boldness, to say the least of it.'

The following address from the Confederate Governor of Louisiana to the people of New Orleans has been extensively circulated in the latter city in the form of a handbill:—

Executive Office, Shreveport, La.:
January 30, 1864.

To the citizens of New Orleans: I greet you as the Governor of Louisiana. Your trials and your troubles are well known, your patriotic conduct fully appreciated by the Executive of your State. Do not be despondent. Do not despair, but rather let the fires of patriotism burn brightly at every fireside, for in a few short months you shall be free. You have been despoiled, and robbed, and basely insulted. Every indignity that a brutal, unprincipled, and vindictive foe could invent, has been heaped upon you. Bear your persecutions as did your fathers before you, and nerve your hearts for the coming hour. Our people are flocking to the army in every direction, and when the spring campaign opens, half a million of gallant Confederate soldiers will strike for Liberty and independence. Citizens of New Orleans! be true to yourselves, and your State will be true to you. Spurn all propositions for compromises of any kind. Spit upon the insulting proposal for a bastard State Government. Keep your own counsels, do your duty, and bide your time—you shall be free. The hated tyrants who lord it over you now, who daily insult you without remorse, and rob you without shame, these accursed villains, this crew of thieves and murderers, will yet receive their reward. Ladies of New Orleans! God Almighty bless you and sustain you in your trials—may Heaven guard you and protect you! When the spring time comes, gentle ladies, you will see the 'grey coats' again, and then you shall welcome back to New Orleans the sons and daughters of Louisiana. You are the treasure of the earth. Oh! be not weary in well-doing! cheer up the despondent. Be kind to our prisoners who are languishing in the wretched cells of the enemy. You will receive the undying gratitude of your country, and in Heaven above will have your reward.

Henry W. Allen, Gov. State Louisiana.

The disasters of the opening spring campaign appear to have brought even the Republican organs to their senses. At any previous period of the war, such a paragraph as the following, which we copy from the New York Times of March 7, would have appeared simply impossible as the editorial utterance of the leading Administration journal:—

The Rebel Spirit.—We are very sorry indeed that the opinion entertained for some time past by many excellent people, that the rebel army and Confederacy were so badly broken down that they would do no more serious fighting this spring, or henceforward, has not been sustained by our latest experiences. The rebels in their recent encounters, in different parts of the country, with our troops, under Generals Seymour, Sherman, Smith, and Palmer, have fought with their usual obstinacy and pertinacity, and marched with their ordinary celerity. Their small detachments everywhere show fight, and their large armies stand their ground. The rebel backbone is undoubtedly in a frightful condition, and those unacquainted with morbid anatomy might easily imagine that it was quite impossible for the monster to stand erect. But he does stand, nevertheless, and it is wisest for us neither to ignore his vitality nor his power. As long as the armies of Lee and Johnston exist, we shall have a great deal of work to do; and even they, we fear, will have to be killed half a dozen times before they can be accounted dead.

The Southern people are now exhibiting to the world a spectacle which we believe has no parallel in history. We do not refer to their prowess in the field to the practical evidences they are now giving of the noiseless but energetic preparations of the last winter, which have made them stronger at the opening of this campaign than in any previous one. We refer to the tax which retires two-thirds of their entire currency from circulation, to restore value to the rest. One of the Richmond papers truly calls this a 'forced loan,' but it is self-imposed by the people, and is such a measure as no great self-governed community ever before submitted to with cheerfulness and enthusiasm.

More important than even the war news are the hourly-growing symptoms of the speedy disintegration of that solid phalanx which, outwardly at least, the North has heretofore presented against the South. As the hour of contest for the great prize of the Presidency draws nearer, we foresee more clearly the scene of anarchy and intestine strife which in November next may culminate in the overthrow of what is still left of the Federal Union. The confusion of their adversaries has also made the Democrats bolder. Never before did their organs speak in such clarion tones as this haughty defiance we find in the Boston Courier of the 8th instant:—

For more than two years the moral, social, commercial, and political interests of America have been neglected and sacrificed, to serve the purposes of a bigoted and ignorant faction that assumes and is allowed the name of philanthropy, for no possible reason, unless that its members are the most malignant haters upon earth. With a persistency proportionate to the narrowness of their ideas, the conspirators of this faction have pressed upon the feeble and time-serving Chief Magistrate whom, for our sins, Heaven permitted to be chosen to rule us, until they have induced him to violate his oath of office, and every pledge of adherence to duty, policy, and law which he made to the people on his induction into office. For this subservience to the tempter, that unfortunate and guilty functionary is now receiving the usual and appropriate reward which falls to every deluded victim of such agencies of evil. He is deserted and reviled by those whom he has sacrificed his country and his good name to serve, and is on his rapid way to a position compared with which his former insignificance might well be thought a blessing. Meanwhile the country groans in agony. Ruin and death threaten it on every side, and the people, breaking the withs of party and tearing the bandage of Radical delusion from their eyes, are seeking safety in earnest. The great reaction is beginning—not an hour too soon.

In the discussion on proposed amendments to the Constitution, the Hon. Garrett Davis, of Kentucky, offered a resolution to divide New England into two States, Massachusetts and Maine constituting one, and New Hampshire, Connecticut, Vermont, and Rhode Island the other. Nothing could be more equitable than this, if the 'reconstructed Union' is to have a consolidated Government, in which the States, instead of being contracting parties, are to be mere subdivisions for more convenient local administration. Nothing, on the other hand, can show how directly opposite to this theory is the Constitution as it now exists, than the status which it gives to the New England States. The area of all New England is 65,093 square miles. There are five other single free States larger than this. New England, by the last census, had a population of 3,135,301. New York alone had 3,887,542. New England in its States possessed a value in real estate and personal property of $1,863,848,765; New York alone had $1,843,238,517. Yet the six New England States have twelve members of the Senate, while New York has but two. Here is New York superior in population and nearly equal in wealth to all New England, yet outvoted in the Senate of the United States by twelve to two. Ohio, Pennsylvania, and New York, not far from three times greater and richer than the six New England States, have but six members of the Senate, while New England has twelve, enabling the latter section in the Senate to offset and control in its vote any six of the largest States of the Union.

Another scene in Mr. Lincoln's electioneering farce in Louisiana has been played out by the choice of Mr. Hahn as Governor. It is amusing to find that there are a few individuals who treat this farce as a serious matter. A person signing himself 'A Free-State Man and a Freeman' writes to the New Orleans Times to protest against the election. He says: 'We believe that if such elections are held valid, free Republican government will be more disgraced in the eyes of the world than by anything that has occurred before in America. Finally, we give notice to those who claim to have been elected State officers at that time, that if they shall presume to exercise those functions they will be deemed by the mass of the people of Louisiana but usurpers and intruders.'

Mr. Chase has been roughly handled by Congress. The House of Representatives passed a Bill authorising him to anticipate the payment of the interest on the public debt, but would not authorise him to sell gold under any circumstances. Considering that Mr. Chase has been selling gold, the rejection of a measure that would have covered the unconstitutional proceeding was annoying and dangerous. The telegraphic summary from New York, just received, says that Mr. Chase has formally withdrawn his name as a candidate for the Presidency, and that the Senate has passed a Bill authorising him to sell gold, and that the Bill has been sent to the House of Representatives. No one can fail to see why Mr. Chase has ceased to oppose Mr. Lincoln's reelection, and why Mr. Lincoln's Congress has passed Mr. Chase's Gold Bill. The fall in the price of gold from 63 to 62¼ is less the result of legislation than of the withdrawal of Mr. Chase from a position that, if persevered in, would have involved his resignation, and his resignation would have precipitated the downfall of his paper edifice.

In endeavouring to manufacture three sham votes in Florida, Mr. Lincoln spent a large sum of public money, and sacrificed above 1,500 men. He does not, however, despise more vulgar electioneering tricks. The New York World says: 'We are informed, on the best authority, that President Lincoln has ordered the Secretaries of War and of the Navy to give out no more of the advertising patronage of their departments, except, under his direction, to papers which he selects.'

The friends of General Fremont are working hard to procure for their man a formal nomination for the next Presidency. The German Republicans are enthusiastic for Fremont, and threaten vengeance if he is beaten.

Englishmen will be unfeignedly glad to hear that Mr. Justice Ritchie, of St. John, New Brunswick, has released the Confederates taken from the Chesapeake, 'upon the grounds that no proper requisition has been made by the Federal Government, that there is no treaty existing which would justify their being delivered up, that Mr. Magistrate Gilbert had no jurisdiction in the case, and that the warrant issued for their arrest was insufficient.' So the Yankees will lose their anticipated feast of blood, and the shameful conduct of the British police magistrate Gilbert—who, as we announced last week, bullied his prisoners, and stigmatised them as villains and cowards—will not consign these brave men to a cruel death.

On February 25, thirty-four Confederate prisoners escaped from confinement in New Orleans. Ten of them were brought back the next day, but the rest appear to have got off.

An amendment of the Constitution of the State of New York, by which soldiers are allowed to vote in camp, has been carried by a large majority. The numbers in New York City and Brooklyn were 25,235 for it, and 7,479 against it. It will thus be seen that the Democratic party did not oppose the change, but even supported it. We think no one can dissent from the views of our New York Correspondent, that the policy of the War-Democrats is foolish and disastrous.

The Northern papers deny that General Sickles has charged General Meade with nearly losing the battle of Gettysburg by ordering a retreat, but say that this fact was elicited by the Military Committee in the course of an enquiry into matters connected with the above-named battle. A much more serious charge against General Meade, in the eyes of those who gain power or money by the war, is that he has expressed an opinion that the North cannot conquer the South.

The draft in the North, ordered for March 10, has been postponed, and the term for the payment of bounties ha been extended to April 1.

The Annual Report of the Commissioners of Emigration to the Legislature states that the total number of aliens landed at the port of New York in 1863 was 156,844. Of these emigrants 92,157 were from Ireland, 35,002 from Germany, 18,757 from England, and 10,928 from other countries.

The correspondent of the New York Tribune announces that blockade-running at Charleston has been actively renewed.

General Grant has visited Washington, received his commission as Lieutenant-General, inspected the army of the Potomac, and gone to Nashville. It is expected he will replace General Meade, who is just now out of favour, for reasons explained by our Letter from New York.

It is said that Admiral Wilkes is to be brought before a court-martial for disobedience and insubordination.

The fluctuation in the price of gold in New York has been considerable. It advanced in consequence of the bad military news to 69 per cent. premium, but was quoted on the 12th inst. at 62¾ premium, the fall being brought about by the causes set forth in a preceding note.

ENGLAND.

At Cork, last week, John Sullivan, John Murphy, Edward Pyburn, Thomas Murphy, Denis Leary, and Daniel O'Connell, appeared before the Court on an indictment charging that they, being natural born subjects of the Queen, did, on the 4th November last, at Queenstown, without license from Her Majesty, agree to enlist and enter service as sailors on board a vessel called the Kearsage, an American ship of war, contrary to the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The defendants severally pleaded guilty, and one of them stated that they did not think it was any harm. The Attorney-General (for Ireland) then addressed the Court, and said that the defendants had submitted wisely; for the evidence was conclusive, and a trial could not have resulted favourably for them. He would take the opportunity of announcing to the people the nature of the statute, the mischief which it was intended to prevent, and the determination of the Executive to enforce its provisions. Presented in the briefest untechnical language, the effect of the 2nd section of the Act 59 Geo. III. c. 69, was to forbid any natural born subject of the Queen, without her express authority, to enlist in any foreign military or naval service, under pain of fine and imprisonment at the discretion of the Court. The policy of the law was wise. It tended to the maintenance of amity and peace among the great family of civilised nations. It prevented the interference of the people of one State with the affairs of others; it forbade men to shed their blood for the wretched hire of the mercenary without the justification of self-defence. The circumstances of Ireland made the strict enforcement of the statute especially necessary. He lamented the vast emigration which had been produced by much suffering and depression in latter years, and encouraged by the increased facilities of transit and the larger rewards of labour beyond the seas. Yet the free egress of the people could not be forbidden, save when made for purposes condemned by the law. A fearful struggle was convulsing the Western continent, great interests were in deadly conflict, and gigantic armies were striving for triumph with unexampled sacrifices on either side; that struggle commanded their anxious attention, as it affected the interests of humanity and the destinies of the world. Those who administered the law must see that, so far as may be possible, the subjects of this realm should not meddle with it to their own destruction, and the interruption of friendly relations with Powers which, though hostile to each other, were not either of them hostile to the British Power. When all the blood that had been shed and all the suffering endured by Irishmen in that terrible contest were considered, the necessity for the enforcement of the law became more painfully apparent. The Irishmen had been slaughtered wholesale. It was said that 200,000 of them from first to last had lost their lives. It had been stated that in December last there were in New York, in a condition of pauperism, 108,911 persons born in Ireland, of whom 65,500 were Irishwomen. It was impossible to offer proof more appalling of the wretchedness which had been born of that war, or argument more persuasive of the propriety of efforts to save the people who still remained at home from the calamities they tempted by seeking to engage in it. Not merely, therefore, for the loyal maintenance of international relations, but also from regard to the safety and well-being of the Irish community, would the Government put the law in force to the best of its power, and with perfect impartiality towards the South as well as the North. This was the first prosecution of the kind, and the Court would deal leniently with the offenders, but thereafter the heaviest punishment would be awarded.

After the speech of the learned counsel, a conversation ensued between the Judge and the Attorney-General, in the course of which the latter stated that in his opinion justice would be satisfied if His Lordship would bind the defendants to come up for judgment at a future day if necessary, the real object being to let the whole country know what the law was, and that it would be enforced.

Thereupon His Lordship said that the young men before him had entered the service of the United States of America, a Power at peace with Great Britain; had gone on board an armed vessel of that State in the friendly harbour where she was received—at Queenstown—in the grossest violation of all amicable relations which ought to exist between friendly Powers. The officers of that navy well knew that they were violating the municipal laws of Ireland in taking the subjects of the realm on board their ship, to commit a gross violation of the municipal law, to entrap the men to expose their lives on a foreign soil and for a foreign object in which the people of this country were in no way concerned. He regretted that these young men, who were seduced perhaps, in their ignorance of the law, by a love of adventure and a desire to see other lands, were now before him, and that those who had induced them to violate the law were not before him. His Lordship fully concurred in all that had fallen from the Attorney-General, and in the advice to his countrymen to hold aloof from that internecine conflict in which so many Irishmen were engaged. He hoped that the men before him would reflect on the lesson they had just heard, and that they and their friends would not again be found violating the law. He should order the prisoners to stand out on their own recognisances to come up when called on.

The prisoners were discharged upon their own recognisances in 20*l.* to come up for sentence when called on to do so.

The Lords of the Treasury have drawn up a minute granting a special pension to Sir Rowland Hill, K.C.B., Secretary to the General Post Office. The minute bears date March 11, 1864. It recites that Sir Rowland Hill had been compelled by ill health to resign his appointment. It states that under ordinary circumstances the pension would amount only to 666*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*, but that an occasion is offered of peculiar fitness for calling into action the special clause of the Superannuation Act, and for thus bringing before Parliament the services of Sir Rowland. His term of office had been 20 years, but mere time was not the measurement of his merits. Under his auspices the postal system had been transformed. The number of letters transmitted had increased ninefold, and the transmission was made at a cost not exceeding one-ninth of the former charge. Reference is next made to the carrying of books, the sending of money, and the system of savings' banks, to the improved condition of the servants employed in the Post Office, and to the moral and social benefit that has accrued to the masses from facilities of communication. The present gross revenue is stated at 3,878,000*l.*, as against the ancient revenue of 2,346,000*l.*, while the net revenue is 1,790,000*l.* in lieu of the almost equal sum of 1,660,000*l.* Their Lordships wish to do justice to all who have promoted in any way the system of the penny post, but Sir Rowland Hill reduced matter of speculation to practice, overcoming all obstacles.

On Wednesday, March 16, being the anniversary of the death of the Duchess of Kent, the Queen and Royal family visited the mausoleum of the Duchess at Frogmore, to witness the ceremony of uncovering the statue of Her Royal Highness. The statue, which is by Theed, and was modelled under the superintendence of the late Prince Consort, represents the Duchess standing. It is on a pedestal of imperial red Portuguese marble, and is placed in a temple over the chamber containing the sarcophagus. Over the statue is inscribed,

Her children arise up and call her blessed.

The following lines, composed by Alfred Tennyson, are also inscribed:—

Long as the heart beats life within her breast.
Thy child will bless thee, guardian, mother mild,
And far away thy memory will be blest
By children of the children of thy child.

The temple forming the mausoleum was also designed by the late Prince Consort.

By the command of Her Majesty the Queen, Colonel the Hon. C. B. Phipps has addressed a letter to J. A. Roebuck, Esq., M.P. for Sheffield, informing the latter gentleman that it is Her Majesty's intention to contribute 200*l.* towards the relief of the sufferers by the calamity at Sheffield. In the same letter is contained an expression of the deep sympathy of the Queen for the poor persons thus suddenly overwhelmed with grief, and exposed to suffering of every description in consequence of that unexpected and dire calamity.

It is now ascertained that the number of persons missing is 241. The subscription for the relief of the survivors already amounts to nearly 20,000*l.*

His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, was taken suddenly ill on Saturday morning last, and is still extremely unwell.

The clergy of the diocese of Sarum have addressed their Bishop on the subject of the late decision in the Privy Council in the case of the 'Essays and Reviews.' It will be remembered that the prosecution against the Rev. Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson was commenced by the Bishop of Salisbury. The clergy, then, in their address sympathise with His Lordship in the anxieties which must have harassed him in the course of the prolonged litigation, and assure him of their respect and affection. The clergy are convinced that the judgment of the Privy Council is such as to cause deep anxiety to a large majority of the members of the Church of England. They do not doubt that the learned Lords decided according to the law, but they console themselves with the reflection that they are not bound to acquiesce in decisions which, though not contrary to the law, are adverse to the spiritual faith of the Church of England. Therefore they conclude that the law and discipline of the Church must be defective, inasmuch as it allows doctrines to be promulgated entirely inconsistent with the teaching of the Church in its obvious and received meaning. They desire a revision of the ecclesiastical laws and courts. In the meantime they hope and believe that by the Formularies and Articles of the Church her members may be preserved in the faith.

Every year brings fresh proof of the deep and increasing interest taken by the general public in the athletic contests which, whether waged between the two great Universities, the public schools, or the rival clubs attached to other public bodies, serve to develope the manly vigour of the English race. Perhaps no struggle attracts so vast a crowd, or creates so much excitement, as the annual boat-race between the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Saturday last witnessed no falling off in the crowds of anxious spectators, or in the enthusiastic desire for victory of both parties. The course appointed for the race was the four miles of the River Thames between Putney and Mortlake, and the vast multitude that was conveyed in twenty-one steamers, loaded till the decks were almost flush with the stream, and that lined the shore and the bridges, and every point from which anything could be seen, carried the imagination back to Epsom and the unrivalled glories of the Derby day. His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was present on board the Thames Subscription steamer George Peabody, and was accompanied by Prince John of Glücksburg. Some additional interest attached to the contest of Saturday last, from the fact that of the twenty races which have marked previous years, Cambridge has won ten and Oxford ten, and that now the honour of supremacy was in the balance. Unfortunately, however, for the fame of Cambridge, victory had gone for three successive years to Oxford, and that, too, without any such prowess on the part of Cambridge as to make a defeat less painful. The betting at starting was about 2 to 1 on Oxford, and few were found bold enough to take the odds in face of the manifest superiority of the style of Oxford. The race itself requires but little description. Immediately after the first hurried effort had subsided into a regular sweep, the Oxford boat went to the front, and with a fine and level stroke quickly gained a considerable lead on their opponents, who in vain tried, by superhuman efforts, to avert the defeat which seemed inevitably to await a style of rowing which was little better than a series of spasmodic jerky strokes. Eventually, without any real exertion, the Oxford crew won by about twelve boats' lengths, completing the course in 21 min. 48 sec. It may be as well to remark that the race is always rowed in eight-oared boats, and that the crews are selected from the students or undergraduates of the Universities, to the exclusion of all persons who have taken a degree.

In the evening, according to custom, the rival crews were entertained at dinner by the Thames Subscription Club, at Willis's Rooms. The chair was taken by the Hon. G. Denman, M.P. Due honour was of course done to the customary toasts.

On Friday evening last, the four-handed billiard match between the representatives of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge was played. Messrs. Payne and Horne appeared for Cambridge, and Messrs. Starkey and Hobbs for Oxford. The game was 500 up, and after an exciting struggle, Cambridge won, the score at the finish standing at 500 for Cambridge and 481 for Oxford.

On the following evening the single match was played, and resulted in favour of Oxford.

The racket-match was also gained by Oxford.

The unrivalled herd of cattle which has won for Colonel Towneley more prizes and more glory than it has ever before fallen to the lot of any breeder to acquire, was disposed of by auction on Thursday last, at the Home Farm, Towneley. Mr. Strafford acted as auctioneer. More than 2,000 persons were present, and among them were many breeders from Australia, America, and the Continent. The whole of the cattle was put up to sale without reserve, with the exception of the renowned bull Royal Butterfly, on whom the price put was 1,200 guineas. However, no advance was made on that reserve, and the animal returned to the Farm. Ten bulls were then put up for sale in succession, and realised an aggregate sum of 1,416 guineas, the bull Royal Butterfly II. going for 400 guineas. Next 44 cows and heifers were put up, and realised 5,093 guineas. Royal Butterfly's Duchess was bought by Mr. Betts, of the county of Kent, for 500 guineas. Brampton Butterfly went for 350 guineas, Double Butterfly for 300 guineas, and Royal Butterfly's Pageant for 500 guineas. The Dukes of Sutherland, Devonshire, and Newcastle, Lords Derby, and Sudeley, Colonel Douglas Pennant, and Mr. Naylor, the owner of Maccaroni and other great racehorses, were among the principal purchasers.

The House of Lords will give judgment in the Alexandra case (the Attorney-General v. Sellim and others) on an early day after the Easter Recess.

The trial of the case of the Pampero is fixed for the 5th May next.

On Tuesday last the case of Lord Coventry v. Willes came on at the assizes at Cambridge, before Mr. Justice Compton and a special jury of the county. The defendant is the sporting correspondent of the Morning Post, and usually enlightens the world on racing topics under the name of 'Argus.' Certain differences had arisen some time since between the defendant and the stewards of the Jockey Club, and the power of the pen as wielded by 'Argus' had so far exasperated the stewards, who had been the subject of some strong remarks, that they determined to exercise their prerogative and to warn Mr. Willes not to come upon Newmarket Heath. Mr. Willes in spite of such prohibition attended the races, and therefore the stewards brought an action against him for trespass. The defendant put on the record about a dozen pleas, some of which set up a right of way, and others a custom to attend and see the races run. To this class of pleas the plaintiffs had demurred, and the Queen's Bench had given judgment in their favour. There was also another class of pleas denying the trespass, the possession of the stewards, and setting up a leave and license of the plaintiffs to the defendant. On these pleas issue had been joined, and now the trial of those issues had come on. Mr. O'Malley, Q.C. and Mr. Bulwer appeared for the plaintiffs, and Mr. Keane, Q.C. and Mr. Phear for the defendants. There was no question as to whether a trespass had been committed, nor indeed could a leave and license be maintained in the face of a correspondence which had passed between Mr. Willes and the attorneys to the Jockey Club. The only difficulty was as to the possession of the stewards. It seems that some years ago the portion of the Heath on which the trespass occurred, was purchased by the Jockey Club, and that the stewards of the Jockey Club, who are chosen by the Club from among their own members, manage the heath, and exercise over it certain acts of ownership. The most important witness was Mr. C. Weatherby, the secretary to the Jockey Club, whose cross-examination, ably conducted by Mr. Keane, elicited an amusing history of the debates and conduct of the Jockey Club. In relevancy to the action the learned counsel attempted to get from the witness admissions that in all their conduct in office the stewards were mere agents for carrying out the directions of the Jockey Club, in fact, mere servants of the Club; that there were three stewards, each of whom was elected for three years, one going out every year. Mr. Keane, in an eloquent address to the jury, admitted the credit which generally attached to the conduct of the Jockey Club, but severely censured their severity in the present case. He argued that the Jockey Club invited all the world to come, that between the appointment of the new stewards in April 1863 and the alleged trespass, the defendant was never forbidden to come, and, therefore, that the defendant had the leave of the owners of the soil to come. That was the question for the jury. Then again the prohibition was conditioned on an apology. The defendant made an apology, and the Club had not pronounced the apology insufficient. The learned judge summed up, leaving to the jury the three questions of the trespass, the occupation, and the license. The jury found at once for the plaintiff, damages, one shilling.

THE CONTINENT.

The military circles at Berlin have apparently some foundation for their complaints: they have gained very little martial glory, and still less credit for combination, celerity, or even dash, in the Danish war. The Austrians have advanced up the peninsula with some rapidity, occupying Veile, Horsens, Skanderborg, and Aarhus on their way, and thus cutting off the besieged fortresses of Düppel and Fredericia from the seat of government at Copenhagen; to the Prussians, on the other hand, has been left the prosaic task of occupying the ground seized by their smart brethren in arms, of reducing the beleaguered places by slow and regular siege, of gnawing, as it were, the well-picked bones of glory cast aside by the Austrian dogs of war. To describe the infinitesimal operations of the Prussians before Düppel would be wearisome to all parties: how they took Nübel and Räckebull with a loss of four killed and eleven wounded; how they captured thirty-three prisoners at Lillemolle; how they overpowered a company of ninety-six men on the island of Femeren or Fehmorn (the nomenclature of these places is as uncertain as their nationality). Are they not written in the German newspapers? The only fact of any importance resulting from all these movements is that the bombardment of Düppel has commenced, and preparations are being made for the shelling of Sönderburg across the strait. The investment and bombardment of Fredericia is also in progress, the advance of the Austrians covering the left flank of their allies during the operation.

The statement of the Allied and Federal forces made last week may be contrasted with a calculation of the strength of the Danish army opposed to them. It appears that the reserve corps of Royal Guards is stationed at Copenhagen, and a few battalions for the organisation of recruits in the islands of Zeeland and Fünen; of the force actually on service, three regiments, together with the strength of the cavalry, are in North Jutland, awaiting, we suppose, the advance of the Austrians; ten regiments are in Fredericia, and nine occupied in the defence of Düppel and Alsen; of the latter, one half is kept at Sönderburg, one regiment holds the advanced posts, another holds the ten redoubts covering the western face of the position, the remainder are engaged on the works not yet completed within the line of redoubts. What the strength of a Danish regiment is we are not told; but, according to the usual Continental rules of computation, the twenty-two regiments would number about 35,000 effectives. The loss on the whole number, up to March 13, was 1,926 men, 43 officers, and 2 surgeons, killed, wounded, or missing.

While we are on this subject we may also give a computation of the Danish naval forces recently received. They consist of 1 ship of the line, 4 frigates, 2 corvettes, 1 turret ship, 2 schooners, 4 paddlewheels, and 3 gunboats, all propelled by steam; to man this force more than 8,000 men are required, over 6,000 of whom have still to be raised.

A sea-fight took place on the 17th inst., off the island of Rugen, between five Danish vessels, and two Prussian frigates assisted by gunboats; the object of the Prussians was apparently to break the blockade, but in this they were unsuccessful, being forced to retire into Schwinemunde, hotly pursued by the enemy. It may be remarked that this is the first naval combat that has taken place in European waters since the battle of Navarino (unless the massacre of Sinope is to be considered as such). What would the old sea-dogs of the time of Nelson have thought, had it been prophesied to them that the style of battle they loved was to be re-inaugurated by Prussia? However, the ice is now fast disappearing; the southern ports of the Baltic have been officially declared open; three Prussian ships now at Brest have orders to attach themselves to the Austrian squadron, when it arrives in these seas from the Mediterranean; it may be that even Prussia shall have its day of naval glory.

We hear of two prizes taken by Austrian men-of-war which have given rise to difficulties. The Frethe, Danish brig, captured by the Schwarzenberg and Schaud, has been ordered out of the port of Lisbon by the Portuguese authorities; and a Danish ship captured off Tenedos has been reclaimed by the Danish Legation in Constantinople as illegally taken in Turkish waters. It remains to be seen whether the Danes or Germans are willing to consider the law of capture so absolutely fixed as Earl Russell has attempted to prove it; we should say that they will rather side with those writers on international law who assert that the law must vary with the circumstances, so that it shall not press more hardly on the one side than on the other. One thing at least is certain, that should the Allies in Denmark occupy all the ports from the interior, as is by no means impossible, the Danish navy will be forced to make war as the Confederate navy now does under exactly analogous circumstances. We are glad to hear that both belligerents have agreed to forego their claims over ships lading in their ports at the commencement of the war. It will be remembered that all such were laid under an embargo by Denmark, and that the German Governments retaliated; the Danes have now offered to take off that embargo if the same concession is made on the other side, an offer which has been accepted by Prussia and Hanover.

As to the proposed Conference between the belligerent Powers without cessation of hostilities, we cannot be said to know much. A report—traceable to English sources—prevails on the Continent, that Denmark has agreed to the proposition, Austria and Prussia having already given in their adhesion to it. It is to be observed that the Continental press have been most assiduous in representing this proposal as the last and only means of averting further hostilities; they state that the Danish Government has been informed by England, France, Russia, and Sweden, that, if this be not accepted, Denmark must take the responsibility and the consequences of the war upon her own shoulders.

The prospects of the Duke of Augustenburg are not more cheerful than they were last week. To begin with, we have had a report of his death; but the victim turned out to be only his uncle. Next in the list of calamities may be reckoned the defence of his cause by the Baron von Roggenbach, Foreign Secretary to the Grand-Duke of Baden, who can substantially find nothing better to urge in his favour than the refusal of Denmark to accept a personal union with the Duchies. The proposition made by the Bavarian representative in the Federal Diet to recognise the Duke, and admit M. de Mohlas as his representative, has been shelved by various technical objections made by Austria and Prussia, so that his cause has not gained much ground in that quarter. Last, but by no means least, comes an article in the Kölnische Zeitung reopening the whole question of his hereditary right ab initio, and stating that his claims are found, after careful and favourable investigation, to be 'partly invalid and partly doubtful.'

The on dits with regard to the expected conduct of Russia are innumerable. They involve an occupation of the Duchy of Posen, and a closer union with Prussia on the basis of the famous, or infamous, treaty of February 1863. The relations of Austria and Prussia are intensely perplexing. A story is abroad that the death of the King of Bavaria has brought to light a secret intrigue between Austria and that country, whereby the latter had promised to send troops into Slesvig in case the Austrian element there should require strengthening. She was, further, to occupy the Tyrol in the event of an Italian war. What greater insult could be offered to so close an ally as Prussia than secretly to conclude such a treaty? What an opportunity for Herr von Bismark to 'step forth and whip hypocrisy!' Unfortunately, it has also transpired that negotiations of exactly the same character have been going on between Prussia and Hanover, without the knowledge of Austria; so now both sides are to cry quits, and Prussia is to assist Austria in Hungary if necessary. Such necessity may not be very far distant: the revolutionary excitement of Poland has spread through Galicia into Hungary, and some demonstrations have occurred in Pesth. Count Palffy, the Imperial Governor of that country, has made a hurried visit to Vienna, and has returned armed with full powers to take any steps he may think convenient. Similar powers have been given to General von Benedek, Commander-in-Chief in Venetia, and the proclamation of a state of siege is shortly expected. As the Emperor is about to pay a visit to that country, and more especially to Venice itself, it seems probable that the proclamation will be delayed until after that event. Some journals have taken particular notice of a long interview between the King of Prussia and Prince Antony von Hohenzollern, who was the leader of the Liberal Cabinet in 1859; they would like to presage from this a favourable change in the royal opinions.

There is no doubt of the popular excitement of Sweden in favour of the integrity of Denmark. The French journals have been at some trouble to prove that Sweden's strength is to sit still; but neither the Government nor the people of that country accept the advice. The troops at Schonen are under immediate orders for service, and an extraordinary credit has been asked for by the King in the Norwegian Parliament. The people, on their side, have continued to assemble in front of the Prussian Ambassador's residence, and some collisions with the military have occurred.

The uneasiness felt around the shores of the Black Sea has not diminished. Both Russian and Turkish forces are being assembled, and a fleet of iron-clads, supported by 13 gunboats, has been launched at Nicolaieff. An iron-clad, built in America for the Russian Black Sea service, has been stopped at the Dardanelles by the Turkish authorities.

Active measures are being taken in Poland to carry out the Imperial proclamation with regard to the serfs; no less active are the police authorities in the execution of their duties. What with the wholesale robbery of property and the extensive deportations to Siberia, it is a marvel that the Polish nation can yet exist. The insurgents still, however, make their presence felt. Arrests, with accompanying circumstances of atrocity and horror, are the principal items of news from that unhappy country. The last story was of an old man of the name of Skrzypecki, a saddler by trade, who was dragged out of his sick-bed by the soldiery and died in their hands, there being no authority to arrested a doctor also.

The command of the army on the Po has been given by the Italian Government to General Cialdini: that on the Mincio has been confided to General Durando: both command ...ve under them a force of 100,000 men. The vigorous efforts against the brigandage in Southern Italy continue; eight known bands still exist, but their whereabouts is pretty well defined; two in the west, under Egidione and Masini; six in the centre and south, under Tortosa, Marciano, Tasca, Manfra, and Crescenzio Gravina; one on the Papal frontier, under Fuoco. Several of these are very small in number, but more from choice than necessity; they have not, apparently, up to this time found much difficulty in recruiting themselves. Four notorious bandits have been convicted at Naples—two of them, La Gala by name, condemned to death, one to penal servitude for life, the last for twenty years. One of the La Galas united to a taste for butchery a singular cannibalism; it appeared on the trial that he had cut off a priest's ears, and eaten them with great satisfaction to himself.

The accounts of Garibaldi's escapade mentioned last week are most conflicting. Some assert the whole story to be fictitious; others say that he did go out, but has now returned; others, again, declare that the search made for him by the Italian Government has been fruitless, and that he has probably landed at some point on the Turkish coast of the Adriatic. The truth is that, whether Garibaldi ever left Caprera or not, he was in the island on the 18th, and has embarked on the Valetta, with six companions, to pay a visit to England. We hope that our countrymen, in their reception of him, will beware of mistaking the admiration due to the patriotic hero for the factious clamour with which too many are inclined to greet the political agitator.

The last accounts from Malta bring the welcome news that the telegraphic communication between that island and Alexandria is restored; the broken ends of the cable were recovered and successfully spliced.

The dissensions between the French and Papal troops at Rome have elicited from the Duc de Montebello, the French Commandant in that city, a remarkable letter, in which he comments on the refusal of the Papal Government to take the only step which will put a stop to the quarrels, by uniting in himself the supreme command over both armies; he declines to remain in so false a position, and begs that he may be recalled to France. It is well known that the Pope objects to the French intrusion as much as the Government of Victor Emmanuel can do, although on it rests his own only chance of sovereignty: but the Emperor of the French is not likely to let his own plans be disturbed by the whims or wishes of Pio Nono. The health of the Pope is still a matter of anxiety; there are great fears of erysipelas in the legs, and the death of the King of Bavaria from that disease has been carefully concealed from him.

If the happiness of a people is to be measured, as some say, by the tameness of its annals, the Belgians ought just now to be the happiest people on earth. On the 19th inst. the Minister of the Interior was called upon to explain to the House the meaning of certain sums asked for the maintenance of the Government offices at Liège. He stated that the Governor of that city was so badly supplied with necessaries in the way of official plate and linen that he was obliged to use those of his own family; at that moment there were only twelve forks and spoons and thirty-five napkins in the Government House; would honourable members have the Governor feed his guests off Britannia metal? ('Why shouldn't he?' from an honourable member.) The explanation was stopped by the murmurs of the House; but it was nevertheless divided by the economical member above mentioned, when there appeared in favour of Britannia metal 6, against it 57.

The elections that have just taken place in Paris present some noteworthy features; they have of course terminated in favour of the Opposition candidates, M. Carnot in the first, and M. Garnier-Pagès in the fifth circumscription: in fact, no Government candidate presented himself, and the choice lay between various shades of so-called 'Democracy.' It is much to be wished that the officious police had abstained from all interference in the matter; their conduct with regard to M. Garnier-Pagès was, to use the mildest term, most ill-advised. It appears that that gentleman had requested his Committee to meet him at his own house, to consider the progress made in canvassing, &c. Notice of this meeting was sent to the police, in order to avoid all difficulty, and no objection was made till the very hour of the meeting, when some commissaries of police entered the house, and required them in no very gentle terms to disperse. A considerable force of police agents was also posted in the street, either to compel obedience, or to see that no further assembly took place; or was it to attach to the meeting the odium of a public surveillance? Such measures are always unpopular, and always defeat their own objects; for there are few cities in which injustice or unfair treatment is so acutely resented as in Paris.

The elections had also their comic element. What should we say in England to a notice similar to that posted up by M. Imbert, calling upon electors not to give way to the blandishments of the 'sex,' and to vote for him like a single 'man?' Or what should we say to the adjurations of another candidate, M. Hugelmann, who, in direct opposition to M. Imbert, calls upon mothers of families to assert their influence over their fathers, husbands, brothers, &c., and send them to support him, M. Hugelmann, who will never drag them into the wrong path.

On the 16th inst., the Prince Impérial entered his ninth year. The event was celebrated by reviews, receptions, promotions in the Legion of Honour, &c. The young gentleman is now a sergeant in the Imperial Guard, having been lately promoted to that grade from the ranks; we have no doubt that he has worked for, and thoroughly deserved, the distinction.

A debate of some interest has taken place in the Senate with regard to the spread of infidel works in France. Cardinal de Bonnechose lifted up his voice against such publications, and required the support of Government to suppress them. It was held, however, unwise on the whole to interfere in these matters: heresy and infidelity must, for the future, be combated by the spiritual arm only.

A peculiar feature of Parisian life is the yearly anxiety with which the signs of spring are looked out for. Every child in the Tuileries looks up with curiosity, as March progresses, to see whether the famous chesnut-tree of March 20 will keep up its reputation; and it is now duly chronicled that that tree was in leaf on the said day—a punctuality for which it was ill repaid by the loungers in the gardens, who stripped off every leaf within reach as mementos.

The French public appear to be fairly satisfied with the result of the debate on Mr. Stansfeld's conduct; the small majority of ten against further enquiry is allowed to be due to the unreasonable manner in which it was made a Government question, while the tone of the daily press has convinced them that the English people is fully alive to the awkwardness of the position.

Every nation has its grievance. Some have not land enough, some have not money enough; some want votes, others liberty. The people of Lima in Peru want ice; the want of ice is their great problem; the power of making ice is their Palladium, their Habeas Corpus, Magna Charta, Code Napoleon—in fact, everything. What then was to be the fate of the company who, promising to supply ice enough for double the population, has allowed its machines to become so ineffective that there is a positive scarcity? Of course hot tempers prevailed, and fiery proposals were made; the municipality, jealous alike of its honour and its ice, stepped in, and the thermometer of public opinion sank down comfortably to its normal freezing point.

The Peruvian Government has introduced another measure for the benefit of the world at large as well as of its own citizens: the coinage is to be thoroughly restored, the debased money called in, and a fresh issue made. The contract for it has been given to a native and an English firm. Even under a Peruvian sun, we suppose the greatest blessing, next of course to plentiful ice, is the knowledge that the shilling you hold in your hand is really and substantially equivalent to twelve pence.

The Richmond Examiner of a late date says: 'The Yankee prisoners have all been supplied with a comfortable outfit of clothing, forwarded from the North. Notwithstanding their assertions to the contrary, every article of food, or stitch of clothing, intended for the Yankees and sent to Richmond, has been delivered to them.'

The Mobile Fortifications.—A correspondent of the Richmond Whig writes of the fortifications of Mobile: 'The fortifications at Mobile are being pushed forward to completion, and are of the most formidable nature, being almost the first self-enfilading works properly and scientifically constructed in all our numerous besieged places. A comparatively small force of infantry—nearly all of whom are also drilling as artillerists—will be able to hold these works against almost any attack.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

MR. STANSFELD AND M. MAZZINI.

The Greco conspiracy has given rise to very animated discussions in the House of Commons. As the case is now concluded, it may be useful to give a brief summary of the circumstances that led to the debates on Thursday and Friday last. At the trial of the conspirators in Paris, the Procureur-General said

He (Greco) was to write to that address in London if he was in want of money. It is to be with 'Mr Flower 35 Thurloe Square, Brompton.' I searched the London Directory.' At page 670 I found what I was looking for, and it was not without some surprise that I discovered the name of a Member of Parliament of England, who recently had been in 1857 appointed to be the leader of the Tibaldi conspiracy against the Emperor's life.

The name Flower is not supposed to designate M. Fiore, the private secretary of M. Mazzini, but M. Mazzini himself; the word 'flower' being the English equivalent for the Italian word 'mazzini,' a little nosegay or flower. No. 35 Thurloe Square is the address of Mr. Stansfeld, M.P. for Halifax and the Civil Lord of the Admiralty. When the affair was first mentioned in the House, Mr. Stansfeld expressed intense indignation at the charge, and warmly defended M. Mazzini, whom he declared to be incapable of the crime of assassination. This was held to be an improper way of meeting such a grave charge against a member of Parliament and a member of the Government, and on another evening the Government was asked if any correspondence had taken place with the French Government about the case. The reply was, that no correspondence had taken place, and that the Government thought it would be undignified to notice such an accusation.

On Thursday last, Sir H. Stracey moved that 'the statement of the Procureur-General on the trial of Greco, implicating a member of the House and of Her Majesty's Government in the plot for the assassination of our ally the Emperor of the French, deserved the serious consideration of the House of Commons.' Sir H. Stracey said that in the trial of Tibaldi and Orsini in 1857 and 1858, Mr. Stansfeld's name had been mixed up: the acte d'accusation contained the words, 'Two other names are still to be cited—that of the Sieur James Stansfeld, brewer, of London, who was also made banker of Mazzini.' Mr. Stansfeld having declared that M. Mazzini was incapable of the crime of assassination, Sir H. Stracey narrated the case of Gallenga alias Marriotti, in which the said Gallenga undertook to kill Charles Albert, and, through a person named Sciandra, obtained from Mazzini 'a poignard with a lapis lazuli handle.' [This Gallenga relented, became a supporter of the Piedmontese Government, and a deputy. M. Gallenga wrote an account of the plot, calling the would-be assassin Marriotti. Mazzini published a letter declaring that Marriotti and Gallenga were the same. Upon this M. Gallenga had to resign his place as deputy, to give up the Cross of SS. Maurice and Lazarus which he had received from the King, and to retire from political life.] Sir H. Stracey also commented on the circumstance of Mr. Stansfeld's name being printed on bank-notes issued by the Italian Liberation Society.

Mr. Stansfeld said he had on a former occasion given a general denial because he did not think there was any evidence adduced by the Procureur-Général to justify the charge being brought against him; but as the matter was regularly before the House, he should not hesitate to give a full explanation. He had never corresponded, directly or indirectly, with Greco, or known his name until he saw his arrest in the papers. No such plot as the Tibaldi plot had ever existed, and he could not therefore have been guilty of supporting it. If any direct accusation about the Orsini matter was brought, he could reply to it. He had assented to his name being put upon the notes of the Italian Liberation Society as London agent, but he was told it was improper, and he withdrew it almost immediately. M. Mazzini could not receive his letters through the continental post-office if openly directed to him, and therefore he had asked his English friends to have them sent to their houses. Letters for M. Mazzini under the name of Fiore had been sent to his (Mr. Stansfeld's) house. He did not know the contents of the letters, but he admitted that, occupying the position he now did in the Government, it was not proper that the correspondence of M. Mazzini should be sent to his house, and M. Mazzini had volunteered to state that he had taken measures to prevent any more of his letters being addressed to 35 Thurloe Square.

Mr. Taylor stated that he was a friend of M. Mazzini, and had had letters addressed to his house for him.

Sir J. Pakington asked Lord Palmerston if he had taken any notice of the affair in his correspondence with the French Government.

Lord Palmerston said Her Majesty's Government had not made any such representation to the Government of France, and he should have felt humiliated if he had been called upon to communicate to the French Government that 'an English gentleman, a member of Parliament holding office under the Government, was not connected with an infamous plot against the Emperor's life.'

Mr. Disraeli addressed the House with great effect. He said Mr. Stansfeld had admitted the facts charged by the Procureur-Général, and therefore, as Lord Palmerston would not promise to communicate with the French Government, it was the duty of the House to pass the motion brought forward by Sir H. Stracey.

The discussion was continued by Mr. Bright, who spoke against the motion, by Lord R. Cecil in favour of it, and by Mr. Gladstone, who denied that the Procureur-Général had made out any case against Mr. Stansfeld. Upon a division the numbers were:

For the motion	161
Against it	171
Majority	10

[The announcement of the numbers was received with cheers and counter cheers, and the excitement of the House, which had been very great during the whole of the debate, reached a climax. It was certainly a narrow majority on such a question, and it is worthy of observation that Mr. Stansfeld voted. It is usual in a personal matter for the member whose conduct is in question not to go into the lobby.

On Friday the subject was again brought before the House by Lord Elcho, who asked Lord Palmerston if Mr. Stansfeld had tendered his resignation. Lord Palmerston replied that when the matter was first noticed in the House Mr. Stansfeld had placed his office entirely at the disposal of the Crown; but he (Lord Palmerston) at once assured that, 'I did not wish him to take that step, that I wished him not to take it.'

Rather an angry discussion ensued; but it was not quite so bitter as that of the preceding evenings. The subject will probably be again brought before Parliament.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER AND THE BRITISH PROVIDENT.

In introducing the Government Annuities Bill, Mr. Gladstone severely criticised the position and conduct of some insurance offices, and amongst others the European and the British Provident. Referring to the latter, he said that Mr. Sheridan, the member for Dudley, had been connected with it. This remark has led to very long explanations. On Thursday night he reiterated his statement that the British Provident had acted dishonestly, that it had not regularly filed its accounts, and that Mr. Sheridan was acting as auditor in 1859, when the accounts were not filed.

Mr. Sheridan denied that the British Provident had been dishonest. He said that, when it was wound up, another company had given a bonus of 6,000*l.* (it afterwards transpired that the amount was between 7,000*l.* and 8,000*l.*) for the policies. He was only auditor for three years; he ceased to be auditor in 1856, and while he was auditor the accounts were filed. He had nothing to do with an action brought against Mr. John Sheridan (his brother), and was not aware of any impropriety in the conduct of the British Provident.

On Friday the matter was again discussed. Mr. Gladstone said he could not withdraw the allegations against the company. If the House thought them untrue, a Committee might be instructed to enquire into the facts; or a resolution might be proposed to the effect that even if the British Provident had been unfortunate, it could not be charged with any dishonest conduct. He could not vote for such a resolution, but if it passed the House, he would 'at once express regret for having been so unfortunate originally as to form an opinion at variance with that of the high authority of the House.' Respecting Mr. Sheridan, the right hon. gentleman said: 'When the name of an hon. gentleman is found bearing a responsible office in a company which appears to be of the character to which I have referred, the effect is twofold. In the first place there arises against him a certain amount of adverse presumption that he is implicated in the transactions of that company, and in the second place there arises this patent and important fact, that his name as connected with these offices in the company has gone out to the world, and has presumably served in the eye of the public as a guarantee of the soundness and respectability of that company. Now, sir, that is precisely what I intended to convey with regard to the hon. member. I should be ashamed to say that I don't think my words are calculated to establish against him a certain amount of adverse presumption. I should also be ashamed to say that I don't think it is most unfortunate that many gentlemen are in the habit of permitting their names unhappily to become guarantees to the public on behalf of institutions of which they don't perhaps know the real character in many cases—which they may in many cases believe, and which they do in many cases believe, to be thoroughly respectable and solvent, but which at the same time may be quite otherwise. And I do not deny that I think a certain amount of blame is to be attached to any one who, as an officer or trustee of a company such as I believe that company was, whether he has direct cognisance of its transactions or not, allows his name to be held out as a guarantee.'

After a few words from Lord Palmerston, expressing a hope that the explanation of Mr. Gladstone would be deemed satisfactory, Mr. Sheridan said: 'Immediately after the speech to which this discussion refers, I rose and stated that I had acted as an auditor of the company many years ago; that the position of the company was then of such a character that the business was both sound and profitable; that I knew of no transaction of the company that deserved any censure; that I ceased to hold office immediately after 1856; that I was in entire ignorance of any of the other incidents by which he characterised the company; that I was not responsible for any of the conditions which attached to its management, and that neither then nor last night could I understand how or why my name was brought forward in connection with the company.'

Mr. Gladstone said: 'Accepting the declaration as made on the first night of the debate, I can only say I regret that anything should have fallen from me calculated to give pain to the hon. gentleman, owing to my failing to perceive the effect of the statement he made.'

THE ENLISTMENTS FOR THE KEARSAGE.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, the Marquis of Clanricarde asked Earl Russell if he could give any further information respecting the enlistments of British subjects for the Kearsage. Captain Winslow, of the Kearsage, said, in a letter that had been read to the House, that the men did not enlist—that they hoped to be enlisted, but found out their mistake and were brought back to Queenstown. This was a matter that affected the honour of Captain Winslow; for the men had been indicted, and all pleaded guilty to enlisting, and were bound over on their recognisances to keep the peace. How did the Americans act in a somewhat analogous case? James Wagner was indicted for hiring Abraham Cook, a British subject, to go into British territory, and Judge Ingersoll sentenced him to two years' imprisonment, and to pay a fine of $100. The Marquis also complained that the people of Ireland were left in ignorance of the law and of the Queen's proclamation.

[illegible] Earl Russell said he could not explain the circumstances of the case. [illegible] Captain Winslow [illegible] Captain Winslow [illegible] Lord Russell also had the grace to say [illegible] said something about the word 'lowering' [illegible] being very strong, and that on the following [illegible] strange were found on board, and that [illegible] any discrepancy to which the Lord of [illegible] ferred. The Earl of Derby [illegible] discrepancy, but to a transparent [illegible] would be an object of pity if he were [illegible] the statement of Captain Winslow [illegible] impossible that any person can be [illegible] story.

THE TUSCALOOSA PAPERS.

On Thursday night, in reply to Mr. Peacocke, Lord Palmerston refused to produce the opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon the subject of the Tuscaloosa. He Lordship said such opinions were confidential and for the information of the Government. 'It is obvious that, for professional as well as political reasons, it is not proper to lay such papers before Parliament.' What professional motive can the law officers have for concealing the publication of their opinions? If they give a [illegible] opinion, they need not be ashamed of it. Are we to understand that they construe the law according to the opinion of the Government? Respecting the political reason for not producing the papers, we may conclude that it is not because the Government is afraid to show that it is acting in accordance with the law. The only obvious reason is that the Government may sooner or later find it expedient to act in opposition to the opinion of its legal advisers.]

THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Donoughmore enquired if the Government intended to introduce any measure for the reform and improvement of the Irish Constabulary. Grand juries, magistrates, public bodies, and judges, have been complaining for years of the inefficiency of the Irish police force. As a further proof there was the admission made by Earl Russell 'to the effect that 600 men had been carried off in one day to be made food for powder on the other side of the Atlantic, and that detection was impossible.' The Irish Constabulary consists of 12,000 men, and costs 715,000*l.* per annum. The men are armed, equipped, and drilled, and have a military organisation. The stipendiary magistrates, who are in constant communication with the Government, have the control of the police; and the local magistracy has very little to do with the force. The noble Earl holds that this military organisation is exceedingly detrimental. The way in which it is officered does not promote efficiency. Instead of taking the best men, who could ride well and knew the people and the country, recourse is had to competitive examination: and 'a knowledge of Cæsar's Commentaries, trigonometry, the differential calculus, and French spoken with an incurable Irish accent,' are the requisite qualifications for an Irish police officer. The Earl of Donoughmore said that, in his opinion, there ought to be promotion from the ranks.

Earl Granville did not altogether dispute the failure of the Irish police, but he maintained that the detection of crime was more difficult in Ireland than in England. The Government would consider if any improvement could be effected. The Marquis of Clanricarde said the Irish Constabulary was a good body of men, but not put to the proper work. If they were to be kept up as an army, they ought to be under the Mutiny Act. The Earl of Leitrim condemned the practice of the police patrolling two and two with arms on all occasions.

'PROTECTION' IN AUSTRALIA.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. W. Millar directed attention to the proceedings of the Legislative Assembly of New South Wales, in following the example of Canada, and imposing a heavy duty on British as well as on foreign manufactured goods. Mr. C. Fortescue, the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, said the Government of New South Wales had to provide for a deficit of 900,000*l.* at the end of next year, on a revenue of 1,500,000*l.*, the deficit being caused by the cost of public works. To meet this, import duties had been imposed, but the Colonial Minister distinctly stated the object was revenue and not protection. Mr. Fortescue believed 'that the good sense of the colonists would prevent this coquetting with protection from developing into a regular and permanent system.' Lord J. Manners asked if Mr. Fortescue 'intended to deny the right of the Colonial Government and Parliament to arrange their taxation as they may think best.' This question was not answered, and, we submit, did not call for an answer. Neither Mr. Fortescue nor any other sane man in this country denies the right of Colonial Governments and Parliaments 'to arrange their taxation as they think best.' If they choose, they may place differential duties on imports in favour of foreign and against British manufactures.]

THE BRITISH ARMY—TEN YEARS' SERVICE MEN.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Desart asked if the Government is preparing to meet the difficulties that threaten to ensue from the operation of the Ten Years' Enlistment Act. Ten years ago a great many men joined the army under this Act, and it is apprehended they will now leave it. In one regiment of the Guards a loss of 700 men is anticipated. Unless something is done our army will be reduced to a more inefficient state than it was in before the Crimean war. The Earl of Desart said: 'England is at present regarded in Europe as undecided and untrustworthy. I hope she is not about to become an object of contempt and derision.'

The Earl de Grey and Ripon denied that the evil was so great. Many, but not nearly the whole, of the men would leave the army, and the Government is considering measures to induce the old soldiers to continue their service. In answer to Viscount Hardinge, the noble Earl said that the total reduction in the Artillery is 1,300 men, and that this reduction was justified on two grounds: the companies of garrison artillery have hitherto been kept at their war strength, and in a few months we shall not have to supply garrison artillery in the Ionian Islands.

THE EASTER RECESS.

Parliament adjourned on Friday—the House of Lords to April 5, and the House of Commons to April 4. As Easter approached the attendance of members fell off. This was particularly the case with the Conservatives. The Liberals, being chiefly recruited from the boroughs, are less eager than their opponents to escape from town and toil to the pleasures of rural life, and they will stay within call as long as their chiefs require them; but the country gentlemen, who form the bulk of the Conservative party, with their strong interest in field sports and county business, always anticipate the holidays, whether at Easter, or Midsummer, or on the eve of the Derby Day.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans: February 21, 1864.

ABANDONMENT OF THE 'OCCUPATION' OF TEXAS—THE MISFORTUNES OF GENERAL BANKS—PROBABLE EMPLOYMENT OF THE TROOPS FROM TEXAS—RUMOURED INTENTION OF THE FEDERALS TO ATTEMPT THE OCCUPATION OF THE RED RIVER COUNTRY—THE SEA ATTACK ON MOBILE—GENERAL SHERMAN'S MOVEMENTS.

While I write a great battle may be in progress in Virginia, Tennessee, Georgia, or Mississippi. Our latest news from these States indicates the near approach of active movements. The threatening attitude of the armies in the three last-mentioned States forbids the idea that they can much longer put off the great trial of arms. As your advices direct from New York anticipate anything I might send you in regard to the situation in Virginia, East Tennessee, and North Georgia, or the operations along the coast, it remains for me to speak of the movements in progress, or projected, in this immediate neighbourhood.

The conquest, reoccupation, or restoration of Texas, is abandoned, at least for the present—an event which, it will be remembered, I anticipated, and for the reasons now set forth by Banks and his apologists. The few points on the coast and along the Rio Grande in Federal possession, have proved barren conquests. They still hug their fortifications under cover of their gunboats, not daring to advance inland, where Magruder and his Texans await impatiently their coming, and chafe under their forced inactivity. It would require fully fifty thousand men to occupy and hold Texas; and as there is not the most remote possibility of Banks getting reinforced to the extent of one-fifth of that number, he is now withdrawing from the State the main body of the 'army of occupation'—a most humiliating instance of the performance not coming up to a sounding promise. A portion of the withdrawing forces have already arrived here, and are being transferred to the Teche country, it being now understood that the occupation of Western Louisiana is to be attempted once again, notwithstanding the repeated and disastrous failures that have attended previous efforts in that direction.

Banks is truly an unfortunate general. The few successes that have attended his efforts have been won at a most enormously disproportionate cost of life and treasure. Witness Port Hudson and the advance to Alexandria. Preparatory to the last-mentioned movement, he accumulated at Brashear City stores of all kinds, to the value of over two million dollars, all of which were subsequently 'gobbled' by the Confederates. This affair sustained for him among General Dick Taylor's men the reputation he acquired in Virginia, while the lamented Jackson was making such a laughing-stock of him, as being 'the best Commissary-General in the Confederate service.' From the number of transports the General has constantly in use for his heedless expeditions, captains and owners of steamships must begin to look upon him in the matter of contracts, as do the Confederates in the matter of supplies. Some of the transports in the 'Texas expedition' were engaged at sums almost equal to the value of the craft themselves, and the same vessels will now no doubt be employed in bringing back the 'Texas expedition.' One thing, however, can be said in Banks's favour, and that is, that he is still a poor man in spite of his golden opportunities in this department, where his immediate predecessor, Butler, accumulated hundreds of thousands, not only by the so-called 'legitimate stealings,' but by every expedient suggested by his fertile and opulent brain, dominated and impelled solely by the basest passions, and restrained only by the most abject of fears—'tyrant without courage, and coward without shame.'

Though several regiments from Texas are crossing to the other side of the river, and the report is that another advance through Western Louisiana is about to be made, I still think that Banks is preparing to send a force towards Mobile, but whether for a regular movement against that city, or as a feint to keep forces in the place which would otherwise be sent to General Polk, now fronting Sherman, does not appear quite clear.

All the steamboats on the river between here and Cairo are being seized by the Government for the transportation of troops, rumour says towards Mobile, but most probably for the long-talked-of expeditions up the Washita and Red Rivers. There is a very large amount of cotton in the region watered by these rivers and their tributaries, and the Federal programme is to occupy Alexandria and Shreveport on Red River, and Monroe on the Washita, while the Federal columns under General Franklin would advance from the Teche towards the line of the Red River, and General Taylor's army, being thus between two fires, would be compelled to fall back into Texas, leaving the vast Red River country in undisputed possession of the enemy to devastate, plunder generally, but steal cotton particularly. This campaign, if attempted, will certainly prove disastrous to the Federal arms. They have repeatedly met with severe defeats in that region in their engagements with the gallant little army of General Dick Taylor. The withdrawal of the main body of the Federals from the Texas coast leaves Magruder free to reinforce Taylor in numbers fully equal to the enemy; and, judging from the past, the most blinded Union zealot would concede in advance a brilliant and decisive victory to the Confederates when the Texans and Lousianians again meet the enemy in anything like equal numbers. The matériel of Banks's army is no match for these fiery Southerners. The Commanding General had better confine himself to 'expeditions in force after a little cotton,' as Horace Greely phrases it, to turning Louisiana into an American 'rotten borough,' preparatory to the Presidential election, or even to his weekly promenade concerts, which have proved even less effective in overcoming social prejudice, than have his troops in overcoming rebels in the field.

With regard to Banks cooperating in Sherman's movement upon Mobile, there is talk of his sending some regiments from here to Pensacola, to threaten the city from that direction. My own opinion is, that if Mobile be invested by the forces under Sherman, which are now moving apparently in that direction along the Mobile and Ohio railroad, the Commanding General of this department is in no condition to distract the attention of the Confederates from the main army of the enemy. The squadron of Admiral Farragut has already begun the attack upon Fort Powell, the mortar fleet under his command having been pegging away, as Abe Lincoln has it, for now more than a week past, but without any material results so far as we can learn. There are rumours that the squadron had suffered very seriously, and was obliged to go to Pensacola for repairs, but these are only rumours. Farragut has discovered that this time he has something more than mere brick walls to penetrate, and that the trick of running past forts, as at the capture of New Orleans, is wholly impracticable in Mobile Bay, or would be attended with the destruction of every vessel attempting it, since the waters swarm with obstructions and torpedos, and the channel is commanded by the concentrated fire of over one hundred guns.

Our advices regarding Sherman's movements are conflicting, and his ultimate design is still involved in doubt. We have Mobile papers of the 14th; but reports of a date several days later are in town, to the effect that the Federal army has met with a decisive defeat, and was retreating upon Vicksburg, after having lost very heavily in killed, wounded, prisoners, and guns. The battle is said to have been fought in Lauderdale County, Mississippi, at a spot some 35 or 40 miles from the Alabama line, and about 140 miles from Mobile. I may add that the reports are very generally credited here, and that they are known to come through Federal as well as Confederate sources. I shall not attempt to argue myself into the belief that these reports are absolutely true; but there are strong probabilities that a great battle has been fought, and it is not unlikely the Federals have been defeated. On the 7th inst., General Polk offered the enemy battle at Morton, a point on the Southern Mississippi Railway, 79 miles from Vicksburg; but Sherman declined, and, dividing his forces, after General Polk retired, sent one column directly east, with the supposed intention of striking the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. The other column moved directly south, in the direction of Mobile. These latter movements were on the 10th and 11th inst. Heavy forces were immediately moved against the column coming south, and General Polk, with two large divisions, took position to give battle to the force moving against the Mobile and Ohio Railroad. Such, in brief, was the 'situation,' according to the Mobile papers of the 14th. If, as rumour has it, a battle has been fought, doubtless it was between the forces under General Polk, and the Federal column moving east; and if the enemy is retreating upon Vicksburg, it is because of the severe defeat of that column, and the consequent retrograde movement of the Federal column which was moving directly south upon Mobile. The battle was said to have been fought on or about the 16th inst.; and if it had been a Federal victory, we should have had it proclaimed in New Orleans several days ago.

But whether Sherman is as yet defeated or not matters but little. Should he move with his whole force direct upon Mobile, then General Polk can, at the worst, retire within the fortifications of the city and sustain a protracted siege, while his large and effective force of cavalry under Generals Lee, Forrest, and Jackson, completely isolate the besieging army. In fact, they have done this already. Confederate cavalry and infantry are now operating unchecked in the country lying between Sherman's rear and the Mississippi. Of this we have positive assurance from Federal authority. Jackson, the capital of the State, was reoccupied immediately after the enemy passed through it and crossed to the east bank of the Pearl river. The Federal General may attempt to march across the country to Selma on the west bank of the Alabama river, seize that point as a base of operations against Mobile, or as a halting-place on his march to Montgomery, 70 miles higher up on the same river. From Montgomery a railroad is in operation to Atalanta, distance 175 miles, and to Columbus (Ga.), distance 115 miles. It has been said that Sherman's movement was intended to flank Johnston at Dalton, and the long inactivity of Grant, with his powerful army in front of Johnston, seems to give some colour of probability to this speculation, as this inactivity may be broken as soon as Sherman's flank movement developes itself in the right quarter. The whole idea of such a flank movement is, however, simply ridiculous; and vainglorious and self-confident as Grant has grown to be, he never could have seriously contemplated such a campaign. If he planned and ordered such a movement, and Sherman is now attempting to carry it out, it has failed in its intended effect up on Johnston, for the latter still fronts Grant with a larger and better army than Bragg had at the battle of Chicamauga.

Instead of Sherman drawing forces from Johnston by his feint upon Mobile, Johnston's army is growing in strength each day, and Mobile is made safe beyond a doubt by large reinforcements from points not now menaced by the enemy. General Polk has an army fully equal to Sherman's, and I am confident the latter will not be permitted (if the attempt is not already frustrated) either to invest Mobile or move upon Selma. My belief is that General Polk has forced his enemy to a decisive battle ere now, and that he has signally defeated him. Polk is cool and wary, a good strategist, and a thorough master of the art of grand tactics. In every battle he has fought, his disposition of troops has won for him the highest praise. If he has fought, or should yet have to fight, Sherman, we may be sure the battle-field will be of his own selection, and the enemy, if defeated, will suffer a decisive repulse, and be compelled to retreat under every possible disadvantage. From the Alabama line to the Mississippi river would be a long and terrible line of retreat for the enemy, with his communications already cut off by the Confederate cavalry; and yet all this may be forced upon Sherman, if, indeed, it is not already matter of history. During the skirmishing which had taken place between the two armies up to the 12th inst., large numbers of Federals were made prisoners. Some of these Western braggarts had on their hats the words, 'Mobile or hell.'

To show the determination of the Alabamians to defend their chief city to the last, I transcribe the subjoined, with the remark that the spirit which prompted this action burns the brighter as the hour of trial draws nearer.

The following preamble and resolution passed the Legislature of Alabama in the session of November 1862:—'Whereas the Abolition Government at Washington has been for the last year past, and is now, straining every nerve to consolidate its naval force for the destruction of the seaport towns of the cotton States, the consequent invasion of the homes and firesides of the interior, and the savage massacre of our helpless women and children; and whereas we, the representatives of the people of Alabama, inspired by the noble daring and the gallant and successful defence of the city of Vicksburg by her indomitable soldiery, would fain hope that the city of Mobile, our only seaport, and the gem of the gulf, shall never be desecrated by the polluting tread of our foes:

'Be it therefore resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Alabama in General Assembly convened—That, in the solemn judgment of this General Assembly, the city of Mobile shall never be surrendered; that it should be defended from street to street, from house to house, and inch by inch, until, if taken, the victors' spoils should be alone a heap of ashes.'

The mayor of the city endorsed the above in the following terms:—'I can assure your Excellency that the resolutions of the Legislature meet the hearty approval of the citizens of Mobile. Nothing is more certain than that the people of this city, without distinction of class, long ago made up their minds that, come what might, Mobile should be defended to the last.'

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: March 9, 1864.

THE FLORIDA EXPLDITION—THE COUNTRY AND INHABITANTS PLUNDERED—SHERMAN'S EXPEDITION—THE MEMPHIS CAVALRY EXPEDITION—GENERAL THOMAS' ADVANCE ON DALTON—THE KILPATRICK RAID—WANTON DESTRUCTION AND PILLAGE THE CONFEDERATES IN LOUISIANA—THE FAILURE OF THE TEXAS EXPEDITION—MOBILE—POLITICAL REASON FOR DISPLACING GENERAL MEADE—CHANGE IN THE CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK—SOLDIERS PERMITTED TO VOTE IN CAMP—WHY THE DEMOCRATS APPROVE THE MEASURE—THE MISTAKEN POLICY OF THE WAR DEMOCRATS.

Federal prospects are clouded all round the horizon. The news from all quarters, since the beginning of the spring operations, has been a record of unvarying disaster. The defeat in Florida turns out to be even worse than was at first reported. The losses are now conceded to have been eighteen hundred instead of twelve hundred; the survivors are entrenched at Jacksonville, and the best said of them is that, being reinforced, they expect to hold it. There is no thought of advancing further, or occupying the State. It would not, however, be very different from what has taken place in Louisiana, if President Lincoln should decide Jacksonville to be Florida—as he decreed eight or nine parishes about New Orleans to be Louisiana—and order a State to be manufactured there, under the protection of a beaten army; that is, if, in the course of his campaign for re-election, he shall think it desirable.

In one thing, which is always a main object of every Yankee expedition, this Florida expedition was a success. It destroyed a very large amount of private property before it was met and checked. The Commanding General, in a gasconading address, made it his boast that he had already captured to the value of a million and a half of dollars in 'tar, resin, clothing, cotton,' &c. Of course no part of this was public property; it was simply the plunder of non-combatants. The private letters from the expedition add to this list of spoils the wardrobes and trinkets of women, furniture, books—indeed, everything upon which hands could be laid to bring away or to destroy. It was only six days after this robber manifesto was issued that the plundering army was met and driven back in shame over the same country that it had been stripping of everything portable. It is to be hoped that the troops had to abandon such of their plunder as they had not already destroyed.

The great Sherman expedition of thirty thousand men, which left Vicksburg five weeks ago to penetrate through Mississippi into Alabama, and threaten Mobile in the rear, and the armies in Georgia in the flank, has not yet been heard from definitively, but it is evidently a perfect failure in all its avowed objects. There are rumours that it has met with disaster, and is turning back to Vicksburg in serious peril of being cut off. There is very great uneasiness to-day at Washington for its fate. The Confederates displayed themselves with unexpected activity and numbers: and the most now hoped for by the Federals is, that General Sherman may be able to get back without a heavy disaster in the field. Here, too, the great consolation expressed is that he has been able to do great damage in the interior, by the destruction of the property and means of living of the inhabitants which is the now received process for the propagation of Union sentiments.

In concert with General Sherman's expedition, another of cavalry, seven thousand strong, started from Memphis, to ride through the northern part of Mississippi, and make a junction with Sherman in Alabama for the grand movement onward. The force seemed to be too formidable for resistance by the Confederates, especially as the region to be penetrated was said to be full of Union sympathisers, rebels tired of the war, and stragglers from the Confederate army eager to come in and be pardoned. But, after pushing forward but a short distance, this large force was encountered by Confederate cavalry (the accounts say in superior numbers; and after several attempts to advance, and repulses, and defeats, they have gone back to Memphis, and abandoned the expedition, leaving General Sherman to his fate. Here, too, the Yankee boast comes in as a compensation for their defeat: they captured from the people on the route, and brought away or destroyed, 'several millions' worth of property. It is said, with great glee, that they burnt two millions of bushels of grain, and that there will therefore be great distress for food in the country they overran. The starving of women and children, to make their male protectors surrender to the Government, is the civilised warfare of these Republicans.

Nearly at the same time with these movements, General Grant ordered an advance, under General Thomas, from Chattanooga towards Atalanta, and glowing accounts were published of the success of the movement, the defeats of the rebels, and the occupation of Dalton, a pivot point for the march upon Atalanta. But Dalton was not occupied. The Federal army reached Tunnel Hill, which is ten miles short, and has now been withdrawn still further back to Ringgold, and is seeking its old resting-place at Chattanooga. The army of General Johnston was found too formidable and well-posted to be attacked, and Longstreet's movements about Knoxville gave warning of a danger to provide against which a retreat was necessary. The army of Thomas is therefore drawn in again, and the telegraphic despatches say that all along the lines the Confederates are active and pressing.

From Washington a daring raid was projected by Mr. Lincoln, without the assent of the General-in-Chief (General Halleck) or the Commanding General of the Army (General Meade), for a sudden advance of cavalry upon Richmond. The expedition, six thousand strong, started under General Kilpatrick, and a portion of them claim to have got within sight of the steeples of Richmond. They owe it to the speed of their horses that they got away again, and got safely within the lines of General Butler. They lost a good many men, and disabled a thousand horses. The most they effected for any military purpose was the destroying of a few telegraphic wires, and the tearing up of a few miles of railroad that can be repaired in three days. But they boast that they destroyed millions of property in corn and provisions, burned all the mills which ground the food of the people, and many of the houses which sheltered their families. Among the boasts which they give to the public is, that having impressed a negro to guide them, and finding the contraband misleading them, they hanged him, and, 'being exasperated' at his treachery, burned down, in revenge, the dwelling-house and outhouses of the Hon. James Seddon, who is the Confederate Secretary of War. Thus wanton destruction and pillage are found to be the universal practice of the armies of the Union under all their commanders.

The intelligence from New Orleans is that the Confederates have reentered the Teche country in force, have captured Franklin, and threaten Brashear city. Large forces have been sent by General Banks to protect this latter place from apprehended assault. The Confederates are getting very active again along the river, and seem to cross and recross in large bodies whenever they please.

The grand expedition into Texas is melting away. The forces sent there have been withdrawn by degrees, until there is scarcely enough left to keep the few coast places which it is desired to hold. There will be no attempts for some time, and perhaps not for a long time, to occupy this great State, or even a corner of it, for reconstruction into a Lincolnised State. That process is getting a double check, from the armies of the Confederacy, and from the jealousy of some of Mr. Lincoln's own partisans against it as a means by which he is seeking to secure his own personal continuance in power.

Charleston is left in quiet. The siege is practically discontinued. Even the shelling grows more languid, as it becomes demonstrated that it does not pay in destructiveness for the expenditure of the powder.

The point of immediate military interest is the attack, by Farragut's fleet, on the outer defences of Mobile harbour. The failure of Sherman's expedition to reach the interior and threaten the rear alters the conditions of that enterprise, and it is now imagined that the withdrawal of the United States troops from Texas and the concentration of such a large force in General Banks's department have reference to a land attack upon Mobile in concert with Farragut. The other theory is that it is meant to penetrate to Montgomery, with Pensacola as a base, and thus make approaches for a cooperation with Grant in an advance upon Atalanta, which, after Richmond, is the most important point in the Confederacy.

But it is evident that the Federal plans for the spring campaign have been all baffled, and most of their combinations completely destroyed, by the energy and activity with which they have been encountered by the Confederates at all points. The ideas of Southern disorganisation and despondency have been rudely dissipated, and there has been a hasty summoning of General Grant to Washington, with a view to a consultation and a reconstruction of the whole plan of the campaign. He is now Lieutenant-General, and in the first flush of his popularity as a successful leader of armies, and his voice will probably be potential in deciding what shall be undertaken to repair the disasters of the last month, and win a victory somewhere to cure the distrust which so many accumulating failures have generated in the public mind towards the Administration.

There is a very serious effort to displace General Meade from the command of the army of the Potomac, on charges that he fought the battle of Gettysburg unwillingly, and had even given orders for retreat, which could not be persisted in because one of his corps was actually engaged. Testimony is being taken before a Congressional Committee 'on the Conduct of the War,' which sits as a sort of political conclave to decide on the merits of generals, more with reference to their utility in politics than their military conduct and qualities. General Meade is not enough of a Radical politician to suit the purposes of those who think of the army only as a great electioneering machine; and it is quite likely that they will find for the President a reason for displacing him and putting a more thorough partisan in his place.

The army is, by the confession of all parties, the power in the State by which the next Presidency is to be disposed of, and all sides are sedulously fomenting the war passion, and courting the army influence. It is a game in which all the advantage lies with the party in power, and the Democrats are wasting their time, demoralising themselves, and hastening the national destruction they deprecate in words so loudly, by joining in a competition at once dishonest and fruitless.

There was a vote in this State yesterday, to alter the Constitution so as to receive at the State elections the votes of soldiers absent on service. It was attempted last year to provide for this by law, but it was palpably unconstitutional, and the Governor's veto was in the way. The objection was met by proposing an amendment to the Constitution. The vote was taken yesterday, and of course it is adopted. No one has ventured to advise a vote against it; so all the votes recorded will be in its favour. Nevertheless there are hardly five men in the Legislature who do not believe it to be an injudicious and perilous change. The motives for pressing it are purely partisan. The dominant party sees in it a potent instrument for controlling the politics of the State, by means of the hundred and odd thousands of New York soldiers who are subject to military law, under the eyes of officers of its party selected by the President, and carefully weeded of all opponents, and dependent for pay and rank—and, it has been shown, for personal freedom too—on his political favour. The opposition dared not risk the unpopularity of a position sure to be used against them as an attempt to disfranchise the soldiers, and another proof of hostility to the Union in proscribing its defenders. All sides, therefore, became vociferous in protesting peculiar zeal for the rights of the soldiers; and the Constitution is accordingly amended, to give the absent men the right of casting votes and sending them home, or sending them home to be cast by proxy. There is really no conceivable way in which free discussion on political topics can be had in the camp, or independent opinion formed of the acts of those in authority; or in which the qualifications to vote under the State laws can be ascertained with certainty, or for the prevention of fraud, or the fidelity of the return made satisfactory to the public; or in which a soldier can cast a free vote in the presence of superiors interested in suppressing it, and armed with all the power which military law gives to persecute and proscribe privates for offences of a hundred names, but of one real character only—insubordination in politics. There are many well-authenticated accounts of the direct interference of officers of the army, and of the Government itself, in the ill-treatment and punishment of soldiers for the expression of Democratic opinions and the casting of Democratic votes; and there will doubtless be a feeble demonstration at Albany to enter an indirect protest against the transfer of this tremendous power within the State of New York to the hands of the Republican managers and their Executive, and some abortive project suggested pretending to secure the promise of political freedom to Democrats serving under an instructed corps of Republican officers in rice-fields and swamps a thousand miles off, where the defeat of the New York Democrats at the election last November was promulgated at head-quarters—a victory over traitors. But this will not prevent the consummation of some measure to confer this right of voting nominally on the soldiers, but almost literally on the politicians who hold in their hands the power of military coercion, if coercion be needed.

But direct coercion is not needed to determine the general drift of an army vote. The soldier's habit of obedience to a superior, and dependence upon him not merely for privileges and comforts, but for rights—the esprit de corps which so soon identifies him with the passions and prejudices of his class—the contagion of association, by which opinions not firmly settled take the hue of those which prevail, and of course but one hue when all others are proscribed—are in themselves sufficient to determine that, with the mass of privates, political opinions grow to be those of the officers; and the direct action of the Government in selecting its own partisans, and its success in winning over, by the allurements of rank and favour, nearly every leading man who entered the army as a Democrat, determine the vote as universally Republican. The Democrats have a forlorn sort of hope that they can break up this Republican consolidation of the army vote by contesting the Presidency with a military candidate of their own, and think, with the personal popularity of General M'Clellan in the army, to make a powerful diversion. For this reason they call for uncompromising war as loudly as the fiercest bar-republican, and are shaping their policy simply to foment the war passion to their own advantage, and divide the soldiers' vote, in both of which projects they will fail lamentably and disgracefully.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS: March 22.

THE exact numbers resulting from the elections concluded last night are not yet known, but the election of the Democratic candidates by a vast majority is certain. The first and fifth circumscriptions or electoral districts, the Louvre being in one, and the Faubourg St. Antoine in the other, have agreed to return as their representatives members of the Provisional Government of 1848. This return to the surface of the political stream of men whose only merit is the having proved that a république honnête is impossible in France, might seem symptomatic of danger to the Government, if the rural population of the country, and even that of many of the chief towns, had not shown a determination to resist the domination of Paris, in which the existing Government will always encourage them. Even as a manifestation of opinion these elections are less favourable to the Democratic party than those of last summer, for their candidates are elected only by a large minority of the electors, little exceeding one-third of the whole number, while only about one half of the electors possessing the suffrage voted. In the only other country in which I have been able to observe the working of universal suffrage, in Greece, I had occasion to remark, and even on a larger scale, the unwillingness of the electors to go to the poll. In an electoral body of 6,000, something less than one-sixth were induced to vote. It would seem that the right of voting is really only valuable in the eyes of the majority on the condition that it shall be a privilege. One half of the electors of Paris do not care to assert their right, or think the presence in the Chamber of a few members of the old parties no menace to public order.

The Government reaps the benefit of its abstention on this occasion. The elections were so quietly conducted that no one could perceive that a political demonstration was being made; and having no candidate either patronised or accepted, Government could suffer no defeat.

Public confidence in the preservation of peace, grounded on the evident desire of the Government to avoid all foreign complications, is still not sufficiently strong to affect the movements of the money market, which shows no permanent symptoms of recovery. The financial papers offer all kinds of reasons to account for the depression, but the very fact that they have to seek for them, and do not at all agree in the results of their researches, is the proof that there is an undercurrent of mistrust in the ultimate success of the peace party. The old grudge against Prussia, as strong at the present day as fifty years ago, in the agricultural parts of France, would render a war against that Power tolerable if not popular. The Prussians have contrived to revive a painful recollection here, by the destruction of the monumental lion under which slept the Danes who fell at Flensburg in 1848. The bridge of Jena and the resolution to blow it up, which was only prevented by Louis XVIII.'s threat that he would place himself on it, is the only parallel in modern European history to this act of profanation. Our Chinese wars may be excluded by our self-love from European history, so that we may be spared having to count the destruction of the summer palace at Pekin and the oldest and richest library in the world as acts for which we are responsible. We may have rivalled them in the far East, but in European warfare the Prussians have proved themselves the most unpitying victors, and their conduct during the invasions of '14 and '15 is still remembered, especially in Champagne, with lively execration.

There has been a press trial, which, after exciting the attention of literary men for the last two months, has ended in the conviction and condemnation to fine and imprisonment of the parties accused. The press law of 1852 forbids the publication of all periodical writings treating of politics without the permission of Government. The gentlemen now condemned for a breach of this law had established a correspondence with various provincial papers, which they forwarded periodically by the post. The letters were identical, the editor of each paper using so much or so little as he pleased of the matter thus supplied. As French provincial papers are not rich, this decision is almost equivalent to forbidding their publishing news of the capital, for it was only by clubbing together that they could remunerate a correspondent; while, their circulation being local, the simultaneous publication in several papers diminished the interest of none.

The France of Friday evening contained a paragraph, apparently on authority, contradicting the reports which have been current that the Federals under Banks had violated the territory of Mexico. It goes on to state that Mr. Lincoln has given orders to his generals to observe the strictest neutrality, and to suffer no supplies or succours of any kind to pass the frontier to Juarez.

There were rumours last week that a new plot against the Emperor's life had been discovered, and that some of the conspirators had been arrested in the palace itself. The Moniteur of Sunday contained a contradiction of the story, which it declares has no foundation. The Archduke Maximilian or one of his suite left behind him a box containing, besides a sum of money, a jewel to which great value was attached. The loss having been discovered, a telegram was sent to request the missing box might be forwarded. The apartments were searched without effect, on which the police were called in, and two servants, who, supposing it was intended for them, had appropriated it, were arrested.

It is seldom that a debate in the English Parliament obtains the approval of French public opinion. The expression of opinion, backed by so large a minority, on the Stracey motion has given the greatest satisfaction here. The Moniteur reproduced the whole debate, as well as the explanations of MM. Mazzini and Saffi, and the leaders on the subject from the Times. Most of the other papers, excepting the Italianissimi, have noticed in leaders what they regard as evidence of the good feeling of the country towards the Emperor of the French, though they express no little surprise at the conclusion to which Lord Palmerston seems to have come. There are some who think that the Danish war has saved Mr. Stansfeld as well as his chief, because the Conservatives are little likely to seek so embarrassing a legacy. The news of Garibaldi's departure from Caprera to England has caused a very painful sensation here, as it is thought calculated to augment any feelings of dissatisfaction which the presence of other well-known persons has occasioned. The grand feasts which it is understood are already in preparation to greet the hero of Aspromonte, may give occasion for incautious language that may well neutralise the good effect of the Conservative speeches in the House of Commons. In official spheres, this hegira seems still more suspicious. The position of Italy, armed to the teeth and with crippled finances, which render necessary either an immediate reduction of forces or a war to employ them, has lately caused great uneasiness here. Garibaldi's visit to England is considered as calculated to precipitate in the direction of rashness the impatience already existing in Italy. Nothing could be more unpopular in France than another war for the Italian idea, and if the Italians rush imprudently into a conflict with Austria, they are likely to be left to their own resources.

MISCEGENATION.—The New Hampshire Patriot gives facts to show that the female Abolitionists who went as teachers of the negroes at Port Royal, have been very successful in at least one branch of juvenile development. It says: 'Private advices from Port Royal say that many of the female Abolitionists who went to Port Royal to teach the little niggers how to read and pray, have been obliged, within the past few months, to abandon their black charges and open nurseries on their own private account. An officer informed us recently that no less than sixty-four spinsters had contributed to the population in and about the neighbourhood of Port Royal harbour. The climate seems to favour population even more than the production of Sea Island cotton by paid negro labour. The information furnished us by the officer concerning the sixty-four little mulattoes has been confirmed by the testimony of the Rev. Liberty Billings, Lieutenant-Colonel of the First South Carolina Regiment, who is here in consequence of ill health. He says it is a sad truth.'

FEDERAL EXPLOITS.—A correspondent of the Boston Courier gives the following summary of Federal exploits at the opening of the spring campaign:—'If there were any intelligence left among Mr. Lincoln's partisans, the "mung" news with which he tries to keep up their spirits, would be a daily and deadly insult to it. His spring campaign has opened with these brilliant exploits:—1. Charleston is made secure against every attempt by land or sea, and smashes up, without compunction, every "expedition" or "iron-clad" that gets too near. 2. Farragut is "attacking" Mobile "out of range." 3. General Thomas has retired from his "successful reconnaissance," having found the enemy "in force" at Tunnel Hill. 4. Generals Smith and Grierson returned to Memphis, having accomplished all their objects, except the single one with which they started. 5. General Sherman is retreating, having also done everything but what he set out to do. 6. General Butler's great raid to release the prisoners in Richmond, returned, having really accomplished his only object, which was, to figure for once in some other way than as flogging women, or putting superannuated clergymen to hard labour on the highways. 7. Mr. Hay's attempt to get a bogus electoral vote from Florida, has ended in the ruin of his expedition, with a loss of one man out of three. To counterbalance these trifling reverses, three distinguished successes are to be recorded, viz.:—1. One detachment of the grand army has mobbed a Democratic newspaper in Ohio. 2. Another has robbed a poor old Dutch trader in Pennsylvania, who was under suspicion of being a Knight of the fabulous order of the Golden Circle. 3. A third has successfully attained its "objective," without disaster by flood or field—a considerable army having been safely and gratuitously transported to New Hampshire, where it is to engage in the glorious and patriotic work of putting down the people at the polls.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through Henry Hotze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 31s.; payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. Hopkins, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

The Index may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. Hutton, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.

At Manchester, F. A. Hasleham, Esq. Manchester Southern Club Office, Market Street.

At Paris, to Messrs. Pfeiffer & Muller, 52 Rue du Château d'Eu, Paris.

At Turin, to St. Filippo Manetta, 4 Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), to C. W. White, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, MARCH 24, 1864.

Federal Failures.

The latest intelligence from America confirms all the reported Federal disasters. At all points the invading armies have been met and worsted. The spring campaign is over almost as soon as it is begun, and the whole North seems for the time paralysed by its misfortunes, despondent, and even hopeless. We miss even the familiar jubilations and boastful anticipations of the New York press, so complete is the break-down, so stunning is the blow; and overwhelming as have been the reverses of the last month, there is a terrible misgiving that the truth is not all told. There are rumours that Sherman has been defeated with the loss of half his army—that he is cut off from Vicksburg, out of supplies, penned in at Canton by a numerous and ever-increasing Confederate force. The probability is that the bulk of his army has reached Vicksburg. But nothing is known of his whereabouts in the North, and we can understand the suspense that broods over Washington in the absence of news of his safety, for a great disaster to Sherman's force would mean the immediate loss of the whole South-West to the Federals. Apart, however, from the fate of this column, the North may well stand aghast and bewildered at the result of its latest struggle with its unconquered and unconquerable foe. At the beginning of the fourth year of the war, it finds the armies of defence more strongly posted and more numerous than ever. It tries every link in the Southern armour, but in vain; its swords and bayonets gleam about the Southern cuirass, but find it impenetrable, and we fancy that for the first time we detect indications of a consciousness, that will betray itself, of the impossibility of subjugating the Confederacy. They are shown in the reported assertion of General Meade that the South cannot be conquered, and in many other ways. Meade may be the first Northern General who has openly recognised this truth; but is there one officer of repute who has boldly declared the conquest of the South possible? Not Scott, who declared it to be feasible only on impossible conditions; not McClellan, who retired in despair after destroying the finest army the North has ever possessed; not Rosecranz, nor even Grant. Braggarts like Hooker and the Butlers and Popes of the North have sworn to overrun the South with fire and sword, but the real soldiers of the Federal army have never professed to be sanguine; and it is to the credit of General Meade, however much it may detract from his popularity with a ferocious and reckless mob and a self-seeking Cabinet, if he has dared to speak the truth. It is said that Meade will be superseded by Grant. He is the last card in President Lincoln's hand, but we hardly think he will win the trick. General Grant would have opposed to him in Virginia the flower of the Confederate army. There is no royal road to Richmond. He must march by the old routes that proved so disastrous to M'Dowell, and M'Clellan, and Pope, and Hooker, and Burnside. He would meet the same men who beat his predecessors, and would share the same fate. If General Grant consults his own reputation, he will not supersede Meade. But the mere fact of his being summoned to Washington is a sign of weakness. Grant is wanted not in the Cabinet, but in the field. If any man can retrieve the disasters in the South-West, it is he. And at this moment more than at any other period of the war, a controlling mind is required to direct the movements of the Federal troops in Mississippi, Alabama, and Tennessee, unless the summer campaign is to end in a series of objectless unconnected raids, utterly incapable of influencing the war. At this moment the position of affairs is exceedingly critical for the North. It is possible that the Federal army in Florida is safe behind its entrenchments at Jacksonville and under the fire of its gunboats; that Sherman has led his army back into Vicksburg without material loss; that General Thomas has retired from Tunnel Hill for 'strategic reasons;' and that Knoxville is safe. This would be certainly a sanguine view to take. But, even in this light, it would be difficult to overrate the advantage gained by the South in the knowledge that the enemy had struck its blow and failed, and that the armies and garrisons of the South, relieved from apprehension for some months to come, were free to resume the initiative, and hurl their concentrated strength against the lengthened and dangerously weak lines of the invaders. Everybody now knows that Grierson's cavalry has been crippled; that Sherman's army, if not cut to pieces, is incapable of a new forward movement; that the Federal army at Chattanooga is in reality on the defensive. Whence is aid to come if the Confederates seriously assail the communications of the army of the Cumberland? The Federal cavalry at Memphis has been outnumbered and routed by the Confederate horse under General Forrest; Sherman cannot move; Knoxville is in danger; no relief can be expected from Meade, who is in daily fear of Lee's advance; and yet we say unhesitatingly on the retention of Chattanooga and Knoxville rests Mr. Lincoln's only hope of continuing the war. We must wait a few weeks for the development of the Confederate plans; but there are abundant signs that the favourable occasion now presented will not be missed, and that the Federals will have in their turn to stand on the defensive at at least as many points as those recently threatened by their own armies.

To what desperate straits the War Administration of the North is reduced, is shown by the recent endeavour to reach Richmond. It was fondly hoped that what successive armies of 150,000 men had failed to accomplish might be achieved by a cavalry force 7,000 or 8,000 strong. And this enterprise was seriously undertaken with the same confidence in a triumphant result which has marked every Federal undertaking. Nothing less than the burning and sacking of Richmond and the murder of President Davis and his Cabinet was aimed at. A bold coup de main was to destroy Richmond and the 'rebellion' at a blow, and a cavalry force with a few light guns was to effect all this in the teeth of the defences of a well garrisoned and fortified town. The peddling incapacity of the Federal War Administration was never more clearly demonstrated. The diabolical malignity of a bloodthirsty and cowardly enemy was never more disgracefully patent. Three bodies of cavalry were told off for the murderous work, the first under Kilpatrick, the second under Dahlgren, the third under Custer. Kilpatrick's and Dahlgren's columns moved from Culpepper in divergent directions; Dahlgren making for Fredericksburg, the depôt of Confederate artillery. Instead of destroying it, he met with a warm reception, and rode on. He then attempted to cross the James River, missed the ford, hanged an intelligent contraband who had undertaken the office of guide, and ultimately was attacked and driven off by a body of the Richmond city troops. Kilpatrick was a little more successful, for he marched by a route where no resistance was offered; but he failed to destroy the bridges over the North and South Anna, and when he reached the outer defences of Richmond, a few shells sent him flying across the Chickahominy, to seek safety at Williamsburg. General Custer's column was disposed of a very few hours after its departure, being chased ignominiously into the Federal lines. The affair turned out a mere headlong dash in the rear of the Confederate army, in which the Federals never showed fight, were 'whopped' wherever they were caught, burnt whatever property they could lay their hands on safely, and sacrificed whatever faint respect for their cause may still linger in the minds of European nations, by the endeavour to accomplish by midnight fire and assassination, what they have not the manhood to achieve on a fair field. Colonel Dahlgren, put to flight by the city guards of Richmond, endeavoured to cross the Pamunkey, but in vain. He was hunted down, his force was routed, he himself was killed. He richly deserved his fate. But if he had been caught and hanged as a felon, no great outrage would have been committed. On his body were found instructions, which, if proved to be authentic, will hand down his name to eternal infamy. One address contained the following spirited programme: —

> We hope to release the prisoners from Belle Isle, first, and, having seen them fairly started, we will cross the James River into Richmond, destroy the bridges after us, and, exhorting the released prisoners to destroy and burn the hateful city, will not allow the rebel leader Davis and his traitorous crew to escape.

In another copy of 'special orders and instructions' was found this extraordinary extract: —

> The men must be kept together and well in hand, and, once in the city, it must be destroyed, and Jeff. Davis and his Cabinet killed. Pioneers will go along with combustible material.

In fact, 10,000 prisoners, stimulated by every possible incentive to that diabolical work of lust, of rapine, of violence, which must inevitably have ensued on the success of the enterprise, were to be let loose upon Richmond; and the murder of the Southern President and his Cabinet was openly announced and proclaimed as the crowning hope of the planners and leaders of the expedition. Modern history furnishes no parallel to this atrocity. Imagine two European Powers at war, and the ruler of one—for we cannot absolve President Lincoln of complicity—organising a plot for the assassination of the sovereign of the hostile State. We wait to hear the verdict of the English press upon this horrible outrage. We wait to see if the feelings of indignant humanity will be for once fairly outspoken upon such a scandal to civilisation, or if there will be found apologists even for Dahlgren, and admirers of this savage and cowardly mode of conducting a great war between nations speaking the same tongue, sprung from the same stock, and born in the same faith. Butler, and Turchin, and Mitchell have disgraced the North. But this new crime throws even their misdeeds into insignificance, and reveals the men who conceived and attempted it in their true character as hostes humani generis.

The Mersey Steam Rams.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MESSRS. LAIRD.

Our readers will remember that, in demanding from Government the correspondence with Messrs. Laird and with Mr. Adams on the subject of the arrest of the steamships building by the first-named gentlemen at Birkenhead, the Opposition were especially anxious to distinguish between the legal and the political bearings of the case. The Attorney-General, whose forensic talents have been turned to excellent account in the House of Commons, declared that the correspondence ought not to be produced: first, because it would prejudice a case then pending before the courts of law, by disclosing to the defendants the evidence on which the Crown relied; and secondly, because it was demanded in order to afford materials for a discussion in Parliament of questions which would have to be discussed and decided before a fitter tribunal. It was rejoined, first, that all the papers required were already accessible to the defendants in the case about to come before the Court of Exchequer, as Mr. Adams's share of it had been published in America, and Messrs. Laird had of course copies of every letter which had passed between them and the Government. It was rejoined, secondly, that what the Opposition proposed to discuss was not the legal question, whether or no the El Tousson and El Monassir were liable to seizure, but the political question, whether the conduct of the Administration, apart altogether from the fact of seizure, had been wise, just, honourable, and dignified. The former rejoinder was unanswerable; the latter failed to convince the House, which, not having seen the papers, was not aware how very small a part of the whole matter is the mere fact of the seizure of the vessels. Now, the whole correspondence demanded by Mr. Fitzgerald is before the public. That which had passed between themselves and Mr. Adams the Government found themselves forced to produce, in order to put a stop to the reading of fragments from the American State papers in the House of Commons. That to which the firm of Laird Brothers was a party has been published in the form of a pamphlet by those gentlemen. Of the former set of papers we spoke last week. We propose now to examine the correspondence between the British Government and the builders of the steam-rams; to see whether there be ground for canvassing the conduct of the Administration altogether apart from any question as to the legality of the seizure—a question which is nowhere mooted in this correspondence. It is clear, à priori, that the ships might not be legally liable to seizure, and yet the Government may have acted with so much fairness, good faith, impartiality, and dignity, that no one would accuse them of anything more than an error of judgment as to the meaning of a dubious statute. Or, on the other hand, the seizure might be legal, and yet it might appear that the conduct of the Administration had been unfair and undignified, needlessly oppressive and insulting to persons who ought to have been treated with courtesy and forbearance, and attended with an ostentation of eagerness to gratify a foreign State altogether degrading to the character of an English Ministry. In this latter case, it is clear that a legal decision in their favour on the construction of the statute would be consistent with a Parliamentary condemnation of the general tenor of their proceedings, as contrary to the duty of the Government and the interests of the country.

Now, supposing the law to be in their favour—supposing that the purchase of ships by the Confederates is as illegal as the enlistment of soldiers by the Federals—supposing that a statute on which the best lawyers are divided has really been violated by one of the most eminent firms in England—granting all that the Attorney-General demands—how should the Government have proceeded? Surely with all possible courtesy towards Messrs. Laird, doing them no needless injury and offering them no insult; with no servility towards the Federal Government, which was known to be busily violating in Ireland the law it sought to enforce in Liverpool; with no harshness towards the Confederates, who, if they were breaking the law, had been assured by some of the ablest lawyers that they were not breaking it; doing no more than was absolutely needful, and doing that as quietly as possible. This they should have done; now let us see what they did.

The correspondence begins with a promise, volunteered by Messrs. Laird to the Collector of Customs, that neither of the ships shall leave Liverpool till after a week's notice given to him. We venture to say that the most violent Northern partisans in Liverpool would have unhesitatingly accepted this assurance as sufficient. Messrs. Laird further say that one of the ships will not be ready for a month, the other only in six or seven weeks. This is on September 4. On the same day Mr. Layard writes to ask for whom the ships are building. Messrs. Laird reply that they are building for Messrs. Bravay, 6 Rue de Londres, Paris; and add that they are to be delivered to Messrs. Bravay in the port of Liverpool, when completed. On the 8th they give notice of a trial trip of El Tousson, pledging their word for her return—in fact, as subsequently appears, she was in no condition to go to sea. Next day the Treasury write to detain the vessels till a satisfactory account of their destination shall be received. Messrs. Laird refer the Treasury to Messrs. Bravay for further information. Thus it is made clear that Messrs. Laird—whose word is just as reliable as would be the word of Barings, or any other firm of the highest reputation—are simply in the position of builders; that if there be any illegal intentions, they rest with Messrs. Bravay, and Messrs. Laird have nothing to do with them. On their part all is frank and aboveboard; they neither know nor choose to know anything of the use to which their customer proposes to put the craft he buys from them; and having referred the Treasury to him, their part is done. For the future they only endeavour to complete their contract with Messrs. Bravay, leaving Government to deal with those gentlemen—the real owners—as it pleases. Government, therefore, knows that while the vessels belong to Messrs. Laird they are safe; it has no need to seize them till Messrs. Laird give up the property in them, which will not be till their completion.

The next step is the permission given by Lord Russell, on September 17, for the trial trip of El Tousson, in reliance on Messrs. Laird's pledge for her return, which they renew. On the 19th, Mr. Brand writes an extraordinary letter, informing Laird Brothers that 'circumstances have come to the knowledge of Her Majesty's Government which give rise to apprehension that an attempt may be made to seize the vessel in question while on her trial trip.' Her Majesty's Government is, however, convinced that Laird Brothers are privy to no such scheme. They being the owners, the seizure would be piracy; the captors would be liable to be hanged wherever a British man-of-war could catch them, and no civilised Government could dream of adopting their act. It is difficult, therefore, to believe that the Government really believed in this strange story; and it seems much more in keeping with the whole of their conduct to suppose that Mr. Adams had warned them of some such plot, imagined by Mr. C. R. Young or Mr. Chapman, and that they were eager to seize an opportunity to display their vigilance in protecting the interests of the North. Mr. Brand informs Messrs. Laird that the El Tousson cannot go on her trial trip unless a force of seamen and marines are placed on board for her protection. Messrs. Laird don't believe in the danger, but accept the protection; and, meantime, postpone the trial trip for further enquiry.

On October 7, the Treasury write again, to say that they fear a forcible abduction of the El Tousson from the dock where she lies, and must place a Customs officer on board. Messrs. Laird are much surprised; but being assured that no imputation on their own good faith is intended, they submit. On the 9th, the Treasury write that, in consequence of the apprehensions entertained of a forcible abduction, they must seize the ships. On the 17th, Messrs. Laird reply that the abduction is impossible—that the ships are not ready to go to sea—and that one of them is a mere hull; and they point out that under such circumstances to seize the ships, to place an armed force in charge of them, and to inflict vexation and injury on the builders, is unjustifiable. On the same day they ask permission for a trial trip, subject to the conditions proposed by the Government; and repeat their conviction that the alleged plot is altogether unreal. This request is positively and peremptorily refused. On the 27th, their workmen are removed from the vessels; and on the 29th, Captain Inglefield announces that he has orders to take the vessels out into mid-stream, and moor them under the guns of H.M.S. Majestic. Of course no additional security could be gained by this measure. The Majestic could effectually prevent the escape of the vessels from the docks, had such an escape been attempted; there was an armed force in charge which rendered the attempt itself impossible; the opening the dock and removal of an ironclad would be a work of some time and great difficulty, and could not be accomplished in silence and secresy; the ships were wholly unfit for sea: in a word, their escape was in any case impossible, but they were safer in the dock than they could be in the Mersey. It was not, therefore, to secure them that they were taken out. It was an act perfectly inexplicable on the supposition that the Ministry were really afraid of the escape of the ships, but quite consistent with that policy which is traceable in all their measures—a policy of conciliation towards the North and insult towards the South and their English well-wishers. Throughout this correspondence we find an ostentation, or rather an affectation, of suspicion against the Confederate agents, against Messrs. Bravay, against Laird Brothers; an insulting parade of precautions to prevent them from committing treason and piracy; a display of zeal, extending even to outrageous violence, on behalf of the North; and of the series of acts inspired by these motives, this removal of the ships from their safe berths in the docks is one of the most striking. One still more remarkable instance in which the animus of the Ministry was displayed is not referred to in these letters—we mean the ostentatious despatch of the incompletely fitted Prince Consort, with a crew got together at a moment's notice, in a gale of wind, to prevent the escape from Liverpool of an unfinished and unarmed ship, and of her consort, a mere hull, without masts or rudder or funnel, already lying under the guns of a man-of-war—a piece of eager servility which nearly cost the loss of ship and crew. No one can recall that proceeding, and read these papers, without being forcibly impressed with the ostentatious nature of the Ministerial policy—the manifest anxiety to make a parade of friendliness towards the North, and of harshness towards those who were accused of taking part with the South; nor is it possible to regard the pretended plot for the piratical abduction of the rams in any other light than as a pretext invented, or eagerly snatched at, to afford opportunity for demonstrations of this character.

In the removal of the ships we catch a glimpse of another feeling, which seems to have animated some persons, at least, in high place and power in Downing Street. Messrs. Laird, who had endured patiently the affronts and injuries previously put upon them, entered an indignant protest against this. The detainer of the ships, their seizure, the prohibition of the trial trip, the guard, though no doubt involving great inconvenience to Messrs. Laird, were nevertheless acts directed rather against the ultimate owner than against the builders; and Messrs. Laird, being merely builders, left to their employer, M. Bravay, to protest against measures injurious to his interests, and which must be justified or condemned by his intentions. But the removal of the ships was a blow struck at Messrs. Laird as the temporary owners of the vessel. It was an insult, as the removal from their docks implied distrust of them; it was an injury, inasmuch as the immediate destruction of the vessels, which was not improbable, would throw the whole loss upon them, as they would fail to fulfil their contract with M. Bravay. They wrote to the Foreign Office, representing that the removal involved imminent danger of loss or injury to the ships; and they addressed to the Treasury a very spirited remonstrance, in which the whole of the correspondence is summed up: 'On September 4 we told you for whom we were building; on the 9th you told us you would detain the ships till you had ascertained their destination, whereupon we told you that it would be a month before they could leave port, and asked leave for a trial trip. On the 17th, you granted that leave; on the 19th, you added a condition of armed protection, which we accepted; on October 7, you placed an officer on board, telling us a cock-and-bull story of a plot to carry off the ships. We bore all this'—such is the substance of the letter—'because it did us no substantial injury. But now you seize our vessels, turn off our workmen, and remove a helpless hulk into an open roadstead; this is too bad, and we hold you answerable for the consequences. We have dealt candidly and openly with Her Majesty's Government. We have, with the owners' permission, given the names of the owners; and we believe we have a perfect legal right to build ships for a French subject, without requiring from him a disclosure of his object in having such vessels constructed. It forms no part of our duty to interfere in any way with his affairs, and we shall not do so.' This letter received a mere formal acknowledgment, conveying a refusal to discuss any further questions which would have to come before a court of law. Messrs. Laird's protests were disregarded, and the ships were removed into the Mersey; Captain Inglefield, the commander of H.M.S. Majestic, doing his offensive duty as civilly as possible, and receiving all assistance and information from Messrs. Laird, while inflicting upon them a grievous and unnecessary injury. On December 7, Messrs. Laird call the attention of the Treasury to the continued danger of the vessels, and point out that they ought to be insured. The Treasury reply on the 18th: 'We will insure, provided that, in the event of the vessels being restored to you, you will pay the premiums.' On the 22nd, Messrs. Laird answer: 'Certainly not. The whole need for insurance is created by your act—an act which, if the vessels be restored to us, will be pronounced wrongful. We are not to bear the costs entailed by your proceedings. It is your part to insure.' No reply is obtained till January 20, when the Government promise to provide against risks 'in the manner they may consider requisite.' On January 12, Messrs. Laird ask permission to have the ships removed to Birkenhead docks and there finished. This proposal would have made the ships, in the event of condemnation, much more valuable to the Government—it would have reduced the risk—it would not have made escape less impossible—but it would have diminished materially the injury inflicted by the seizure upon Messrs. Laird; and it was accordingly rejected by the Government in the most peremptory manner. On the 25th Messrs. Laird renew their request, pointing out that they are heavy losers by the delay in completing the vessels; and the Government repeat their refusal. The correspondence closes with a protest by Messrs. Laird against the delay in bringing the case to trial, to which the Government replies that an information will be filed in a few days, and that it may be necessary to send a Commission abroad to collect evidence. This in February! Why was not the information filed in November, and the Commission sent abroad at once? The Government knew then, as they know now, what evidence was wanted, and it is impossible to believe that they have any material information now which they did not possess three months ago. If they could not or would not avoid the delay, they were bound in common honesty to take care that Messrs. Laird did not suffer by it. This they might have done by allowing the completion of the vessels. Why was not that course adopted?

The correspondence makes three things abundantly clear. First, that Messrs. Laird had nothing to do with any illegal purposes or fraudulent designs, but were simply building the ships for a foreign customer in the regular way of business. Secondly, that, instead of so directing their measures that Messrs. Laird might complete their contract with this customer, and applying the check to him—with whom, if with any one, the illegal intention rested—the Government took their measures so as to exempt M. Bravay and inflict all possible injury upon Messrs. Laird. Thirdly, that there has been a most extraordinary ostentation of precautions against impossible dangers, and a parade of outrageous and insulting suspicions, most offensive to an English firm and to a friendly nation, for which no credible motive is assigned, and for which we are utterly unable to assign a creditable one. It seems to us beyond a doubt that this correspondence contains ample materials to justify a Parliamentary vote of censure, even if the mover of that vote should begin by declaring the conviction of the House that it is not lawful to build ships of war for foreign belligerents.

Flogging and Branding.

Week before last the House of Commons, in committee on the annually passed Mutiny Bill, had under discussion the clauses authorising the infliction of corporal punishment in the army and navy. The clause authorising flogging passed by a majority of three, that authorising branding by a majority of thirty. In the course of the discussion, it was shown by Mr. Cox that, in the year 1862, nearly 35,000 lashes had been inflicted in the navy, and within one of 6,000 in the army. We do not accept this vote as an evidence of the approval of these forms of punishment by the British House of Commons. Privately, we have no doubt, most of the members share our own opinion about these disgraceful punishments, and would prefer to see them replaced by others less inconsistent with the dignity of manhood and British self-respect. If they voted for these clauses, it was for the only reason which could have induced us to vote for them—that no change relating to the discipline of two great national services should be made in haste, or be sprung upon the country as a surprise. Whatever private opinions they entertained were not likely to be affected by the arguments pro and con that were thrown out in the discussion, and which in some instances were flavoured with a nearer approach to Dundrearyism than we are accustomed to meet with off the stage. We may believe flogging a very wholesome dose to be administered to a certain class of malefactors; but the flogging of garrotters does not appear to be a sound reason for flogging British soldiers, and does not alter our conviction that reprobates deserving such a punishment are not fit to be in Her Majesty's service, in even the humblest capacity. Neither is our opinion, that infliction of a life-long disgrace by branding is a remnant of barbarism, altered by the assertion that it gives no pain, and is rather a pleasant operation than otherwise, or by the astounding announcement that it is necessary to protect officers against a trifling pecuniary risk.

We refer to this subject chiefly because, in the course of the debate, words dropped quite incidentally, which no Confederate American, accustomed as Southerners are to misrepresentation and abuse, could have read without pain and indignation. It was not surprising that Mr. Bright should have sharpened his condemnation of the practice of branding by saying that it was only resorted to in the Southern States by owners of slaves to identify their property, to which he had the grace to add that even there it was gradually becoming obsolete. But it was surprising that a man of Mr. Gladstone's extensive information, and one who cannot be accused of a perverse prejudice against the South, should not only have accepted the statement, but enlarged upon it. He is reported to have said that 'the comparison made by the hon. member for Birmingham between branding in the army and in the Southern States, was hardly fair. The brand in the latter case was placed upon a part of the person where it was always visible, while in the former it was concealed from the eyes of the world.'

We are at a loss to surmise whence this new accusation against the South has its origin, unless it be from an obscure pamphlet of the Honourable Robert J. Walker, a Northern born man, who when himself a slaveholder, was the most eloquent defender of the institution, and solemnly invoked Almighty God as his witness to its justice and humanity, but who in his later days, with his eyes fixed on Mr. Chase's seat, apostrophised his former associates as the 'lords of the whip, the chain, and the branding iron.' This we were disposed to regard as a rhetorical flourish in Mr. Walker's characteristic style, though a decided improvement upon Mrs. Beecher Stowe and her humbler followers, all of whom, in their recital of Southern enormities, forget this particular one. What may have been done, or permitted to be done, when the Southern States were British colonies, and African savages by shiploads were forced upon them against their protests and prohibitory legislation, we are unable to affirm; but this is certain, that since the Southern States have had an independent existence, no man ever saw a branded slave or heard of one in their ample territory. The Northern philanthropists have photographed the scarred backs of negroes, and sent them to England to excite pity for the sufferings of the slave; but they have yet to catch or manufacture the specimen which shall exhibit this novel invention of Southern cruelty. We do not hesitate to aver distinctly that any master using the 'branding iron' would inevitably be amenable to the law for mutilation of his slave, and would not escape the indignant prosecution of his neighbours. It is possible that the laws of some of the States still retain this punishment on their Statute Books, to be inflicted by judicial sentence for certain offences committed by slaves; but if so, there is no case within the recollection of the present generation where it has been put in practice. If those who are disposed to believe anything monstrous about the Southern people, and ascribe to them none but the basest and most selfish motives, would only reflect for a moment, they must see how extremely unlikely it is, upon their own assumptions, that the owner of so valuable a property should purposely and wantonly render it unsalable. What earthly motive could he have? To prevent escape or insure re-capture of a fugitive? If the slave escaped to a neighbouring plantation, he would, of course, there be as well known as at his own; if to a distance, the brand would be useless. These credulous persons seem to imagine that the negroes are as undistinguishable from each other as a flock of sheep, and require similar precautions to prevent confusion of ownership. Even if we left them in this ludicrous supposition, they should be reminded that, by the official statistics of the United States, greatly more than half the slaveholders in the South do not own exceeding five slaves, who, of course, are as much a part of their household as their children—that the number of plantations on which there are over two hundred slaves is exceedingly limited, and those on which there are over five hundred can be counted on the fingers. And if branding for the purpose of identification is absurdly unnecessary, for the punishment of offences it is almost equally absurd. If we are to consider the Southern master as the mere brutal dealer in human flesh of the Abolitionist fictions, are we also to couple his wickedness with the exceptional candour which would stamp his 'chattel' as worthless to any purchaser?

One finds it difficult to treat at once seriously and temperately statements which are, if not supremely silly, designedly malicious. Yet, when they are made in the British House of Commons by men who are not in the habit of either saying silly things or making malicious assertions, we can only deplore that thirty years of systematic lying on the part of her enemies have so shrouded the South in a cloud of prejudice and falsehood, that even to her warmest friends in Europe the simplest truth appears literally stranger than the grossest fiction. Men capable of believing that the Southern masters brand their slaves to identify them, will of course not believe that even the punishment of flogging is less often administered on adult negroes than on soldiers in the British army; on grown females so rarely that we do not number in our acquaintance a Southern man who can recollect a case; and on aged people never. In the cases where the law requires and administers flogging, the maximum number of stripes in all the slaveholding States uniformly is thirty-nine, one less than, Mr. Cox says, a British seaman receives for 'using bad language.' It is well to remember, also, that the famous 'instrument of torture,' the Southern lash, resembles in no respect the British 'cat-o'-nine-tails' or the Russian knout. It is invariably a strip of leather, perforated by holes, so devised that, though it may inflict smarting pain, not even its most excessive use could produce bodily injury. On an ordinarily well-managed plantation a stranger might reside for months without ever having an opportunity to see corporal punishment administered, and it is justly held to argue extreme ill-management where it is necessary. An incorrigible offender is gladly got rid of to another master, and usually the threat of sale suffices for the most severe repressive or corrective measure. As a rule, the worst, and often the only, flogging on a plantation is that of children by negro parents, unless the master or overseer interfere. As for domestic servants, if English masters and mistresses of households would only think of Southerners as ordinary men and women instead of stage or novel characters, they might judge of the frequency with which a gentleman's family is likely to be disturbed by a flogging scene. In this, however, they would still do the Southerners injustice, that they could form no adequate conception, from their own most favourable experience, of the leniency and forbearance which men and women, born among and accustomed to slave-domestics, unconsciously practise every hour of their lives. Much of the credulity which the fictitious horrors of Southern slavery meet with is due to the doubts which very good and kindhearted people feel of their own patience and justice in the use of supposed absolute power. They forget that practically, in a Christian community, the power over a bondsman is not greater, if indeed as great, as over a hired servant; and, secondly, that, by a merciful law of Providence which has made human nature pliable to all human circumstances, the master and the slave, the white man and the negro, if born on the same soil, and reared under the same sun, adapt themselves to each other's characters. The one has the habit, and understands the duties, of command; the other has in an equal degree the habit, and understands the duties, of obedience. Both act much more from a habit which fits them for each other, than upon any abstract reasoning; and in so doing neither dreams of being wrongdoer or wronged. To neither do their mutual relations appear in the light in which the European views them; and for this reason alone, if not for so many others, the grotesque fictions which are supposed at least theoretically possible, are not even probable in the ordinary tenor of Southern domestic or plantation life.

The conclusion at which we are forced to arrive by the statements made in Parliament on the occasion referred to, and among which was that Continental nations, in abolishing flogging and branding, had substituted far more cruel punishments, is that four millions of negroes in the Southern States are held to obedience by eight millions of whites, with less of physical coercion and less exhibition of practical severity than is thought necessary to enforce the discipline of a regiment or of a ship of war. Yet the four millions of negroes are of a confessedly inferior race, and their ancestors only three generations remote were heathen savages of the lowest type; while the rank and file of a regiment or the crew of a man-of-war are men, like ourselves, of the highest Caucasian castes, our fellow-citizens and fellow-subjects, theoretically at least perfectly our equals, and inheriting, like ourselves, at birth the instincts and aptitudes of five thousand years of civilisation. Nay, more, these British, French, and Austrian soldiers and sailors are not 'mean whites,' 'degraded by their contact with negro slavery,' like the soldiers under Lee and Stonewall Jackson, or the sailors who manned the Merrimac and the Arkansas. Yet it is thought necessary to subject them to the terrors of the lash, or worse, while their countrymen and countrywomen shed sympathetic tears over the fancied miseries of the 'poor slave.' Another incidental conclusion we arrive at, which is confirmed by tolerably extensive experience in both hemispheres, is, that the average Southern human nature is more merciful, more generous and considerate to inferiors, than the average human nature in other parts of the world. It is certainly less prone to think ill of its neighbour. Such stories as the British public readily believes about a kindred race, would not be credited by the Southern public even of a race of savages. We do not assign the reason for this difference; we simply chronicle the fact.

SLAVERY AND PRESIDENT LINCOLN'S PROCLAMATION.

By Hon. C. S. Morehead, ex-Governor of Kentucky.

No. III.

As a general rule, there is no part of the civilised world where there are kinder feelings for the black race than in the South.

This is so well understood by the negroes who emigrate North, that their deferential respect towards a Southern gentleman is a subject of universal observation. How could it be otherwise? The two races in the South play together in childhood, and grow up together with ever-recurring manifestations of the strongest attachment, which never fails to elicit kindness and assure protection. On the other hand, the antipathy to the black race in the North is unmistakable and notorious to all the world. There they are a degraded outcast race. They neither improve in civilisation nor in physical comfort. In the celebrated interview between Mr. Lincoln and a delegation of free negroes, he told them that 'on this broad continent not a single man of your race is made the equal of a single man of ours. Go where you are treated best, and the ban is still upon you. I do not propose to discuss this, but to present it as a fact with which we have to deal.' In a letter from the Hon. Montgomery Blair, a member of Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, bearing date March 2, 1862, he says: 'That this jealousy of caste is the instinct of the highest wisdom, and is fraught with the greatest good, is abundantly attested by its effects on our own race, in which it is stronger than any other. We conquer and hold our conquests by it.' Mr. Seward, in his speech in the Senate, March 11, 1850, says that 'the African race, bond and free, and the aborigines, savage and civilised, being incapable of assimilation and absorption, remain distinct, and, owing to their peculiar condition, constitute inferior masses.'

This 'instinct of highest wisdom' is in unremitting operation in the North upon the inferior masses of Mr. Seward, so that no fact is better established than that the free negroes there, as a race, have been constantly descending in the scale of civilisation. If it be true, as few will deny, that 'ill-treatment, overwork, neglect in infancy and sickness, drunkenness, want, and crime, are the chief causes of idiocy, blindness, and lunacy,' and that want and guilt fill the poorhouse and gaol, official statistics will show that the condition of the free blacks of the North is the most deplorable of any people on earth. In a carefully prepared table by the Hon. R. J. Walker, formerly Secretary of the Treasury of the United States (I purposely quote from Republican authority), which, he says, 'was compiled entirely from the official returns of the census of 1840, except as to prisons and paupers, which were obtained from city and State returns,' the following results are shown:—

'1. The number of deaf and dumb, blind, idiots, and insane of the negroes in the non-slaveholding States, is 1 out of every 96; in the slaveholding States it is 1 out of every 672, or 7 to 1 in favour of the slaves in this respect as compared with the free blacks.'

'2nd. The number of whites, deaf and dumb, blind, idiots, and insane, in the non-slaveholding States, is one in every 561, being nearly 6 to 1 against the free blacks in the same States.'

'3rd. The number of negroes who are deaf and dumb, blind, idiots and insane, paupers, and in prison in the non-slaveholding States, is one out of every six, and in the slaveholding States, one out of every 154, or 22 to 1 against the free blacks as compared with the slaves.'

'4th. Taking the two extremes of North and South, in Maine the number of negroes returned as deaf and dumb, blind, insane, and idiots, is one out of every 12, and in slaveholding Florida, by the same returns, is 1 of every 1,105; or 92 to 1 in favour of the slaves of Florida as compared with the free blacks of Maine.'

After commenting on these statistics, this gentleman subjoins the following solemn declaration:—

'Indeed, I could truly say, if passing into the immediate presence of the Most High, that, in morals and comforts, the free black is far below the slave; and that while the condition of the slave has been greatly ameliorated, and is improving every year, that of the free blacks (as the official tables demonstrate) is sinking in misery and debasement at every census.'

'The jealousy of caste' has repeatedly exploded in open violence in the North against the black race. To remedy this 'irrepressible conflict' in that section, Mr. Boutwell, Ex-Governor of Massachusetts, in a speech delivered at a meeting in Washington City, in which, for the first time in the history of that country, the President participated, urged the extermination of the white people of the South, in order to get clear of the free blacks of the North. He said, 'he had heard recently of riots between whites and blacks in Brooklyn, Cincinnati, and elsewhere. What, said he, is the difficulty? How is it to be remedied? If South Carolina and Florida were declared free by the President, the blacks would flock there from the North. Then the competition between the white and black man in the North would cease from this cause. The North would be alone in the possession of free white men, and the regions of cotton and rice fields for the coloured race would become their places of abode.'

Thus this humanitarian apostle of liberty panders to this instinct of antipathy to the black race in the North, by the alluring display of this newly invented scheme of philanthropic enterprise. General Phelps, the Federal commander at Ship Island, forgetting the commercial monopoly secured by law to the North, developes the same idea, in a somewhat different form, in an official proclamation. In it he says: 'It is our conviction that monopolies are as destructive as competition is conservative of the principles and vitalities of republican government; the slave labour is a monopoly, which excludes free labour and competition; that slaves are kept in comparative idleness and ease in a fertile half of our arable national territory, while free labourers constantly augmenting in numbers from Europe are confined to the other half, and are often distressed by want; that the free labour of the North has more need of expansion into the Southern States, from which it is virtually excluded, than slavery had into Texas in 1848.' The antipathy of Mr. Boutwell was especially directed against the black race in the North, while that of General Phelps manifested itself against the 'idleness and ease' of the black race of the South. Nearly all the States of the North, especially those of the border, have at one time or other passed laws against the introduction of free blacks within their jurisdiction, and at this time, in the States of Indiana and Illinois, the prohibition exists by constitutional enactment. When Mr. Lincoln proposed emancipation in the border slaveholding States, a petition was immediately got up in Ohio and extensively signed, reciting 'that by the laws of some of the States, to be hereafter enacted, many of the negroes held as slaves may be set at liberty; and fearing that they may wander into Ohio, to the great damage of the white inhabitants of the State, and especially those who have to depend on their labour to support themselves and families,' it respectfully asks for the enactment of 'a law so stringent in its provisions as totally to prohibit any negroes from emigrating into, settling, or holding property in Ohio, and that you also cause those now in Ohio to be removed in as reasonable a time as your judgment may suggest.' These evidences of the deep and settled prejudice and hostility of the North against the black race, might be almost indefinitely multiplied; and nowhere have they been more signally manifested than in the merciless massacre of negroes in the New York riot.

This being the case, it may well be assumed that the proclamation of President Lincoln attempting to confer liberty upon the slaves in certain States and parts of States was not prompted by any feeling of humanity for the black race, but was the result alone of a wicked desire to destroy the white race.

Notwithstanding his repeated acknowledgments, so solemnly made, that he had no power whatever over this subject, by one gigantic bound he overleaped all the barriers of the Constitution, and fulminated, to use his own characteristic language, his 'bull against the comet.' No principle is better established, both in America and England, than that military law is the mere creature of the legislature. In England it derives all its authority from the annual Mutiny Act, and in the United States from the rules and articles of war. It is impossible in either country that it can have any legitimate jurisdiction beyond what the civil law confers, as has been clearly and distinctly established by an unvarying current of judicial decisions. Yet Mr. Lincoln, as chief magistrate of a Government of delegated powers, accurately defined and strictly limited, assumes that there is a kind of paramount sovereignty incident to and arising out of the nature of the office of Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, analogous to the dictatorial power which the Roman Senate might confer upon an individual, by virtue of which he may issue a military order which, if enacted into a law by Congress with his approval, would be null and void on account of being in conflict with the Constitution—in other words, that he, as Commander-in-Chief, can make his military order a law which the whole legislative department of the Government would have no constitutional power to do. But he has so habitually violated every provision of the Constitution that it would be but a waste of time to dwell on this.

Governor Dunmore, during the American revolution, issued a proclamation giving freedom to the slaves 'who were able and willing to bear arms, and who joined His Majesty's forces.' How this was received in England may be learned from the journals of that day. The Annual Register for the year 1776 says: 'This proclamation was received with the greatest horror in all the colonies, and has been severely condemned elsewhere, as tending to loosen the bands of society, to destroy domestic security, and encourage the most barbarous of mankind to the commission of the most horrible crimes and the most inhuman cruelties; that it was confounding the innocent with the guilty, and exposing those who were the best friends to the Government to the same loss of property, danger, and destruction, with the most incorrigible rebels.' One single specimen may suffice to show how it was received in the colonies.

Samuel Adams of Boston, one of the noblest of that band of patriot heroes who achieved American independence, in the course of a speech he delivered at that time, exclaimed: 'But when I am roused by the din of arms; when I behold legions of foreign assassins paid to imbrue their hands in our blood; when I tread over the unconfined bones of my countrymen, neighbours, and friends; when I see the locks of a venerable father torn by savage hands, and a feeble mother clasping her infant to her bosom, and on her knees imploring their lives from their own slaves who have been allured to treachery and murder—Heaven forgive me if I cannot root out those passions which it has implanted in my bosom, and detest submission to a people who have either ceased to be human, or have not virtue enough to feel their own wretchedness and servitude.' He continues: 'Countrymen! the men who now invite you to surrender your rights into their hands, are the men who have let loose the merciless savages to riot in the blood of their brethren—who have taught treachery to your slaves, and courted them to assassinate your wives and children.' The proclamation of Dunmore attempted to give liberty only to those who were 'able and willing to bear arms,' while that of Mr. Lincoln attempts to confer what he calls freedom upon the entire race in certain localities 'by forcing all the men able to bear arms into the Federal army,' and by placing the women and children and infirm persons in such a condition as to die from destitution and starvation. That this barbarous and inhuman act should want no feature of revolting atrocity, no means have been spared to excite a bloody servile insurrection. The evidence is abundant to establish the fact, which seems no longer to be disguised. The picture, which was the result to some extent of the vivid imagination of the great New-England orator, has become a living reality under the proconsulate of Butler. In a letter from Norfolk, Virginia, known to be from an entirely reliable source, in speaking of a raid of negro troops into the interior, it is said they seized six citizens, said to be guerillas, 'to get whom the negroes whipped, stripped, and kept exposed all night in this inclement season, two females, and threatened to hang them if they did not expose their place of concealment. This part of the story will never appear in the Northern papers; also the one that the negroes burned up, in a house on the roadside, a woman and her four children, for some fancied insult.' These atrocities might be multiplied, but the heart sickens at their recital. My particular object is to show that this horrid and inhuman warfare has its foundation in no desire to ameliorate the condition of the black race, and that so far from having that effect, if carried out by force of arms, it is the certain and swift extermination of an unoffending people. By the proclamation, one million of blacks are still to be left in bondage in the States of Maryland, part of Virginia, Delaware, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Missouri. If Mr. Lincoln's object had been really to free the slave, why not extend the boon to those in States over which he was then exercising unlimited and despotic control? Will it be said that this would have been in violation of the Constitution? It is true it would have been; but no greater violation than that attempted by his proclamation upon other States. Besides, is it not the merest farce for him or his minions to talk of the sanctity of that instrument, when so many hundreds of citizens were seized without the forms of law, and sent to distant prisons, and deprived for indefinite periods of their liberty, without a charge of crime—when he had abolished the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, and utterly destroyed the freedom of the press? When, by his own acknowledgment, he had violated the Constitution in so many essential features, it could be but a slight addition to the enormity of his guilt to extend his proclamation to the exempted States. But the truth is, Mr. Lincoln is only a cunning party tactician, and certainly Mr. Seward has no one element that entitles him to a higher rank. On coming into power they resolved on a policy that might have restored the Union and avoided the calamities of a war, which they knew could only end in final disunion. They saw, however, that the Republican party would be divided by such policy, and to save a party they were willing to destroy a great nation. When General Fremont issued his famous emancipation proclamation, Mr. Lincoln wrote him a private letter furnishing evidence of the above estimate of his character, in which he tells him that there was great danger that the closing paragraph in relation to liberating slaves 'will alarm our Southern Union friends, and turn them against us—perhaps ruin our rather fair prospect for Kentucky;' and then asks him 'as of his own motion to modify that paragraph.' His object was, as a mere party manœuvre, to avoid giving offence to the Radical Republican wing. But Fremont published his letter and defeated his object, and it was not long before the General of Proclamation memory was removed.

After a knowledge of these facts, no one will be astonished to find that his only motive for his own proclamation of emancipation, against all his previously declared convictions of right, and justice, and humanity, was based solely upon party considerations. In a paper read by him to the members of Congress of the border slaveholding States, in the month of July 1862, and published in the National Intelligencer of Washington City, when speaking of General Hunter's proclamation of freedom to the slaves, issued from Hilton Head, South Carolina, he says: 'He (General Hunter) proclaimed all men free within certain States, and I repudiated the proclamation. He expected more good and less harm from the measure than I could believe would follow. Yet in repudiating it I gave dissatisfaction, if not offence, to many whose support the country cannot afford to lose. And this is not the end of it. The pressure in this direction is still upon me, and is increasing. By conceding what I now ask, you can relieve me, and much more can relieve the country, in this important point.'

It is certain, therefore, that the proclamation was not issued from any humane or philanthropic motive, but to avoid giving dissatisfaction or offence, and in obedience to an increasing pressure. He distinctly states that he could not believe with General Hunter, and repudiated his proclamation. Yet, in about two months after this time, he yielded to the pressure from fear of losing a fragment of his party, and issued one himself.

It may be said, with emphasis, that it is a proclamation not against slavery, but against the slaves. In a carefully prepared letter of the Hon. M. Blair, a Cabinet Minister, before referred to, written evidently to sustain the President's views with regard to Hunter's proclamation, and doubtless submitted to him before publication, he says: 'I am morally certain that to free the slaves of the South, without removing them, would result in the massacre of them.' The prediction of Mr. Blair, who has since so readily become the supporter of the proclamation, has been fully verified thus far. The chief places where the edict has had any effect have been within the valley of the Mississippi river. Regiments of blacks have there been formed either by voluntary enlistment, or, as was more frequently the case, by forcing them into the ranks. Marauding squads of white Federal soldiers would devastate plantations, and if they found the negroes unwilling to go with them, they would burn their cabins and destroy their food, so that they were compelled to accompany them. I have accounts detailing horrors which have no parallel in civilised warfare. But an account has already been given, chiefly from Federal authority, of the inhuman and merciless treatment of the black non-combatants who have been forced to leave comfortable homes to die in wretchedness and want, and it would be occupying too much space to enter into further details in this connection.

But the freed men, who have been forced into the Federal ranks, how have they fared?

The manner in which they were driven at the point of the bayonet by Federal troops to a position in full range of the Confederate batteries at Port Hudson, where 900 out of 1,200 fell as helpless victims, is too well known to need more than an allusion, to show the absolute indifference, to use the mildest term, of the Northern people to their fate. These poor deluded blacks are beginning themselves to appreciate the inextinguishable antipathy of their white allies, as is fully evidenced by their revolt at Fort Jackson, the particular details of which will be carefully concealed during the war, as well as by the trial of many of them in the city of New Orleans for 'secession proclivities,' as we learn by their papers. I have before me an extract from the Atlanta Confederacy, a paper published in Georgia, in which I find the following statement: 'Some time since (at Baton Rouge) there was a fight there between the negroes and the whites. The negroes clamoured for pay, and, when paid, declared they were not paid as much as their white-skinned brethren. The ill-feeling created a row; the darkies fired upon the whites, killing about fifty, when the Yankees formed, pitched into the sable crowd, and massacred the greater portion of them. Those who survived were disarmed and ironed.' It adds: 'There is no doubt of the accuracy of this statement.' This extract was republished in the Cincinnati papers without a word of comment; and since that time I have seen no allusion to it, or any reference made to the facts detailed.

I venture the assertion, that there is not this day one in ten of the negroes who have been brought under Federal control, who, if they had the opportunity, would not seek refuge within the Southern lines; and I feel a perfect assurance, if there should be a servile insurrection, it will be where Banks has so recently established his heartless system of bondage.

MEXICO.*

We smile at the infantile credulity of the 16th century, which gave credit to the absurd stories told by the early voyagers about their fabled India. They described the country as a vast storehouse of gold and priceless gems; and they spoke of a race of giants and of other natural phenomena equally astounding. Yet, in sober truth, the actual wonders of the New World are greater than the fictitious marvels which our forefathers believed in. America did not reward its explorers with the cargoes of gold and precious stones they expected to collect easily and in profusion, but it has by its productiveness enriched the whole world. The progress of civilisation and the spread of Christianity are intimately connected with the increase of commerce, and without American cotton and American tobacco commerce could not have attained its present enormous development. Those who take a philosophical view of history cannot fail to be struck with the timeliness of the discovery of the New World, which at a critical era opened up a new field of enterprise, and administered a stimulus that saved the nations of the West from the chronic anarchy that seems to have been the immediate cause of Oriental degeneracy. To many readers these observations may appear wearisomely trite, but they are naturally suggested to any one who thinks on the past, present, and future of Mexico.

Three hundred years ago, people were deceived in reference to America because there were no means at hand of testing the reliability of the narratives of the adventurers, but the 19th century is not less deceived through passing by and ignoring very palpable facts. When it transpired that the mission of Napoleon III. in Mexico had a vastly grander object than securing the liquidation of debts due to French subjects—that the Imperial purpose was to afford the Mexicans an opportunity of founding a strong and equitable Government in the place of the wretched and corrupt rule of Juarez—that the French army was to attempt to achieve the first step necessary for the reorganisation of the country—there was a prevalent impression, both in England and France, that, even if the enterprise succeeded, the results would be too unimportant to repay the cost. Surely a more unfounded or more inexcusable prejudice never possessed the popular mind. Mexico has a climate very diversified, yet singularly salubrious. Its yields of the precious metals are prodigious, and the harvest of silver, and we may add of gold, is only limited by the amount of labour bestowed on the work of mining. But it is not in her mines that the whole wealth of Mexico consists. The surface of the earth produces abundant crops of cereals, and, if the labour were bestowed, would compete with other lands in supplying many of the chief articles of commerce. Look at Mexico on the map, and see how excellent is her geographical situation for being the centre or avenue of an immense commerce. Her western coast is washed by the Pacific Ocean, which, since the ocean has ceased to be a pathless waste, links her to the productive countries of the far East. Her opposite coast faces Europe, and the distance from coast to coast is so short—at one point being only 137 miles—that we may look forward to the day when a Mexican railroad—some are sanguine enough to think of a canal—will connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Nor are these the whole of the advantages incident to the geographical situation of Mexico. Her neighbouring States promise in a few years to open up to her a large continental trade which may even rival her foreign trade. We are not indulging in fantasy or hyperbole. Such an exact and scientific writer as the author of the Cosmos tells us, the descriptions that the Spaniards gave of the beauties of the country and climate of Mexico were not exaggerated, though poetical. M. Chevalier observes: 'In the beginning of the past century, whilst wheat cultivated in France yielded five or six grains for one, Mexican cultivation, which was not better, but certainly worse, presented an average produce of at least twenty-two or twenty-five times the seed sown. Humboldt was much surprised at this. He took a great deal of pains to verify the fact, and found it correct.' In spite of the unsettled state of the country, the silver and gold mines of Mexico produce about 5,000,000*l.* annually. Yet this highly favoured land, a land teeming with riches, blessed with a climate which bestows health and plenty on its inhabitants, geographically situated to become a great emporium of trade, has been regarded as worn out and exhausted—as if a bad government could blight the climate, could render the soil sterile, could transmute into dross the riches yet in the bowels of the earth, could subvert the order of nature as well as ruin the people.

And strange to say, when bitterly assailed for the Mexican expedition by opponents who made capital out of the general ignorance and misapprehension, the French Government did not adopt measures for exposing the true state of the case. With the exception of M. Chevalier's book, we are not cognisant of any other important work on Mexico that has lately issued from the French press. There has even seemed a disinclination to aid in correcting the popular prejudice, for a very able and sensible pamphlet entitled 'La Question Mexicaine et la Colonisation Française,' which clearly explained the resources of Mexico, was hardly noticed by the French journals. Perhaps the Emperor Napoleon may deem it better to leave the justification of his policy to the lessons that will be taught in the future by events; but, whatever the motive of this reticence, we are confident that if the French people had been informed of the grand results to be achieved—if they had known that the Imperial eagles swooped on Mexico, not to collect a debt, but to redeem a country from waste and a nation from political degradation, to increase the wealth and to advance the civilisation of the world, the enterprise would have been applauded with generous enthusiasm, and the entry of the French troops into Mexico and the planting of the French standard over the Halls of Montezuma would have been hailed as a triumph that added to the lustre of the military and national glory of France.

In one particular it would have been very easy to have stopped the unscrupulous clamour of the opposition. When it was announced that an empire was to replace the republican form of government, we were told that this would outrage the feelings of the Mexicans—that it could not be their voluntary choice; and Mr. Seward wrote that Republicanism was the only species of government suitable for America. What are the facts? A Republican Government has not existed in Mexico for more than half a century. When the colonists—as we are well reminded by M. Chevalier—threw off the yoke of Spain, they did not desire Republicanism, and were incensed at not being able to find a European prince to reign over them, and in their extremity set up Iturbide as sovereign. Certainly the fruits of Republicanism cannot have removed the monarchical partialities of the people. In fifty years Mexico has lost more than half her territory, and the condition of the people has gone from bad to worse. It was therefore to be expected that, when left free to choose a form of government, the Mexicans would vote for a Monarchy as they have done.

The misapprehension about the resources and value of Mexico is almost inexplicable when we remember that it did not exist at the beginning of the century. In this case it is not that we have not failed to acquire knowledge, but that we have forgotten that which we knew. In 1810 a work in two volumes was published in London, entitled 'Present State of the Spanish Colonies, &c., by W. Walton, jun.,' which gives an exceedingly graphic and truthful account of the country. This book, which is a diary of travels, describes the magnificent scenery, the splendid flora, and the beauties of the city of Mexico, which have enraptured every visitor from the time of Cortez until the present. After referring to the fine buildings of the capital, Mr. Walton adds: 'Their warehouses and shops, from their great display of precious metals and massive jewellery, are the richest and most valuable in the world. The great market-place is a superb and spacious square. Every morning at sunrise, innumerable boats, canoes, and craft of various descriptions, laden with a vast variety of articles of food, arrive at the great market-place, where the inhabitants are supplied with the greatest abundance and at moderate prices. There is a beautiful park well planted with trees. Several hundreds of coaches, drawn by two or by four mules or horses, parade here every fine evening, attended by numerous retinues of black slaves, dressed out in the richest liveries. Mexico is the most populous city of all those which the Catholic King has in his vast dominions, and contains upwards of 200,000 inhabitants.' Mr. Walton gives a long list of the products of Mexico, and sums up by observing: 'The city of Mexico is the emporium or grand magazine in which are collected all the gifts of nature.' Regarding the climate he writes:—

The greatest cold of any of the inhabited places does not equal the cold of England, or even the cold of Spain; nor can the greatest heat be compared even to the heat felt during the dog-days in many countries in Europe. The difference between summer and winter is actually so little felt in any part, that the most delicate persons wear the same clothing in June and in January; no other relief is wanted in the hottest season but to retire to the shade, and the animals sleep all the year round under the open sky.

But Mr. Walton, in 1810, in writing of the climate, productiveness, and indigenous wealth of Mexico, only endorsed the record of every other writer, and only anticipated the verdict of every other book on Mexico that has been published since 1810. Is it not an extraordinary anomaly that under such circumstances Mexico should have been looked upon as an exhausted, barren, and worthless country? It will be still more extraordinary if, now a strong government is established, and the days of the bandit and official spoiler are over, the unfounded prejudice is not dissipated, and European capital and emigrants do not wend their way to Mexico.

Very anomalous and romantic is the whole history of Mexico. When Cortez first surveyed the country we can understand that he felt all the rapture and surprise expressed in his letters. Instead of savage tribes he found a thickly populated and orderly governed community. The monarchs were absolute, but the rights of the people were protected by irremovable judges. So powerful was the monarchy, that the only way in which Cortez could obtain a footing was by fomenting discord amongst the native rulers, and even then he narrowly escaped destruction. He found the people skilled in many of the arts, particularly in the working of gold and silver. He found, too, an Aztec literature which was extensive and vigorous, and pervaded by a high-toned morality. M. Chevalier quotes from 'Zurita's Memoirs' a paper called 'A Father's Counsel to his Son,' which is unexceptionable—as for example: 'Offend no person, nor attack his honour. Make thyself worthy of the rewards God giveth to every one as it pleases Him: receive what He shall give thee; return thanks, and if it be much be not puffed up.' The religious writings of the ancient Mexicans are worthy of an advanced stage of civilisation. 'In the exhortation that ended the confession, the priest said to the faithful, "Give food to those who are hungry, clothing to those who are naked, whatever may be the privations that care imposes on thee; for the flesh of the unfortunate is thy flesh, and they are men like unto thyself."' Yet notwithstanding these moral and religious sentiments, Cortez found the hideous custom of human sacrifices in full practice.

Perhaps we ought not to be surprised that so little pains were taken by Spain to develope the resources of colonies which had already enriched the empire and sustained its credit. The English are essentially a colonizing nation, yet it required the sharp and bitter lesson of 1787 to teach us to govern colonies rightly. On the other hand, we cannot be surprised at the desperate effort made by Spain to retain Mexico, for Spain knew the value and importance of the country. But it is surprising, though explainable, that when the Spanish colonies became independent, they did not, at least for a while, manifest a healthy vigour. How is it that Mexico has steadily and rapidly declined since the separation from Spain, until in all things except human sacrifices the condition of the population is now worse than it was when Cortez conquered it?

There is but one reply and one explanation. The population has degenerated by the amalgamation of the white and negro races; and with a population constituted of different races, a republican form of government is but another name for anarchy.

It is generally unwise to speculate upon the future, but, without presumption, we may predict for Mexico an era of prosperity. We know the capabilities of the country, we know what has hitherto kept the country down, and we know that that evil is remedied. M. Chevalier, in his introduction to the English edition, refers to one danger that he thinks threatens the new Empire; but we dare say by this time—although his introduction is dated March 10—he will agree with us that his fears are chimerical. He says:—

There is now reason to fear that, once victorious in her struggle with the South—as events appear to promise she will be—the North may look at the affair in another light. It is not impossible but that, in the vast Republic of America, ambition and the spirit of domination, excited by the mischief-working influence of bidders for popularity, may stifle the voice of reason and justice. There will be no lack of tribunes to urge that powerful democracy to seize on the territory left to their unfortunate neighbours, whom they have already despoiled of half the space they occupied.'

M. Chevalier has been reading the Washington stories about Southern exhaustion and the speedy triumph of the Federals. The last mails from America must have changed his opinion. But M. Chevalier is quite right in assuming that the conquest of the Confederate States would doom Mexico to lose her present chance of happiness and prosperity. The Confederacy is alone in the fight, but she does not fight for herself alone. Her independence will secure the independence of Mexico and the peace of Canada. She fights against a despotism that would make the New World the heritage of New England. She fights to found a balance of power that will make America free and prosperous, and a source of wealth and security, instead of an object of disquietude and danger, to the rest of the world.

FROM LONGSTREET'S HEAD-QUARTERS.

We are permitted to copy the following from a private letter, written by a principal member of General Longstreet's staff to a military friend in England. The letter is dated from General Longstreet's head-quarters, then in Tennessee, in January:—

As our mutual friend L. is about to cross the water, I thought I would trouble you with a line, to inform you of the progress of affairs here.

We are carrying on the war as when you were here, hopefully, though under many difficulties, but the fact is that we know full well that we must win our independence after a while, and with this consciousness impressed upon officers and men, sacrifices are borne with comparative indifference. The end must come, and when it does come, we will reap our full reward in being free from the despicable race to whom we have heretofore been bound. If a truthful history of this war could be written, with all its details, what an amount of human suffering it would unfold! You saw nothing of it in the the Pennsylvania campaign. Think of an army of 25,000, 8,000 of them cavalry, sent to drive back an enemy numerically stronger, and provided with all the appliances of war, while we were without efficient transportation, without any supplies, except the beef we could drive up within our lines, and the wheat we could haul and grind at mills from which we could expel the enemy. Our railroad communication entirely cut off by the defeat of poor unfortunate Bragg at Missionary Ridge, our very horse-shoes had to be made of old iron picked up in the country, and when that gave out we had to draw the spikes out of the railroad iron, in order to shoe our wagon horses, that they might haul wheat to mills ten or fifteen miles, and then haul the flour from ten to thirty miles to the troops. No ammunition, except a limited supply in the reserve ordnance trains: we had to economise even the lives of our enemy to protect our own. Without ambulances for the wounded, I have seen men carried on litters, through mud and rain, 23 miles to a hospital. And yet, under all these circumstances, we have held our position until the railroad communication to Richmond is nearly completed. We are now trying to build a pontoon bridge across the French Broad, to forage with our cavalry, and we have to send 80 miles by wagon road for nails and axes. No one but a military man can appreciate these difficulties: and if you add to them a scarcity of shoes, clothes, and blankets, with winter snows, and a scarcity of the supplies to be collected, you can then appreciate the leading difficulties overcome by General Longstreet in holding this portion of East Tennessee. We could hardly bear up but for the assistance given us by the Federals, but the fact is, wherever they get a foothold their atrocities are so great, and their tyranny so unlimited, that they teach us that these sacrifices are light to the humiliation and suffering we should have to bear if they were our masters. We have nothing left us but to fight on, fight ever, rather than wear the chains which they would forge for us; but now we shall bless the day of honourable peace; how sweet will be the quiet of home and the restoration of law and order! May 'Merrie England' never bear the sorrow that she may feel the joyous change. Dr. —— has just passed out, and desires to be remembered to you; —— is in Richmond, where he is no doubt at present 'over all the ills of life victorious.' —— is under the weather, having been cut off from spirituous supplies, but he is at present running a distillery on his own account, and expects in a few days to revel in rye. The General is wrapped up in his own thoughts, and looks as if he would give his kingdom for horseshoes, as that is what he chiefly lacks to make a forward movement. I am kept pretty busy devising ways and means to spread a daily repast to my hungry family, and when bad weather drives me to shelter I luxuriate in your india-rubber overcoat which —— very kindly gave me.

BUTLER'S RULE AT NORFOLK.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—As you kindly inserted at my request the infamous order of one of Butler's subordinates sentencing a clergyman of the Church of England (called with us Episcopalian) to street-sweeping for seditious conduct, it is only 'giving the devil his due' to send you Butler's own order rescinding that sentence five days later. You will please observe that Butler's head-quarters, Fortress Monroe, is only a few miles from either Norfolk or Portsmouth, and in hourly communication with those places. It is, therefore, impossible that such an order should have been published without his knowledge and previous consent, and, indeed, he does not pretend to disapprove the order. He is simply acting on a hint from higher authority of the impolicy of carrying it out into execution. Please also inform your readers that the charge against the Rev. Mr. Wingfield was that he 'sat bolt upright' in the church when the compulsory prayer for the President of the United States was read. The reasons for rescinding the order are given by Butler himself as follows: 'Not because the punishment is unjust, but because its nature may be supposed to reflect on the Christian Church, which, by his connection with it, has already been too much disgraced.' Mr. Wingfield is therefore to pass the period of his sentence as a prisoner in Fortress Monroe.

I have now to enclose to you two other orders, scarcely less infamous and tyrannical. The charge against the two cashiers amounts to this, that they refused to betray the trust reposed in them professionally by customers of their respective institutions. One of the victims, Mr. Baine, is about seventy years of age; the other, Mr. Hodges, is a cripple. Think of their carrying a ball of twenty-four pounds weight on their feet.

Yours, &c., Norfolk.

Special Orders, No. 49.

Fortress Monroe, Va.: Feb. 18, 1864.

VI. W. H. W. Hodges having been Cashier of the Merchants and Mechanics Savings Bank of Portsmouth, in which were deposited the savings of the widows and orphans of the labourers of that city, and having, as such Cashier, been faithless to his trust, and having sent away into the Confederacy the funds belonging to the Bank, and having been called upon by the Bank Commission and examined regarding the affairs of that Bank, and being asked concerning it, and declining to answer, and afterwards being brought before the Commanding General, and being by him duly cautioned as to the consequences of declining to answer, and putting at contempt the authority of the United States, but still refused to answer as to the means and manner by which, and upon by whom all funds were abstracted and lost to the depositors, and so refusing to answer:

It is Ordered, That he be confined at hard labour at Fort Hatteras, on Hatteras Island, upon the coast of North Carolina upon bread and water, with a twenty four pound ball attached to his leg by a chain not more than six feet long, until he answers the questions, and that he stand committed to the Guard House until he is removed on board the transport to be conveyed to Fort Hatteras in execution of this order.

By Command of Major-General Butler.

Special Orders, No. 49.

Fortress Monroe, Va.: Feb. 18, 1864.

VII. Geo. M. Baine, senior of that name, late Cashier of the Portsmouth Savings Fund Society, and formerly a minister of the Gospel, having had in his charge over $13,000 of the funds of said Society, which funds have been sent to Richmond, being duly inquired of by the Bank Commission investigating the affairs of said Savings Bank, as to the persons by whom and the means by which the said funds were withdrawn from the Bank, and the labourers, widows, and orphans, depositors therein, defrauded of the same, in violation of his duty, and showing contempt for authority, by refusing to disclose his accomplices in the fraud, and saying he 'proposed to suffer for them, and would not answer for fear of implicating' the other robbers of this Bank, was called before the Commanding-General, and fully and duly cautioned by him as to the consequences of declining to answer, and putting at contempt the authority of the United States; and after full deliberation the said George M. Baine, the senior of that name, still refusing to answer the question, put put to him in that behalf, or to disclose his accomplices, and nowhere putting it upon the ground that it might criminate himself:

It is Ordered, That he be confined at hard labour at Fort Hatteras, on Hatteras Island, on the coast of North Carolina, until he does answer the questions concerning the robbery of the funds of the said Bank.

No further punishment is put upon him in consideration of his age.

The said George M. Baine will stand committed to the Guard House until he is removed on board the transport-ship to be conveyed to Fort Hatteras in execution of this order.

By Command of
Major-General Butler.

PRECEDENTS IN THE CASE OF THE TUSCALOOSA.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—As the case of the Tuscaloosa is likely to occupy for some little time the attention of the public, an examination of the following enactments and cases may be found useful to show what have been the decisions of the English prize-courts in analogous circumstances:—

The Prize Act, 33 Geo. 3, c. 66, contains a section (s. 42) ordering that all ships, vessels, and goods belonging to British subjects and retaken from the enemy shall be restored to the owners on payment of salvage, 'but if such ship or vessel so retaken shall appear to have been, after the taking by His Majesty's enemies, by them set forth as a ship or vessel of war, the said ship or vessel shall not be restored to her former owners or proprietors, but shall in all cases, whether taken by any of His Majesty's ships or by any privateer, be adjudged lawful prize for the benefit of the captors.'

This statute expired at the conclusion of the then subsisting war, and was re-enacted by 43 Geo. 3, c. 60, with an additional clause, identical with that here cited. It was necessary under this section for the courts to define exactly what was a 'setting forth for war,' and what line of conduct on the part of captors would invest their prize with the character of a hostile vessel of war.

The first case reported is that of the Horatio (6 C. Robinson, Adm. Rep. 320), which was an English slaver, captured by three French privateers, and fitted out by them as a privateer. She was recaptured, and a claim put in by her former owners, and opposed by her recaptors under the above section. The Court held that the recaptors had no claim except to salvage, because the vessel was not properly 'set forth for war;' she had no commission, no commissioned officer, no further armament, her slaver's armament being deemed sufficient for privateering purposes. The mere act of putting an additional number of men on board was not sufficient to defeat the title of the original owners. (Dec. 19, 1806.)

Next comes the case of the Ceylon (1 Dodson, 105), an East Indiaman partially armed; she was captured by the French and taken into the neutral and non-military port of Johanna, where she was supplied with additional guns, and a French crew; she did good service in assisting to destroy the English blockading squadron, and was subsequently used as a prison-ship; in this capacity she was recaptured when the Isle of France was taken. In deciding whether she was or was not a ship of war, Sir William Scott said, that the words 'setting forth for war' did not necessarily mean 'sending out of port' or 'giving a regular commission.' In this case the addition of two guns, the placing of a lieutenant de vaisseau holding a military commission on board of her with a sufficient complement of men, constituted 'a setting forth for war.' There was no proof that the ship had been condemned by a competent court, but he (Sir William Scott) was bound to presume that she was regularly condemned, as she had remained so long in the possession of the enemy. (Nov. 15, 1811.)

The Courrier (1 Dodson, 67), a whaler, was captured by the American frigate Essex. Captain Porter, the commander of the Essex, without carrying the Courrier into port or taking out her crew, equipped her with additional guns and sixty men, and employed her under the command of one of his lieutenants against other British vessels in those seas, three of which were by that means actually taken. On her recapture by a British ship it was urged for the captors that the capture by the Essex was unlawful, because Captain Porter was on his station, and was not acting under the immediate order of his Government. Sir William Scott said: 'Captain Porter was cruising in those seas, and how he could do it by no means material.' A further objection was urged that Captain Porter had commissioned the Courrier in his own sole authority. The learned Judge answered that we had allowed (in the case of the Ceylon) a commission by an admiral in command of two or three ships to be valid: he could not see why a commission issued by the commander of a single ship should be less good. Judgment that she was a hostile ship of war, and therefore lawful prize to the recaptors.

It is satisfactory to know that on such clear and unmistakable precedents the Tuscaloosa is secure from miserable litigation and persecution.

THE NEGRO'S PLACE IN NATURE.

(From the Reader of March 19.)

I have read with much admiration Professor Huxley's clever letter which appears in the Reader of this day; yet, while awarding him all the praise due to such a brilliant display of forensic talent, I must still confess that the stern facts seem to me to be altogether untouched, in spite of the special pleader's device to which he has resorted, alluding to my letter as a plea of 'guilty' to charges which he, nevertheless, leaves totally unsubstantiated.

To the broadside of objurgatory invective which, be it remembered, was originally levelled from that 'Coward's Castle,' the Hustings, I can only offer the invulnerable defence of the naked truth.

I shall dismiss Mr. Huxley's frivolous objection to the extract from the lady's letter before quoted with the single remark that it (which I still hold to be very intelligent) bears on its surface the unmistakable evidence of never having been designed, any more than it was brought forward by me, as a scientific premise, and I clearly stated the reasons for which I quoted it. With regard to the courteous insinuation of Professor Huxley that I cited an essay of M. Gubler's which I had never read, its true value will at once appear when I simply affirm that I never cited M. Gubler at all.

It is some consolation for me to know that the stigma of 'public condemnation' has been affixed to my paper by one who shows little respect for any authority except his own, and utterly ignores the teaching of all those laborious investigators and truth-loving philosophers, the anthropologists of France.

Surely it is at least inconsistent that Mr. Huxley, while disclaiming any attacks on my scientific honesty, should yet on the same page profess his readiness to exchange for 'broad assertion' his original insinuation that my 'views were brought forward in behalf of the slaveholding interest.'

I cheerfully accept the challenge, and, while defying Mr. Huxley to make good his calumny, I at the same time totally and expressly deny that I have any other aim, object, or interest in the opinions which I have propounded than the destruction of error and the advancement of truth.

The gentlemanly feeling for which I still give Professor Huxley credit will, I am sure, dictate to him the necessity of either withdrawing or proving the charge he has here brought forward.

Although I am no more a Southern agent than Mr. Huxley is a Northern one, I yet maintain my views unchanged—views radically opposed to those expressed by Mr. Huxley in his assertion that 'the North is justified in any expenditure of blood or of treasure which shall eradicate a system hopelessly inconsistent with the moral elevation, the political freedom, or the economical progress of the American people'—thus reiterating in the teeth of incontestable facts the usual fanatical language of the Abolitionists.

In the first place, every child in this country knows that the North is not fighting for the abolition of slavery, and fortunately the history of the Southern States is sufficient to invalidate each and all of Professor Huxley's gratuitous assertions with regard to the effects of the slaveholding system; for in the slave States the moral elevation both of the European and the negro is far higher than in the free States; and it seems hard to reconcile these words of Professor Huxley with those which he gives utterance to in another passage, where he challenges our sympathetic admiration for the Southerner as exhibiting in a very high degree the 'indomitable courage and self-denying persistence'—surely no despicable moral qualities. It is true, indeed, that the South is not favourable to the system of Abraham Lincoln and his bullies, which seems to be the lecturer's ideal of 'political freedom.'

Finally, it is difficult to conceive that Professor Huxley can be ignorant of the fact, demonstrable by the merest tyro, that the greatness of the Euro-American nation is almost entirely to be ascribed to the cultivation of the rich lands of the Southern States by the negro, territories such as Louisiana and Florida, quite incapable of being worked by the European, while at the same time Mr. Huxley's pet Government has demonstrated to us most conclusively that the negro will not work except under compulsion.

Although conscious that the subjects considered in the Negro's Place in Nature, from their extent, might well tax the energies of even the highest intellect, I submit that, in the expression of my opinions on the subject—the result of no hasty investigations—I was at least entitled to more courteous treatment than the charge of ignorance of Physics and Anthropology, and incapacity for understanding the subject I was treating. Mr. Huxley appears to mistake abuse for argument: but I shall not degrade myself by following his example. The real cause of this extraordinary and ill-tempered attack on myself and my friend Mr. Blake seems to have leaked out in the conclusion of Professor Huxley's letter, so that I should be almost justified in taking Professor Huxley's words in a 'natural sense' when he says he awaits 'in fear and trembling' [illegible] of the next number of the Anthropological Review.

I trust the Council will duly respond to the appeal of every [illegible]

THE EMPIRE OF MEXICO.

(From the Spectator of March 26.)

For [illegible] years [illegible] empire of Mexico would have [illegible] the most [illegible] in the [illegible] of the Atlantic. [illegible] United States would have [illegible] to [illegible] body [illegible] the Pacific of Mexico [illegible] a monarchy of which an American would be [illegible] The civilized world would have [illegible] the [illegible] of such a solution on the part of [illegible] most powerful existing [illegible] of political society. Yesterday [illegible] and yet it [illegible] so [illegible] as it were, two great [illegible] by the Atlantic [illegible] the American continent. To-day [illegible] two [illegible] severed into two parts, [illegible] were for [illegible] history [illegible] to [illegible] in reference to the [illegible] of the [illegible] attend the [illegible] or the [illegible] of the [illegible] likely to follow [illegible] the struggle. The [illegible] of the two [illegible] the [illegible] of hopeless [illegible] by [illegible] and [illegible] vanished with the [illegible] but to a [illegible] [illegible] administered, yields almost without a struggle to the [illegible] of a foreign power, and, with an appearance of [illegible] on the part of its [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] any epoch in their career as a [illegible] [illegible] people, they cross the Atlantic and the entire continent of Europe to call a Hapsburg Prince from his quiet home upon the far-away shores of the Mediterranean to be their monarch. Within the brief period of a few weeks the first crowned head since the fall of the Montezumas for the brief career of Iturbide is hardly worth notice—will occupy the throne of Mexico.

Will the new Emperor be able to establish a firm and a good Government out of the materials before him? Considering this question only in reference to its internal aspect, we can discover no cause which would render such a result improbable. Mexico has, through a long series of convulsions and revolutions, reached a point of imbecility when to reject the monarchy would be to court dissolution. Just as an individual, who after a long career of reckless dissipation and life-destroying excesses, finding himself prostrate, and his vital powers almost extinguished, accepts, with an instinctive love of life, the medicine which may restore him to health and strength, so may it be expected to be with the Mexican nation. It is not, then, from within that we may anticipate any serious impediment to the establishment of the empire. A people thus united by a common necessity, a common desire, and a common danger, constitute materials out of which it is not unreasonable to hope that a Government may be constructed, and Mexico again restored to her lost position in the family of nations. There is a danger, however, of startling magnitude which will confront the new Emperor from the very commencement of his career. Upon the manner of meeting and combatting this danger on the part of Maximilian, and that of his protector and ally, the Emperor of the French, will depend the duration of the monarchy which they propose to establish. The empire of Mexico cannot separate itself altogether from the cause by which it was produced. Owing its very existence to the gigantic war which is desolating the late great Federal Republic, its progress will be to a certain extent dependent upon the incidents, as its fate will be eventually decided by the result, of that war.

The prevailing sentiment amongst the people of the North is, of course, decidedly hostile to the establishment of any stable government in Mexico, but more especially to the creation of a monarchy. The Radical party carry this hostility to the extreme limit of a bitter and uncompromising opposition. From amongst thousands of similar evidences of the public sentiment of the Northern people, we extract the following paragraph from a speech delivered by General Fremont on the last day of February to a crowded audience assembled in the Cooper Institute, New York. It will be remembered that General Fremont was the Republican candidate for the Presidency in 1856, and that he is at this moment a leading contestant for that prize in the approaching election. As a recognised oracle of the dominant party, and the probable President of the United States in 1865, his deliberately expressed opinions may well be pondered by the rulers of the Mexican Empire in deciding upon the line of policy to be adopted in regard to the two great warring republics. General Fremont said: 'Indications during the past year have led us to infer a disposition towards friendliness on the part of England. This may come in part from an opposition to French policy, and more recently from that necessity for an ally which England begins to feel. But we believe it mainly due to the efforts of this class that she is still in a position to render an alliance between us possible. We recognise this influence in the check it has given to Southern sympathisers among them, and we take pleasure in believing that it has been under pressure of the same influence that England withdrew from all alliance with the attempt to place an Austrian throne upon the ruins of a sister republic—an attempt which shocks the public sentiment of this country, and is eminently hostile to the stability of its institutions.' In the South, on the contrary, up to the present moment, the project for the establishment of the monarchy has met with no opposition from any quarter, and has been received with most decided marks of favour by the great body of the public.

It must be manifest to the most casual observer that the only possible security for the permanence of the new order of things in Mexico will consist in the eventual severance of the South from the North. The Mexican Empire would never have existed but for the determined effort of the South to establish its own independence, and it would perish upon the instant were that struggle to terminate in its resubjugation. The Emperor Maximilian, but for the heroic struggle of the South, would never have been called to the throne of of Mexico, and by Southern valour and Southern successes alone can he maintain his power. To the permanent establishment of that power two things, and only two things, are necessary—First, the independence, and second, the friendship of the South. Not all the resources of the French nation, wielded even by the sagacity of a Napoleon, could perpetuate the monarchy upon the failure of either of these conditions of its existence. Under such a state of incontrovertible facts we may well doubt the rumours to which the recent visit of Maximilian to the Emperor of the French has given rise, to the effect that these two sagacious rulers have entered into an arrangement with the representative of the United States, by which the latter is to offer no opposition to the establishment of the empire, upon conditions agreed to by the former which would place them in an attitude of at least negative hostility to the South. The Government of the United States, under the pressure of present exigencies, may accord a hollow and a deceitful acquiescence in the new order of things, but upon the instant that pressure shall be removed, no effort will be spared to sweep the new empire away, just as the late feeble republic will have been obliterated by the monarchy. Even though the pledges or promises of President Lincoln, implied or expressed, possessed of themselves an intrinsic value, the preannounced policy of his probable successor, made in admitted conformity to the notorious sympathies of the nation, may well cause the Emperor of the French and the new Monarch of Mexico to ponder long before they decide to shape their policy in accordance with the desires of the Federal Government. If, then, on the one hand, they have little of good to hope for, let them consider, upon the other side, that the existence of such a league or understanding as the rumours referred to declare to have been established, would at once and for ever alienate the South, and convert its present kindly feelings towards the new empire into an antagonism as intense and even more irreconcilable than that which now animates General Fremont and the great body of the people of the North.

It is true that nations, like individuals, often seek to make profit out of the misfortunes which befal their neighbours. True, they often lavish their smiles upon powerful enemies, and turn the cold shoulder upon friends whose misfortunes may be supposed to have deprived their friendship of immediate value. But it is a short-sighted policy, even viewed in the mere light of expediency, to adopt such a line of action as, without a reasonable prospect of changing the adversary into a friend, incurs the hazard of converting the friend into an adversary. It is precisely because the policy ascribed to the two Emperors would just as certainly fail in winning the favour of the United States as it would forfeit the friendship of the South now and for ever, that we refuse, without other and more reliable testimony than mere deductions from isolated and possibly unconsidered acts, to credit the existence of the arrangement referred to.

Southerners have been led to regard the establishment of the empire in Mexico with a large measure of favour from two considerations. First, becamse it suggested a well-grounded hope that it would be the means of establishing a stable and well-ordered governments upon the Southern border; and secondly, because they believed that as friends and allies they would be each a mutual protection against the ambitious designs of their powerful neighbour. They believed that the existence of three great Powers in North America would afford a reasonable guarantee for the preservation of a balance of power which would secure each in its own rights and liberty for all. These favourable dispositions were augmented by the reputed ability and general character of the new monarch, and it says much for him that those who knew him best were the most zealous in their efforts to instil these feelings and opinions into the minds of the Southern people. If Maximilian enters upon the discharge of the high trust confided to him animated by similar sentiments, and with a determination to establish and to maintain friendly relations with the Southern Confederacy, the favour with which he is now regarded in the South will ripen into a friendship which will do much to smooth the difficulties of his arduous task. We do not, of course, mean that any alliance between Mexico and the Confederacy should involve either one in the quarrels or the wars of the other. Such an alliance would be not only impolitic but wholly unnecessary, unless in the improbable contingency of their being assailed by a common enemy. In that event they would be allies, not from choice but from necessity. What we mean to say is, that the Emperor of Mexico should maintain a rigid, strict, and impartial neutrality between the North and the South. Whatever relations he may seek to establish with the one he should endeavour likewise to establish with the other. If he invites the one to accredit a diplomatic representative to his Court, he should extend a similar invitation to the other. By these means, and these alone, may he secure the respect of both, and perpetuate the good will which so generally prevails throughout the Confederate States towards him and the great scheme of regeneration with which he is identified.

If it should be believed that the United States would resent such impartial neutrality, it should also be borne in mind that the friendship of the South can be secured in no other way. The latter may not at the present moment be in a condition to resent a slight or an insult, but the former is equally powerless to dictate the policy of the new empire. The United States might, under such circumstances, forget, because they would be in the wrong, while the South could scarcely be expected to forgive an offence which was committed against her in deference to the wishes or the requirements of her enemy. The South is maintaining to-day her heroic struggle for independence, is virtually fighting the battles of at least one nation from which she has met with no return save insult and wrong, accompanied by a constant concession to the arrogant demands of her adversary. It is to be hoped, in the interest of the great cause which has been undertaken by the Emperor of the French and the Archduke Maximilian, that the example of the British Government will not be contagious, and that the policy of those who have assumed the direction of the destinies of Mexico will not be so moulded as to forfeit the friendship of the South by refusing to extend to her the same respectful consideration which may be accorded to the United States. It is not even primarily in the interests of the Confederate States that we desire to witness the adoption of the policy we have indicated. On the contrary, if we consider only the exigencies of the moment, it is impossible to imagine a contingency in which the new Empire of Mexico could afford the slightest aid to the South in her present struggle. But it is in the interests of Mexico, whose continued existence as a monarchy is and must be dependent upon the attitude occupied towards her by the Southern Republic, that we would deprecate a line of conduct which would divert the current of public sentiment in the South into a different and opposite channel from that in which it now flows.

THE NEGRO.

(From the Richmond Examiner, Feb. 25.)

It was officially stated in the last Congress that in all the localities of the Confederacy where the enemy had obtained a foothold, the negroes had been reduced by mortality during the war to not more than one-half their previous number.

The remark has recently obtained not only some striking illustrations, but an official addition to it of the most melancholy interest. The Governor of Louisiana, in his official message, has recently published to the world the appalling fact, that more negroes have perished in Louisiana from the cruelty and brutality of the public enemy than the combined number of white men, in both armies, from the casualties of war. In illustration, he states, that when our forces surprised and captured Berwick's Bay, last summer, they found about two thousand negroes there in a state of the most utter destitution, many of them so emaciated and sick that they died before the tender humanity of the Confederates could be applied to their rescue from death.

The fate of these poor wretches is to be attributed to sheer inhumanity. The Yankees had abundant supplies of food, medicines, and clothing at hand, but they did not apply them to the comfort of the negro, who, once entitled to the farce of 'freedom,' was of no more consequence to them than any other beast with a certain amount of useful labour in his anatomy.

The immoral practice of the enemy in the parts of the Confederacy he has invaded is to separate the families of the blacks without notice. Governor Moore officially testifies to this practice in Louisiana. The men are driven off like so many cattle to a Yankee camp, and are enlisted in the Yankee army. The women and children are likewise driven off in droves, and put upon what are called 'Government plantations'—that is, plantations from which the lawful owners have been forced to fly, and which the Yankees in Louisiana are cultivating.

The Yankees have fairly unmasked to the world their ferocious insincerity on the subject of slavery. Intelligent persons in Europe do not now fail to perceive it; and one of the benefits of this war is that it is developing a statistical and moral defence of our peculiar institution, which sentimentalism will assail in vain, and which the most adventurous representation can never surmount.

MONEY NOT TO BE A DRUG.

(From the Richmond Examiner, Feb. 23.)

The currency has reached its highest inflation. If the laws are but enforced, it must now, at last, begin rapidly to contract its volume. If faithfully executed, the laws just enacted must have the effect of withdrawing from circulation some $800,000,000 of paper money; replacing it with a new currency of only about a third the amount. The future expenses of Government are to be defrayed by taxation and by the sale of bonds; the disastrous practice of paying every debt with new current notes being suspended.

The collection of several hundred millions of dollars from the country cannot but make money scarce and dearer. Prices must soon begin to fall. Speculation has reached its zenith. As many fortunes are now to be lost as have been made during the progress of the late protracted inflation. For a long time speculation has been so safe that a fool could not go amiss, and the veriest dunces who chose to engage in operations on the market made fortunes. Now, the few shrewd ones only will save themselves, and the many simple ones will lose what they have gained.

All this supposes, however, that the laws will be enforced; or more particularly, that the taxes will be speedily and rigidly collected. Happily for the country an energetic exaction of the taxes will effect the highest benefit that Government could confer upon the people. The pecuniary condition of the public, collectively and individually, will be improved by taking from them the principal part of the money in their possession. An operation of this sort performed by the Government on an individual or a class, would be an injury. The same operation performed upon the whole community, by a power other than Government, which would not remove from circulation the money taken, would also be an injury, and be attended by no compensating advantage. But when Government takes away from all alike, and cancels a large portion of the currency, ruined by redundancy, then a positive benefit is conferred—even though the taxation, under other circumstances, would have appeared appallingly oppressive and crushing. If the taxes be faithfully collected, then the people will find that one dollar left will buy as much as three did before—the loss in amount being fully compensated by the gain in value.

The sufferers by the tax and by the contraction of prices and currency will not be the tax-payers—will not be the people; but will be the speculators. These last have had their saturnalia; tribulation is now in store for them. The prudent ones will reef sails and make ready for the storm; the rash and headstrong, spoiled by success, will go into new ventures. Since finance has had a history, contractions of the currency have invariably been attended by collapse and bankruptcy. The contraction about to be witnessed in the circulation of the Confederacy, will bring its harvest of disastrous adventures, crushed hopes, and blasted fortunes. The effect will be as withering as that of frost upon the prurient vegetation of premature spring.

Among the business classes of this city, the prevailing disposition of the moment is to change money into property at very high rates. This temper will not last long. Very soon money will be anything but a drug. By the time a third is taken off the value of all Treasury notes, and the taxes of two years are collected in one payment—taxes as heavy as to be really a forced loan—money will be anything but plentiful. Large numbers of people have little cash on hand. These will have to sell property to raise the means of paying taxes. Much property will be thrown into market at reduced prices. These will decline, and the more promising speculations will shrivel into losses.

When several hundred millions of taxes are to be paid, it is folly to say that Confederate money is of no worth. As it begins to disappear by absorption into the Treasury it will become of great worth, and be in most urgent demand. Then the men who have squandered their funds at fabulous prices upon property which, in former times, they would not have touched at any price, will regret their want of thought and want of sense. How can several hundred millions of taxes be drawn from the people without producing an eager and exhausting demand for money? Money will not long be a drug; it will be the very thing which everybody will want, which everybody must have, which very many will have to buy with property or borrow on mortgage.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

The money market has been comparatively easy during the last few days, and the applications for discount both at the Bank and in the open market have been moderate. At one time there was an expectation that the Bank rate might probably be reduced to-morrow, but some large parcels of gold having been taken off the market to send abroad, it is not now considered likely that any change will be made this week. Still there is a good supply remaining on hand. The brokers are obtaining 5¾ to 5⅞ for the discount of the best bills, and the joint stock banks are making advances at 5¾ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money is rather plentiful, and short loans from day to day have been negotiated at 3 to 4 per cent., but the demand for accommodation having increased, the terms have advanced to 4½ to 5 per cent.

THE NEW MEXICAN LOAN.

The Stock Exchange has been greatly excited, within the last day or two, with reference to the terms and arrangement of the new Mexican loan. Although it will not be formally introduced till after the holidays, it has been officially announced this afternoon that the loan will be for 8,000,000*l.* in a 6 per cent. stock, at the price of 63. The Emperor Maximilian having appointed Messrs. Glyn & Co. as his financial agents, they have arranged with the International Financial Association its issue. It is mentioned that some very important Paris houses will take part in the operation.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this stock has been very firm, again advancing to 54 to 56. This improvement has been followed by a slight relapse, and we close 51 to 53, with but little doing.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion and specie movements continue to be of a very satisfactory character, and as there appears to be increased ease in the money market, the prospects of a speedy reduction in the rate of discount have increased. The amount of gold sent into the Bank this week has been 549,000*l.*, and the withdrawals have been only 40,000 sovereigns for transmission to Alexandria. The arrivals of gold have not been very large, only 78,925*l.*, all from New York. The shipments of specie by the last mail for the East amounted to 175,470*l.*, of which 129,610*l.* was silver, and 45,860*l.* gold. The proportions were as follows: 3,860*l.* for India, 129,610*l.* for the Straits and China, 12,000*l.* for Alexandria, and 30,000*l.* for Mauritius. The silver market has been rather more active, and the bar silver brought by the last West Indian packet has been sold at 61½*d.* per oz., being an advance of ⅛*d.* on previous sales; some large purchases have also been made for Bombay, at 61½*d.* and 61⅝*d.* per oz., in consequence of the nature of the advices from India, Mexican dollars have been in some demand at 5*s.* 3½*d.* per oz. The following gold ships are advised as on their way from Australia:—Jasson, with 64,000*l.*; Great Victoria, with 73,000*l.*; Essex, with 93,000*l.*; Calliance, with 55,000*l.*; Moravian, with 17,000*l.*; and the Agincourt, with 12,500*l.*; being a total of 314,500*l.*

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has been well supported throughout the week; business has been tolerably active, though prices have not exhibited any material variation. Consols closed this evening at 91½ for money, and 91⅝ to 91¾ for the account, which is as nearly as possible the same as on this day week. Exchequer Bills are not quite so good, having receded from 8*s.* to 3*s.* dis. There has been more animation shown in the Foreign Stock Market, where a large speculative business has been transacted in most of the leading descriptions, particularly in Mexican, which have still further advanced about ½ per cent. on the report of the new loan, and the prospect of a satisfactory arrangement of the existing debt. Greek has also been largely dealt in; but the price has declined ½ per cent. Spanish have likewise declined, the Passives ⅞ per cent., and the Certificates ¼. Turkish, on the other hand, have improved about 1 per cent. The final quotations this evening were:—Greek, 23½ to 24; Mexican, 44½ to 45; Spanish Passives, 35⅝ to 35⅞; Do. Certificates, 13⅜ to 13⅝; Turkish 6 per cents. (1854) 93 to 94, and Do. (1862) 71¼ to 71¾.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

In the early part of the week the transactions in American Government and Railway Securities were to a fair average extent; but, within the last two or three days, the advices from America being of an unfavourable character with regard to Federal prospects, business has become nearly stagnant, but, nevertheless, prices are fairly supported. The transactions recorded are as follows:—United States 6 per cents., 61¼; Virginia State, 32¾ and 33; Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, 80; Do. do., Pennsylvania do., 81, 81¼, and 80; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, 66½, 67, and 67½; Illinois Central, 85 and 85½; Do. $100 shares, $90 paid, 15¼; Marietta and Cincinnati Railway, 72; and Pennsylvania Railway, first mortgage, 88 and 88½.

Liverpool: Wednesday, March 23.

The cotton market has presented a more active appearance than for some time past. The demand for both trade and exporters having been to a considerable extent, and stimulating the operations at Manchester, has given more general confidence. During nearly the whole of the week prices have been improving, but to-day there has been less animation, and a decline of about ½*d.* per lb. has taken place. The sales this week have been 39,000 bales, of which 16,500 were on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 421,910 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 370,080 bales. There have been imported this year 336,178 bales, and to the corresponding period last year, 238,770 bales. The exports this year have been 64,710 bales, last year they were 66,657 bales. Taken for consumption this year, 292,000 bales; same period in 1863, 180,300 bales. Taken on speculation this year, 64,270 bales, against 107,780 last year. The computed stocks at the present time are 260,660 bales, in 1863 they were 378,280 bales. By advices from Bombay to 27th ult., we learn that the ships City of Benares and Eagle had been engaged to load cotton for Liverpool, and the exportation for the fortnight had been: Queen of Beauty, with 5,295 bales; Elizabeth Fry, with 4,818 bales; Slieve Donard, with 7,855 bales; Dorothy, with 2,901 bales; Red Jacket, with 5,141 bales; Radnagore, with 3,528 bales; and Eagle, with 3,165 bales, all for Liverpool; the Malvern, with 155 bales, and the St. Hilda, with 1,651 bales, for London; and the Charlotte, with 2,075 bales, for Falmouth. There had also sailed for Liverpool, the Royal Alfred, Eliza Bencke, and Mogul, but as they only cleared on the 26th their cargoes are not given. Forty-one vessels were loading for Liverpool. The closing quotations this evening were: American, 24¾*d.* to 26¼*d.*; Pernambuco, 26¼*d.* to 26¾*d.*; Maranhams, 26*d.* to 27*d.*; Maccio and Bahia, 25*d.* to 25½*d.*; Egyptian, 26½*d.*;

Smyrna, 21⅞*d.* to 23*d.* China, 18*d.* to 18½*d.*; Peruvian, 26¼*d.* to 26½*d.*; and Surats, 13½*d.* to 23⅜*d.*

The Manchester markets have been greatly influenced during the past week by the increasing importations of cotton, and their probable influence on business and prices. These heavy arrivals, in conjunction with the unfavourable commercial advices from Bombay and Calcutta, have seriously affected business. The yarn market has been very quiet, with little or no business doing in shipping descriptions. Spinners, however, having been placed well under contract by the orders obtained during the temporary improvement which took place in the early part of last week, have shown no disposition within the last day or two to press sales. The market is certainly weaker, and to have forced sales, sellers would have had to take lower prices than they accepted last week. In the coarser counts of home trade descriptions prices have again declined. In fine counts there is no material change, but the market is flat. In the cloth market during the last two days business has been unusually flat. There has been an entire absence of business, but a stronger apprehension as to the stability of prices than they have hitherto been willing to acknowledge. Buyers have not only abstained from making purchases, but they have refrained from making any offers as to which there was the least probability of acceptance. The quotations asked are merely nominal. Manufacturers do not hold large stocks, and they do not press sales, and it is the general impression that, were manufacturers desirous of realising, they would be unable to obtain anything like the prices they are asking.

A private letter from a Confederate gentleman at Bermuda, by the last mail, contains the following:—"By recent arrivals from the coast our people are reported to be in fine spirits, making vigorous preparations for the opening of the spring campaign. All the depleted regiments are being rapidly filled, and a spirit of enthusiasm pervades the army, which has reacted most favourably on the whole country. What has transpired in Congress you will have learned from the Northern papers. The restrictions of the exportation of cotton, if carried out, will have an important effect on our credit abroad and on our currency at home. With a little more patience, a little more suffering, a little more hard work, and a favouring Providence, we may soon be able to return to our peaceful homes, and watch the course of retributive justice in other countries. The recent heavy losses of blockade steamers has resulted more from carelessness than any additional hazard. Fortunately none of them fell into the hands of the enemy.

Our readers will remember a story, some weeks ago brought to this country by the Northern papers, of a conspiracy to assassinate President Davis, discovered in Richmond. The story was based upon the arrest, by some officious Richmond policeman, of two vagabond Germans, who appear to have talked treason with a view of getting a night's lodging and a full meal in the town gaol. The Richmond Examiner of Feb. 19 reports their examination before the Mayor, and anything more pitiably inconsistent with the character of conspirators than these two forlorn Teutons, cannot well be imagined. Of course they were dismissed, after having enjoyed a week's board at the expense of the municipal authorities.

THE STEAMER DENBIGH.—We are glad to learn that this steamer, reported to be ashore and a wreck in her late attempt to run out of this port in a fog, is not damaged to the extent supposed. She has been relieved of her cargo, and is now afloat, and is expected up to-day. The enemy's fleet discovering her unfortunate position tried to vent their spite upon her. They succeeded in hitting her but once in her wheelhouse, doing her no damage. She was defended by the guns of Fort Morgan, which succeeded in putting three shots in one of the blockaders and driving the rest off. The enemy's ship that was struck was sent off in the direction of Pensacola, supposed to be disabled. The energy of General Higgins and his command in defending the unfortunate ship is highly commended. Mobile Register.

CAPTAIN JOHN C. CALHOUN, of the 4th Regiment South Carolina Cavalry, exposes, in a card addressed to the Charleston Mercury, a Yankee trick, which for rank absurdity could probably not be matched in the military history of any other nation. It appears to have been long a cherished design to force or to entrap the Confederates into communication with the negro-regiments stationed at various points of the coast, and whom the Confederates decline to recognise as lawful combatants. With this view, in December last, Major Trowbridge, commanding one of these negro regiments, sent a flag of truce under the assumed name of Captain Filler, 55th Pennsylvania, to the nearest Confederate post. Receiving a flag of truce in return, he still personated this fictitious character, and it was only when the business had been transacted, that he avowed his real name and position. Whereupon the Yankee press chuckles over the acuteness which has entrapped the Confederates into officially recognising the officers in command of negro troops.

THE NEGRO IN THE SOUTH.—The severity with which masters treat their slaves in the South may be judged from the statement of Mr. Edward S. Philbrick, Superintendent of cotton lands on St. Helena Island, S. C., published in the New York Post. He had 400 labourers under his charge, and he says: 'Many have done, habitually, double the amount of work they were formerly required to do by their masters in a day, and, as they say, with no more fatigue.' What Northern free labourer could double the amount of work required of him by his employer, and yet remain unfatigued? This report, by the way, though written by a man who is as much of an Abolitionist as is consistent with any practical talent, contains many other facts of importance, which, coming from such a source, are especially valuable. For instance, Mr. Philbrick has found out, contrary to Abolition dicta, but in accordance with all experience, that 'the natural tendency of the freed negro is to rest satisfied with supplying his simple wants, which he can do in the Southern States with a very small amount of labour.' He thinks this may be overcome by a trick analogous to that of fastening a bunch of hay so that it will swing before an ass just out of reach, to make him go on. 'This fault is easily corrected by bringing within his reach, by purchase at low rates, articles which minister to new and civilised wants, stimulating industry for the sake of gratifying his newly acquired tastes.' Mr. Philbrick only needs a little longer experience to satisfy himself that this scheme will not work permanently, or with any certainty.—Boston Courier, March 4.

THE EVANGELICAL TRACT SOCIETY OF THE
SOUTHERN CONFEDERACY, DESIGNED
CHIEFLY TO MINISTER TO THE SPIRITUAL NEED OF OUR NOBLE DEFENDERS,

IS the Representative of all Denominations of Christians, who, through it, lay their Offerings of Piety upon the Altar of Patriotism, and lead the Soldiers of the Country to become the Soldiers of the Cross.

ITS HEADQUARTERS ARE PETERSBURG, VA.,

With Depositories in other Cities, and a numerous Corps of Colporteurs, occupied in Distributing Tracts to our Soldiers in the Army and in the Hospitals.

Organised July 18, 1861, the Society has, from that time to the present, been supplying each Army of the Confederacy with religious reading. About Thirty Millions of pages of Tracts have been distributed amongst our brave soldiers. The seed has not been sown in vain. Numerous letters from Chaplains, Officers, and Privates testify to the great good which has been accomplished, and show that the Society has been instrumental, to a considerable extent, in producing and sustaining the wonderful Revival with which God is now blessing our armies.

'THE ARMY AND NAVY MESSENGER,'

the Society's organ, is the most popular paper in the Army. It has been recommended by General Lee, and by many other eminent Officers, who have contributed to its support. It is, preeminently, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Paper, especially designed to interest and profit them, amongst whom it is gratuitously distributed.

When it is considered that the choicest portion of the country is found in the Army, which will, of necessity, give character to the Confederacy, and control its destiny for years to come, the importance of sustaining this Institution, which seeks to consecrate to CHRIST this mighty influence, cannot be over-estimated.

The expenditure of means it involves is very great, and we respectfully solicit donations for the Society and for the Messenger, from all, everywhere, who have at heart the religious welfare of our Soldiers, and the advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Please send your Contributions to Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, & Co. Liverpool, who will forward them to

BUST OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE only Bust extant of the President of the Confederate States, modelled by Volk, at Richmond, and the most faithful Likeness of this eminent Statesman, has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund of Liverpool. In conformity with the intentions of the donor, the Bust has been registered under the Designs Act, and a number of casts (quarter size), limited to 500, are offered to the public at the following rates:—

Plaster	5*s.* 0*d.*	Carriage free to all parts of the United Kingdom.
Ditto Enameled	7*s.* 6*d.*

The Bust may be seen at the studio of JAMES REDFERN, Esq., 29 Clipstone Street, Fitzroy Square, W., who will also receive orders to execute it in marble; and at the INDEX OFFICE, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The proceeds of the sale of the 500 casts being for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, all orders must be addressed, and money orders made payable, to Mr. HENRY HOTZE, 17 Savile Row, W.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellowmen.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

TWO Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General JACKSON, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. FOLEY, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for 1,000*l.*, while 500*l.* may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for 1,500*l.* a complete Statue of 'STONEWALL' JACKSON, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for 'General JACKSON'S Statue,' at Messrs. COUTTS & Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General JACKSON.

AMERICA.

SOME curious revelations have come to our knowledge about the remonstrance which Her Majesty's Government has announced its intention to address to that of the Confederate States, upon the basis of an alleged Report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy, which is denounced by the Confederates in Europe as a forgery. It will be remembered that the recall of three of the four British Consuls within the Confederate jurisdiction, and the dismissal by the Confederate Government of the fourth and last remaining, left the Foreign Office no alternative but to communicate with the authorities at Richmond by a special envoy. For this delicate mission Mr. Crawford, Her Majesty's Consul-General at Havannah, was selected, and it must be admitted that in this selection Earl Russell displayed far more tact and discretion than he has of late been able to claim credit for. Mr. Crawford, both before and since the war, has been well and favourably known in the Southern States, and is universally esteemed there. Few persons, therefore, could have been found better adapted to discharge so disagreeable a duty without giving offence. Before, however, proceeding in person to Richmond, he was instructed to acquaint the Confederate Government with the nature of his communication, and ascertain whether it would be received. For this purpose the steamer Petrel was sent to a Confederate port; but was peremptorily refused admission by the Federal blockading squadron, on the ground that no direct communication with the Confederate authorities by a foreign Government could be permitted. Here the matter stands at present, and it leaves Earl Russell in no very agreeable or dignified dilemma. It is generally believed in Confederate circles that the object of the Washington Government is to delay as long as possible the official exposure of the forgery, which must inevitably ensue on the presentation of a remonstrance based upon a document to which the name of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy is fraudulently appended.

THE steamer Denbigh, lately reported lost, but subsequently announced as having safely returned to port without material injury, has since succeeded in running the blockade at Mobile, and arrived at Havannah, on March 14, with over 400 bales of cotton in redemption of bonds of the Erlanger 7 per cent. Cotton Loan. This enterprise, which was initiated by the firm of H. O. Brewer & Co. of Mobile, is the first of a series of experiments, on a larger and increasing scale, for exporting the cotton pledged to the redemption of the Confederate three-million loan.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT has been adopted by Mr. Lincoln as the man for the crisis. Halleck is removed from the post of Commander-in-Chief, and assigned to other duties. Two hundred thousand more men have been called for, with the threat of a draft if they are not raised by the 15th of April. General Sherman is to command in the West. Something must be done before the nomination for the Presidency in June.

There are other reasons for extraordinary energy and desperate efforts. Banks, compelled to abandon Texas, is threatened in Louisiana. The failure of the attack on Mobile sets free the armies of Generals Polk and Maury in Mississippi and Alabama. Johnston, at last accounts, was advancing on Chattanooga. The Federals were expecting an attack in North Carolina, and Longstreet, with a large mounted force, appeared to threaten Kentucky.

The veteran troops in the Confederate service are stated, in careful estimates, at 224,000, and 120,000 recently added conscripts make up an army of 344,000 men, better armed, clothed, supplied, and all accounts say with a better morale, than at any former period. The Government of the Confederate States, judging from Southern and Northern statements, was never so strong, the army never so efficient, and the spirit of the people never so united and unconquerable as at the present moment.

THE occurrence of a Presidential Election at the crisis of the war is felt to be so full of danger to the North, that there is a strong disposition to postpone it to a more convenient season; but, though the Republicans might adopt this plan, the Democrats would probably still go to the polls and elect their candidate, who, in due time, would claim admission at the White House. But even if Mr. Lincoln were disposed to adopt the theory of Mr. Seward, and hold over on the plea that he had not yet filled the office of President of the United States, to which a sectional minority elected him, there are other Republican candidates who might not be satisfied with such an arrangement. Mr. Chase has withdrawn, but in a fashion so equivocal and suspicious that no one would be surprised to see his name on the list of candidates at Baltimore. Mass meetings are held and organs established in the interest of General Fremont, who, though not much of a soldier, is not to be despised as a political aspirant. General Banks is strong in New England, while General Butler is considered by many to embody, more completely than any other candidate, the spirit of the war and the ruling popular opinion.

THE 'fire in the rear,' long dreaded by the partisans of the Lincoln Government, grows annoying. The damaging criticisms of the Democratic press upon the conduct of the war, and official corruptions, and despotism, have excited Republican mobs in several places in Ohio and Indiana, some of which have been accompanied, not only with the destruction of newspaper offices, but loss of life. Leading Democratic papers have urged the party to organise for defence and retaliation, and the threatenings of a conflict between the war and peace parties have alarmed the Government. A feeling of bitter hostility is also growing between the West and East, not only among civilians, but in the army. The burdens of war and taxes fall heavily upon the West, while it reaps comparatively few advantages in offices, contracts, and profitable manufactures. Western troops with Eastern officers are disgusted at being employed to guard the plantations on the lower Mississippi, worked by forced negro labour for the benefit of Yankee contractors.

THERE are many indications that the war, during the campaign now commenced, will be conducted with extraordinary vigour; but there is also much reason to dread that it will be conducted with increased ferocity. As a rule, the Southern armies have borne themselves with chivalry and forbearance. They have suffered much—they have seldom retaliated. Contrast the conduct of the Confederate army in Pennsylvania, where General Lee was seen mending a fence with his own hands, and protecting cherry trees, with the miserable raid of Kilpatrick and Dahlgren, whose followers, while contemplating wholesale arson and murder, found time to rob henroosts, pocket spoons, rip open feather beds, tear clothing from little children, and break up the tools of poor mechanics, in their career of crimes from insult and petty larceny to rape and murder. To hope that such deeds will not be revenged—that a vindictive retaliation from a sense of justice will not at some time take the place of forbearance and mercy—is to expect too much of human nature.

The truth is, the two parties engaged in the war have been fighting upon different theories. The South has resisted the North for three years, as an enemy to be repulsed and driven from her soil; but the North has made war upon the South, as upon felons to be punished—as upon men whose rights, liberties, property, and lives were already forfeited—as a nation of outlaws. For their own convenience they have recognised them, to a certain extent, as belligerents, but this recognition has been only partial. According to the Northern theory, they are not citizens of sovereign States and an independent Government fighting for their rights, but rebels on the land and pirates on the sea, against whom every outrage is allowable.

THE failure of the expedition of General Sherman, though apparently not accompanied by any considerable losses in men or artillery, was still one of a very damaging character. It had been prepared with great care and at a heavy expenditure. Picked troops were furnished with light arms and condensed rations. Sixty-four pieces of artillery were made as light and strong as possible. At the end of a twenty days' march, this army found itself at Meridian, the village deserted, supplies removed, General Polk entrenched on the opposite side of the Tombigbee, Montgomery fortified, an army moving to protect Selma, and a large and active cavalry force in the rear. There was nothing left for him but a rapid and not unmolested retreat to Vicksburg.

THE defeat of the Florida expedition was more crushing and humiliating to the Federals than any event of the war since Bull Run and Ball's Bluff, its early disasters. Of the force of five thousand Federals engaged, two thousand five hundred—one-half—were killed and wounded, with a long account of prisoners and missing. The fact that this expedition, utterly useless from a military point of view, was ordered by Mr. Lincoln without consulting his military advisers, in the interest of speculators, and for partisan purposes, is used with great force against him by the organs of the other aspirants to the Presidency.

THE wretched failure of the cavalry raid of Kilpatrick and Dahlgren upon Richmond seems to have involved the Confederate authorities in more difficulty than the scheme ever had of danger. The people and army were filled with an indignation, very natural under the circumstances, and not easy to repress. Hundreds of men, who had dashed upon Richmond with intent to commit rapine, pillage, and murder, were prisoners, and the press and people demanded their punishment. It required all the firmness of President Davis and General Bragg to protect the lives of men who had entertained the deliberate intention of murdering them. There can be no doubt of this intention. Three years ago, the letter envelopes in common use in the Federal army, and throughout the Northern States, had upon them pictorial representations of President Davis hanged by Federal soldiers.

ANOTHER grand failure of recent Federal operations has been that of General Banks's attempt to subjugate Texas. It would have required two hundred thousand men, and the effort to accomplish so vast a work with twenty thousand has been abandoned in despair. General Banks has returned to New Orleans, to defend the small portion of Louisiana which he has formally annexed to the Federal Union, threatened as it was by the whole Confederate army west of the Mississippi.

To the long list of Federal failures, disasters, and disgraces, we have now to add the abandonment of the siege of Mobile by Admiral Farragut. He found the first of a long line of sea defences impregnable, and withdrew, probably to assist in defending New Orleans, threatened by the Confederates from Western Louisiana and Texas. The siege ended before it had been well begun. The best judges consider Mobile impregnable by sea; and no town in America is so well fortified, or would be more bravely defended by land. Every citizen of Mobile between fifteen and fifty-five is a drilled soldier; and the State and city authorities and people have long since determined that it should never share the fate of New Orleans, that it should be defended to the last, and that last should be a heap of ashes.

THE adage—'When rogues fall out, honest men learn the truth'—is receiving a new illustration in the criminations and recriminations among the Presidential candidates in the Federal States. Wendell Phillips denounces Mr. Lincoln; Mr. Blair, brother of the Post-master-General, accuses Mr. Chase of the grossest favouritism and corruption; the organs of Fremont trenchantly criticise General Grant and the general conduct of the war; Pomeroy abuses Lincoln in behalf of Chase; Mr. Seward is accused of having betrayed the country in abandoning the Monroe doctrine; Butler is said to be terrible only to those whom the successes of other generals have enabled him to outrage and plunder; and Meade is accused before a military commission of incompetency and cowardice. The anti-war party of the North listens to all these accusations, and knows the greater part of them to be true.

WHILE the dominions of Butler in South-Eastern Virginia and North Carolina, where he works his wicked will on clergymen, women, and those who are too old and feeble to be in arms against him, grow

Small by degrees, and beautifully less—

while Kentucky is threatened, and Washington is scarcely safe, a great expedition is reported as preparing to ascend the Red River, to conquer a new world beyond the Mississippi. In the metrical prayer which all loyal Britons sing with so much devotion is the pithy petition, 'Confound their politics.' Such a prayer seems to have been answered for the Confederate States. A great army gathered against them is scattered around a circle of three thousand miles, in squads too small to be effective, while any surplus which might act as reserves or reinforcements is sent off on wild-goose chases into Texas, or tom-fool expeditions into the wildernesses of Florida, or beyond the Mississippi. Had the Confederate Government selected the men who guide military affairs at Washington, they could scarcely have been better served. It has been said that General M'Clellan's greatest anxiety was not to injure the Confederates. To all appearance the same might be said with equal justice of Abraham Lincoln and most of his subordinates. Pope, Burnside, Hooker, Rosecrans, Gilmore, Seymour, Butler, Banks, Sherman, Kilpatrick, are names allied with failures, defeats, disasters, and infamies.

The great effort in the North is to get men for soldiers. Federal agents are active in England, Ireland, and Germany, in enlisting emigrants. Raids are made in the South to gather negroes. In General Sherman's late retreat in Mississippi, he took all the able-bodied negro men he could find for the army, leaving the old men, women, and children behind to starve in a ravaged country. In New York negro regiments are sent to the field with high bounties and honours, because a thousand negroes will save from the draft a thousand white men. But as Northern white men avoid or resist the draft, which is used as a threat, but has never been carried out effectively, there now comes a protest in favour of the negro. The Governor of Kentucky protests against the conscription of slaves, and declares that he will enforce the laws of the State against those who take them without the consent of their owners.

The Free State Government, the late mail informs us, has been inaugurated in New Orleans with imposing ceremonies. In the same paragraph we are informed of the death of the wife of General Beauregard in the same city, and that her funeral was made the occasion of a great public demonstration of sympathy. Those who know New Orleans need not be told which demonstration was the more sincere and earnest expression of the real feeling of the people of that city. The late election was a farce, as well as an outrage. The new Governor's loyalty to the North is not without suspicion, and the portion of the State under his jurisdiction contains as many square miles as can be covered by the range of Federal artillery. Three-fourths of the State and people of Louisiana acknowledge the constitutionally elected Governor.

The Federal Government and its favourite officers have the same regard for religious as for civil liberty, and 'run the churches,' in rail-splitting phraseology, wherever they get the opportunity. General Rosecrans has ordered that no religious synod or convention be held in his department the members of which have not taken the oath of allegiance. General Butler banishes a minister who will not pray for the success of Mr. Lincoln.

The City of New York steamer, wrecked at Queenstown, brings New York dates to March 19.

Lieutenant-General Grant has assumed the chief command of the Federal armies, with his head-quarters with the army of the Potomac. General Halleck takes a subordinate position. The plan said to be determined upon for the campaign is a large increase of this army, and a new 'On to Richmond.' Two hundred thousand additional men have been called for by President Lincoln. General Sherman is at Nashville. The siege of Charleston is ineffectual and hopeless, and that of Mobile is abandoned, as has been the conquest of Texas, while the attempt on Florida was a bloody and humiliating defeat, with a Federal loss of more than 1,000 killed and 2,000 wounded and prisoners. The great expedition of General Sherman, consisting of 32,000 men, specially equipped and supplied, against Selma, Montgomery, and Mobile, was defeated by Lieutenant-General Polk with a force of 15,000, and converted into a miserable raid, resulting in the tearing up of railway tracks, burning and plunder of villages, and the stealing of mules and negroes. General Banks was organising a cotton and negro raid up the Red River.

On the other side, it is reported that General Stuart, with 5,000 cavalry, has crossed the Rappahannock, and is threatening the lines of the army of the Potomac; General Longstreet has mounted his forces, and is expected either to invade Kentucky or assist in expelling the Federals from North Carolina; one white and two negro regiments have been captured at Yazoo City; and General Johnston has advanced in strong force to Taylor's Ridge, near Ringgold. 'The entire South,' says a correspondent of the New York World, 'is now bracing up for a new encounter, which, I am afraid, will be more terrible and bloody than any one recorded in the three years just elapsed.'

Great meetings at New York have nominated General M'Clellan and General Fremont for the Presidency, on widely-varying platforms; but the partisans of both agree in denouncing the present Administration.

A great Confederate conspiracy is said to have been discovered in Kentucky, and many persons arrested for organising forces for the Southern armies. The Governor of Kentucky threatens to resist the conscription of negroes.

ENGLAND.

Mr. O'Leary, the chivalrous knight who, with 100 followers mounted on 100 steeds, desired to stand in the gap against 80,000 Austrians and Prussians, and save the glory and integrity of Denmark, has been frustrated in his hopes of renown. The Grand Marshal of the Court at Copenhagen has conveyed in the loftiest terms the thanks of his Royal master to Mr. O'Leary and his noble companions. At the same time it is intimated that the bravery of the Danish army will compensate for want of numbers. The disappointment to the captain of the Irish 'Cent Gardes' must be grievous, yet a noble charger, purchased at the cost of 125 guineas by devoted followers may sooth the sorrow of their leader. Indeed, it is asserted that 'the gallant chief does not abandon the hope of realising his dreams of glory.' To speak seriously it seems to us a matter of regret that a project singularly Quixotic from the number and nature of the proposed force should have been intruded on the public notice. The struggle in which Denmark is engaged is not child's play. The Danish troops are men and the sooner the ridiculous enterprises of the O'Learys cease to excite laughter or a sneer, the better will those minds be satisfied which contemplate with deep anxiety the Danish crisis.

> Non cauponantes bellum, sed belligerentes;

On Easter Monday, the volunteers held their grand annual field day, and, despite the horrible weather and the contracted nature of the ground selected for the manœuvres, covered themselves with glory. This year Guildford, in Surrey, about thirty miles from London, was the favoured town, and Blackheath the chosen field. The South-Western Railway carried one-half of the army to Guildford Station, and the South-Eastern carried the other half to Chilworth. Large numbers of the volunteers went down into Surrey on the Saturday and Sunday, and took by storm every available room and house in the neighbourhood of Guildford. In vain the general in command at Aldershott desired to send a force of regular cavalry. No quarters could be found for either men or horses, and the idea was abandoned. However, on Saturday, Captain Jay's mounted troop of the Hon. Artillery Company arrived, having ridden the whole way from London, and brought with them their two brass 6-pounders. Nine hours were occupied in that journey. On the same day detachments of Sussex Artillery, with their heavy guns of position, came from Brighton. On the Sunday there was a parade, and special service at St. Nicholas' Church. On Monday morning the trains began to leave London about 6.30 a.m., but it was not till after mid-day that the troops were placed in position. The Heath was approachable only by a few lanes remarkable for steepness and sandiness. Enormous difficulty was found in dragging up the 18-pounders and 24-pounders of Lord Truro's artillery battalion. When in position the defending force showed a host of 9,750 men in four brigades, with ten 18-pounder guns, under the command of Major-General Russell. Lord Raneleagh, Colonel Lloyd Lindsay, V.C., Earl Grosvenor, and Lord Radstock were the brigadiers. The attacking force consisted of 8,500 men, with Captain Jay's horse, four 6-pounders, four 18-pounders, and four 24-pounder guns of position, under the command of Major-General Rumley. Lord Colville, Colonel Bigge, Lord Bury, and Colonel Macdonald were brigadiers. The whole force was under the command of Lieutenant-General Pennefather, K.C.B. The field of operations was but one mile and a half long and one mile wide. Just as the fight was about to commence the weather set in with furious alternations of rain, hail, and snow, without however damping in any way the ardour of the combatants. The fight itself was one tremendous roar of musketry and artillery at close quarters. General Rumley made a feint attack on the enemy in front with 4,000 men, while his main body of 5,000 men made a flank march under cover of the woods, and fell with tremendous energy on the extreme right of General Russell. The latter general brought up with all possible alacrity every available regiment to oppose the furious onset of the enemy. This attack had been well concealed, and when fully developed was almost in the nature of a surprise. The withdrawal of force from the left to the right of General Russell induced the feint attack to become a reality, and the battle became general throughout the whole line, the defending force changing front to avoid being completely outflanked. The battle lasted about two hours, and at the close of it the whole force marched past in columns of companies. The railways succeeded in bringing the men home before midnight.

The corps of Commissionnaires has now been established for five years. Of the utility of the institution it is superfluous to speak. The most trustworthy of messengers, the most obliging, civil, and pleasant of men are the gallant old soldiers, who in their neat uniforms stand in the principal streets in London, ready to give information for nothing, and to carry messages and parcels at most moderate charges. Five years ago the prudent and benevolent founder of the corps selected seven men, and commenced his experiment. He drew up a stringent set of rules for the discipline of his men, formed them into a kind of military club, gave them an organisation, and neglected neither their physical nor their mental welfare. An occasional hour or two devoted to the supervision of the corps was all the time required at his hands, and that he gave freely, and of course without remuneration. Now, the corps numbers 250 men, and the excellent founder finds himself chained to a desk for eight hours daily. There are barracks for the single men of the corps; there is a band, a salaried adjutant, and a sick fund. The corps owes nearly 1,000*l.*, but that sum is guaranteed by the founder's friends. Now, therefore, it is proposed to start the corps on its full career. It is an increasing force; it must be organised on an expansive principle, and it requires able supervision. Seven officers of high distinction, of whom three are generals and four are colonels, have consented to act as provisional trustees for receiving and investing subscriptions for the endowment of the staff necessary to carry on the discipline of the corps. The expenses of such staff will be about 350*l.* per annum. As to the management, subscribers of 10*l.* are to be life governors, and regiments subscribing 25*l.* are to be perpetual governors. The future trustees are to be elected triennially, and are to choose the commanding officer.

We sincerely hope that the public will come forward and help this excellent undertaking. The great city firms, public companies, and public institutions cannot afford now to lose those services, which are rapidly becoming indispensable, and which certainly cannot be replaced by the substitution of other men of equal integrity and aptitude.

The coroner for the county, on Wednesday, March 24, and the following day, held his inquest on the bodies that perished in the Sheffield inundation, at the Town Hall, in Sheffield. Mr. Robert Rawlinson and Mr. Nathaniel Beardmore, the civil engineers, appeared on behalf of the Home Office. M. Mille, the engineer of bridges and roads to the French Government, and other distinguished engineers and officers of public companies, were also present. Mr. J. S. Leather, of Seventhorpe, near Leeds, the consulting engineer to the Sheffield Waterworks Company, Mr. John Gunson, the acting engineer, Mr. Matthew B. Jackson, of Sheffield, civil and mechanical engineer, and Messrs. Rawlinson and Beardmore, were examined as scientific witnesses. The jury, after an enquiry of considerable length, gave an opinion that 'there had not been that engineering skill and that attention to the construction of the works which their magnitude and importance demanded; that in their opinion the Legislature ought to take such action as would result in a governmental inspection of all works of this character, and that such inspection ought to be frequent, regular, and sufficient; and that they (the jury) could not separate without expressing their deep regret at the fearful loss of life which had occurred from the disruption of the Bradfield Reservoir.' Mr. Leather and Mr. Gunson were in considerable doubt as to the cause of the accident, but thought that it was caused by a slip in the ground. However, Mr. Jackson, who built the Melbourne, Adelaide, Ballarat, and Bendigo Works, gave a decided opinion, and held that the structure of the dam caused an unequal pressure, fractured the pipes, and so produced a leakage. It appeared also that there had been some departures from the specifications, and on this point the coroner made some strong remarks. Mr. Leather doubted very much the theory advanced by Mr. Jackson, and thought that the confidence of that gentleman alone made the idea worthy of some credit.

Intelligence has been received of the cruel treatment of an English missionary, by Theodore, king of Abyssinia. Mr. Stern, Mr. Rosenthal, and Mr. Haussman, on their return from the Jewish Palashas, called to take leave of the king. It was contrary to the etiquette of the court to receive persons at so late an hour, and matters were further complicated by the stupidity of the interpreters. These last were ordered by the king to be at once flogged, and Mr. Stern, in fright and horror at the sight, made a gesture which was interpreted as an insult, and for which he also paid the penalty of a severe flogging. The unhappy missionary was then put into chains, and the efforts of the English consul, Captain Cameron, were vainly used in exhorting the king to release Mr. Stern. Eventually the king allowed Mr. Haussman to depart, and the latter arrived at Khartoun, and announced the situation of his brother missionary.

The Earl of Aberdeen died on Tuesday, March 23, at Haddo House, Aberdeenshire, in the forty-eighth year of his age. He succeeded his father in the year 1860. His eldest son is now in New Brunswick, of which colony the Hon. Arthur Gordon, brother of the late Earl, is Governor.

Lord Ashburton died on Wednesday, March 24. He was born in 1799, and his mother was the eldest daughter of Mr. William Bingham of Philadelphia. His father was Ambassador to America in 1842.

Lord Sidmouth died on Friday last at Albury, near Guildford. He was the son of Henry, first Viscount, who was for twelve years Speaker of the House of Commons, and who succeeded Pitt as Prime Minister in 1801. His Lordship is succeeded in the peerage by his son the Hon. William Addington, M.P. for Devizes.

The steamer City of New York, on her passage from New York, struck upon Daunt's Rock, at the entrance of Queenstown Harbour. The accident occurred about 2.40 a.m., on Tuesday last. The ship was steaming 14 knots an hour at the time. The crew and passengers were saved. Some of her cargo, which is chiefly cotton, will probably be saved, but the vessel will become a total wreck.

The Archbishop of Canterbury has addressed a Pastoral Letter to the clergy and laity containing a public declaration of his opinion on the theological questions involved in the late judgment of the Privy Council in the case of Dr. Williams and Mr. Wilson ('Essays and Reviews'). His Grace holds that 'the Church authoritatively declares Holy Scripture to be identical with all those canonical books of the Old and New Testament of whose authority was never any doubt in the Church that it is "the Word of God," and "God's word written;" and that by the term "canonical books," is meant books which lay down a rule of faith authoritatively.' He holds that the opinions of Dr. Williams are at variance with the terms of those formularies. So also he says that Mr. Wilson, when asserting that there are parts of Scripture which are not the Word of God, contradicts the same teaching. On the question of eternal punishment, the Primate maintains that the doctrine of the Church of England is that the reward of the righteous is everlasting life, and the punishment of the wicked everlasting death. The obscurity of Mr. Wilson's expressions on the point caused the Primate to give a decision favourable to him on this part of the accusation. The Pastoral Letter, which is of considerable length, concludes with an eloquent exhortation.

An ancient and peculiar custom received its due celebration on Maunday Thursday. The royal charities were on that day distributed to forty-five aged men and forty-five aged women in Whitehall Chapel, with the customary ceremonials, the number of each sex corresponding with the age of Her Majesty the Queen. A special service was held, and between the anthems the Lord High Almoner (the Bishop of Oxford) gave to the recipients donations of clothing and other articles. The purses formed the most peculiar feature in the series of gifts. Each red purse contained the usual gold sovereign, and 30*s.* from the Lord Steward's Department; each white purse contained the Maunday coin, consisting of 4*d.* 3*d.* 2*d.* and pence in silver, amounting to forty-five in all, thus representing the age of the Queen. About 1,000 other persons were also relieved by the Lord High Almoner in the same week.

Our readers will learn with much pleasure that the Queen has announced her intention of holding a court at Buckingham Palace, on Wednesday, April 6, to receive the principal members of the diplomatic corps. A second Court will be held on April 13, at which the distinguished personages of the realm will have an opportunity of paying their respects to Her Majesty. In the months of May and June two state concerts and two state balls will by command of the Queen take place at Buckingham Palace. Her Majesty's birthday will be celebrated on May 24.

The managers of the theatres have duly bestirred themselves to meet the demands of the pleasure-seeking crowds of Easter. Four important theatres rely so confidently on their existing arrangements as to offer no novelty to the public. Mr. and Mrs. C. Mathews still appear in the 'Golden Fleece' at St. James's; 'Bel Demonio' still draws at Mr. Fechter's theatre; 'The Ticket-of-Leave Man' fills the Olympic; and best of all, Miss Bateman fails not to move the crowded audiences with her admirable Leah. But Drury Lane, the Haymarket, the Strand, Princess's and Astley's have put on an entirely new appearance. At the Haymarket Theatre, Mr. F. C. Burnand has produced a mythological extravaganza, called 'Venus and Adonis,' with his wonted success, and has once more proved the good use made by him of his Eton acquaintance with the whole family of Olympic Divinities. 'A Hunt for a Husband' at the Strand, a new comedietta by Mr. J. P. Wooler, is worthy of commendation, as also is Mr. J. M. Morton's new farce, 'Drawing-rooms, Second Floors, and Attics;' but the most remarkable effect is that exhibited at Drury Lane. There 'Henry IV.' 'revived' is marvellously good, for Mr. Phelps in the character of Falstaff is at any time or place attractive enough, but here the art of Mr. Beverley has added scenic ornaments of no mean kind. The chef-d'œuvre of the artist is the Battle of Shrewsbury. The stage is divided from back to front by a large solid mound, and there the opposing armies meet. The multitude is not small, the shock is terrific, and the confusion that results is admirably worked out.

On Easter Monday the usual places of amusement were extensively patronised by the holiday people. The Crystal Palace, Zoological Gardens, Polytechnic, and the Alhambra had their full share of visitors. Madame Tussaud's was of course crowded, and we may mention that to that exhibition the President of the Confederate States, Mr. Mason, and Mr. Slidell are now added.

The Covent Garden Theatre opened on Tuesday night with Bellini's 'Norma,' and the part of Norma was played with success by Mademoiselle Emilia Lagrua. Signor Nandin sang the music of Pollio with energy, and Signor Atry was admirable as Oroveso. Mr. Costa of course conducted with his usual ability.

THE CONTINENT.

The German diplomats have seized with avidity on a principle enunciated by Lord Castlereagh in 1814, that 'the varying effect of the military movements must tend continually to modify the diplomatic aspect.' This means, 'when biled and the skin took off it,' as Sam Slick says, that if the Allies take Düppel and Fredericia, they will demand harder conditions than if Denmark had at once agreed to an armistice. 'In fact,' they say, 'what do we want with a Conference, with or without armistice? These fortresses once taken, we are secure from Danish annoyance, and can discuss the question with other European Powers at our leisure.' The offer made by Denmark to negotiate on the basis of the treaties of 1852 is rejected by the Germans with scorn. They say (and from their point of view it is not without reason) that it is absurd to take for a basis of a Conference the very treaties which that Conference is to discuss; the high discussing parties might find themselves as summarily disposed of as was the Irishman of old who sat on the branch of a tree and sawed it off from the trunk. The address of the King of Denmark, on the close of the Rigsdag, does not point to any diminution of the determined spirit which has, up to this time, prevailed in His Majesty's councils. It comments on the exactious and tyrannical regulations of the Allies in the Duchies, confesses that Denmark at present stands alone in Europe, and concludes with these words: 'We are ready to do anything to obtain a peace which would be serviceable to the country; but our enemies must be aware that the time is still distant when we or our people can be compelled to submit to a peace humiliating to Denmark. The last word of your King to you and your constituents is Endurance.'

While the views of the two belligerent parties are of this nature, it is evident that no Conference on definite bases can take place; the choice lies between the proposal of the English Government and an indefinite prolongation of the war. Both alternatives are subject to the same risk of further complication through the obstinacy of the belligerents and the intrigues of neutrals; but in favour of the British proposition there is at least a glimpse of hope, which is entirely wanting in the gloomy prospect of indefinite war. We are not sorry, therefore, to know that the English proposal has been definitely accepted by Denmark, Austria, and Prussia; France has also given in her adhesion; the answer of Sweden has not yet been received, while the Federal Diet has referred the proposal, as usual, to the Slesvig-Holstein Committee. The Conference is to be held in London, and will begin on April 12.

The Danes complain bitterly of the exactions and requisitions made on the people of Jutland by their invaders. Kolding alone has been compelled to pay 20,000 rigsdalers daily as a contribution to the expenses, while the troops are billeted on the inhabitants without scruple. Not content with this, the Allies have thought fit to pursue in Jutland a course exactly similar to that whereby they hope to Germanise the Duchies; the Danish municipal officers are all expelled and replaced by Germans or German sympathisers. What excuse can be made for such a proceeding within the boundaries of Denmark proper, we are at a loss to conjecture.

On the 17th inst. the allied forces captured the position of Avnbjerg, a place of so much strategic importance that an energetic attempt was made on the following day to retake it, but without success. The bombardment of the earthworks continues: our Sebastopol experience has taught us how long we may batter at earthworks without producing any impression. On Sunday, the 20th inst., the bombardment of Frederica ceased, only to begin again on the 21st with renewed vigour. The town has been set on fire by the shells in various places. The Prussians have profited by the lessons given by America, France, and England in both the theory and practice of gunnery. Their rifles are more effective than those of the Danes; their cannon carry further and straighter, and hit harder. We have it now on undoubted authority that the Skjold, one of the armour-plated frigates engaged in the affair off Rugen, mentioned in our last, was penetrated by the Prussian guns, although no further damage was done.

The Austrian Commandant has informed the Captain of the Danish ship stationed off Horsens that the first shot fired from his ship would be the signal for the destruction and pillage of the town.

The Prussians have resuscitated an old and somewhat barbaric form of armament. They have 22 galley gunboats now ready to take the sea, and awaiting only the inspection of the Prince-Admiral. Their office will be the defence of the northern coasts, though their utility against the very minimum of steam power is doubtful.

The good-natured attempt of certain Irish gentlemen to embroil this country with the Austro-Prussians by offering their services to the King of Denmark has been frustrated. His Majesty thanks them, and hopes to get on very well without them.

On the 28th inst., at 3 A.M., an attack was made by the Prussians along the whole line of the Dybbol (or Düppel) works. The Germans were completely repulsed with heavy loss. The iron-clad Rolfe Krake took an effective part in the contest.

The Prussian Ministers for Foreign Affairs, Marine, and Commerce, have officially declared that the blockade of the ports of Stralsund, Wolgast, Barth, Greifswalde, Camenin, and Swinemunde has not yet been carried out. This declaration is somewhat remarkable. It raises the important question whether such a declaration made by the blockaded power is sufficient to make the blockade invalid as regards neutrals. Moreover, we may ask, who are to be the jury to determine on the truth of the facts stated? Surely not the blockaders, nor the blockaded? And of the neutrals, who are sufficiently disinterested to decide? Satisfactory answers to these questions would be of the utmost value on both sides of the Atlantic.

The propositions made by the King of Sweden to his Norwegian Parliament involve (1) permission to make use of the Norwegian Militia and coast-fleet (the national fleet is already at the command of the Sovereign), and (2) a credit of 800,000 rigsdalers (about 180,000*l.*), $500,000 for immediate use, and $300,000 to be ready on application. The necessity for these demands arises, according to the Royal speech, from the state of affairs in Denmark, which may at any time require military action from other Powers. The propositions have been referred to a Select Committee of the House, which has reported in favour of the whole of them. The Scandinavian kingdom has for some time been the only Continental power remaining in a peaceful attitude; now every nation of Europe stands with hand on hilt, awaiting the signal.

The Polish National Government has published a circular levying an income-tax of 1 per cent. for the relief of the families of those who have been or may be killed during the revolutionary war.

The number of those transported to Siberia since the beginning of the troubles is upwards of 23,000. The crime for which many of these unfortunate people suffer is that of refusing to confess that they have paid taxes to the Revolutionary Government.

The new Civil Governor of the Kingdom of Poland is M. Milutyne; the Minister of the Interior is the Prince Tscherkaskoï; neither of these gentlemen has ever been in Poland, or has any personal knowledge of the people whom he is appointed to govern. A letter from Vienna states that the number of persons crossing the Galician frontier to support the national cause in Poland is daily increasing; this arises from the active surveillance of the Austrian police, which drives all persons conscious of suspicion to take a decided course rather than expose themselves to extradition (i.e. banishment by the Russians into Siberia), or 'internment' (imprisonment by the Austrians in a remote fortress). It is, however, positively denied that the Austrian police have delivered into the hands of the Russians any Polish political refugees whatever.

The departure of the Archduke Maximilian and his spouse had been fixed to take place on the afternoon of the 23rd inst. A sudden but slight indisposition of His Imperial Highness has made it necessary to defer the event. A family council has been held by the Emperor of Austria, in which the rights of succession and reversion belonging to the Archduke have been definitely regulated.

The Government of Juarez still continues to assert a sort of existence; at least, Juarez himself has issued a statement denying in set terms that he has abdicated, or even thought of doing so. The Yankees have so far swallowed the bitter pill of a Mexican Empire as to admit a 'commercial' agent acting under the directions of the Imperial Government—but commercial, purely commercial.

The address of General Santana to the people of Mexico, declaring his adhesion to the new Government, has had a very good effect.

The Italian navy consists of 31 screw steamers, 36 paddle-wheels, 14 iron-clads, and 18 sailing-vessels. The steam-power is calculated at 26,030 horses, the guns at 1,324, the crews at 21,930. Six iron-clad frigates are now on the stocks, besides several wooden ships. Six other iron-clads are expected in the course of the year from France and America; thus in a few months the Italian fleet will be double that of the Austrian.

From Sicily we continue to receive glowing reports of the reception of Prince Humbert. The Bourbonist partisans exploded some of their favourite bombs at Palermo during his visit, but several of their fraternity have been arrested. A small Bourbon demonstration appears also to have taken place at Naples on the occasion of the King's birthday; an ex-officer of the Bourbon army was stopped, and a copy of sentence of death on the King and others found on his person.

Prince Humbert has returned by sea to Genoa, where he was received with due honours on the 24th inst.

The Italian journals are prolific in speculations on the object of Garibaldi's voyage. First they calculated with anxiety the chances of his changing ship at Malta; and the Italia, which was so fortunate as to predict that such a change would occur, announces the fact with all the pomp of a successful Derby prophet. Next come speculations as to the time he will spend on his voyage—2,133 miles, at ten miles an hour, such is the sum which the same journal proceeds to work out with the utmost gravity. Finally, what is he about to do in England? Well, some say he wants to see a doctor; perhaps he wishes to thank Dr. Partridge for the benefit he has derived from that physician's accurate judgment. Others think of that mysterious campaign terminated at Aspromonte, and wonder whether the purses which supplied the funds then are again to be laid under contribution.

The Austrian practice of removing troops as far as possible from the districts where they were recruited is well known. Thus there are no Italian soldiers in Venetia. A legend of Solferino tells us that two battalions of that country might have changed the fate of that day had they not refused to fire at a most critical moment. The authorities have taken the hint, and found work for them elsewhere. Their place is filled by Croats, Tyrolese, and Uhlans. The inspection of the fortresses and troops in Venetia is careful and incessant. Arrangements are being made with the proprietors of land immediately adjacent to the fortresses with regard to the demolition of buildings, felling of trees, &c., which may be necessary.

The Pope had on the 19th inst. so far recovered from his illness as to be able to give a formal reception to M. de Sartiges, the French Ambassador. After the reception the Ambassador made a state visit to the shrines in St. Peter's, and concluded by paying his respects to the Dean of the Sacred College at his apartments in the Quirinal Palace; the eminent Cardinal escorted His Excellency back to his carriage in person, and shut the door of it, according to traditional usage, with his own sacred hands. Who can doubt that such humility on the part of a Cardinal must have blotted out of the mind of M. de Sartiges the snappishness of His Eminence Antonelli and the insolence of Monsignor de Merode?

Advices from Santo Domingo inform us that an engagement came off, on February 6, between the Royal troops under General Suero and the rebels, and again another on the 9th, in both of which the insurgents were worsted.

The Spanish Senate, in discussing the proposed reform of the Constitution in that country, has negatived the amendment of the Marques de Miraflores, proposing to leave undisturbed the hereditary peerage.

A story from Port-au-Prince (Santo Domingo) enables us to judge of the natural African character better than we can, perhaps, from the civilised specimens of the plantations. Four labourers and four washerwomen, all negroes, have been apprehended on the horrible charge of having murdered and cut up a child according to the rites of their fetish or Obi. They have been condemned on their own confessions, and were executed on February 13.

The Queen of Spain has conferred upon Christian IX., King of Denmark, the dignity of the Golden Fleece. We may remind our readers that there is another Sovereign who claims the disposal of this Order—namely, His Imperial Royal and Apostolic Majesty of Austria. It is to be feared that the throat of the King of Denmark would have been long destitute of the noble Fleece but for the timely intervention of the Queen of Spain.

Of all the national monuments in the world, there are few that equal, and none that surpass, the tomb of the Emperor Napoleon I. at the Invalides. Not less in the magnificent sculptures and surrounding ornaments than in the idea which they are intended to embody does the immortality of genius combine and sympathise with the coldness of death; and the chance visitor may stand for hours gazing upon the stern impassive faces of the angels which surround the tomb, till the chill of the snowy marble creeps into the very marrow of his bones. To this tomb a pendant has been added by the filial piety of the Prince Napoleon-Jérôme, in the shape of a mausoleum to the memory of his father, the late Prince and ex-King Jérôme. Report speaks highly of the execution of the work; it must, indeed, be of the highest order to match the last resting-place of the Great Emperor. The mausoleum stands in the Chapelle Saint-Jérôme, the same in which, a few years ago, the body of the Emperor lay under the flicker of one funeral lamp, and surrounded by the flags of Austerlitz.

Our neighbours beyond the Straits have not the horror of fairs which is the fashion in this country. Thursday, the 24th inst., was the last day of the Ham Fair, which is held in the middle of Paris, lasts several days, is a source of much edification to the flâneurs, and, we hope, a great economy to the good housewives; on Easter Sunday comes the turn of the children—fifteen days of gingerbread fair! What a prospect for mothers, children, and doctors!

A trial has just been concluded at Aix, in the South of France, which bids fair to be remembered within the French nation as a cause célèbre, and in foreign lands as an extreme specimen of criminal justice in France. The facts on which the trial arose were simply these. On the 7th July last, a man of the name of Maurice Roux, servant to a wealthy merchant in Montpellier of the name of Armand, was found in a cellar of M. Armand's house, lying on the ground, his hands tied behind his back, a cord round his neck, and his feet fastened together by a handkerchief marked with M. Armand's initials. His life being despaired of, he was taken to the hospital, but when there he quickly revived, and the first use he made of his tongue was to accuse M. Armand of attempting to murder him, in revenge for certain disrespectful words and the neglect of some trifling duty. On this accusation, M. Armand was committed for trial at the assizes; popular feeling being decidedly against him, the police followed an example set them lately in England, and transferred the 'venue' from Montpellier to Aix. The presiding Judge was M. Rigaud; the Procureur-Général prosecuted; M. Jules Favre, famous for his independence alike at the bar and in the Chamber of Representatives, was for the defence. The sparring between the opposing counsel began early. The Procureur-Général stated his case: Armand is rich, insolent, brutal to his inferiors; he deliberately sought out his servant in the cellar in order to murder him. M. Jules Favre can bear it no longer, and appeals to the Court whether these statements are to be allowed, taking for granted the very acts of which the prisoner is now accused: he is informed by the judge that he has now no right to criticize, and the prosecutor continues as before. The judge adjures the prisoner to confess his guilt, sneers at his feelings, allows the evidence of the magistrate by whom the prisoner was committed to be taken in spite of the remonstrances of M. Favre, suffers the accuser, Roux, to insult the prisoner in open court, cuts short or explains away all evidence in favour of the accused—in short, takes the accuser completely under the protecting ægis of the magisterial robe. In spite of all these endeavours, however, M. Armand is acquitted by the jury after a consultation of twenty minutes.

One might have thought that a man found 'not guilty' of a crime was also not answerable for any further consequences of it. Not so in France. On the next day a civil action, brought by Roux against Armand, was tried, wherein the damages were laid at 50,000 francs. The Court found that the defendant had 'struck and wounded' the plaintiff, and sentenced him to pay the sum of 20,000 francs. It appears that the verdict of the jury had negatived only the criminality of the accused, not the occurrence of the act. It is most satisfactory to know that the educated classes in Paris reprobate in the strongest terms the conduct of the Judge of the Assize Court at Aix.

Tennyson somewhere tells us that 'he keeps but a man and a maid, ever ready to slander and steal.' He is by so much better off than the Duke of Brunswick, who keeps four men and a maid for the embellishment of his person, besides a head valet; as to their capacities for stealing, we need only carry our recollections back to the month of December last, when his servant Shaw was so very nearly successful in getting clear off with all the far-famed diamonds of the Duke on his person, and was condemned to twenty years' penal servitude in consequence. However, it appears that the Duke had had occasion to make the Laureate's complaint even before that time, and that Shaw was himself a substitution for one Morin, who had been discharged from the Duke's service, at an hour's notice, with some suspicions of dishonesty. The affair has come up in consequence of an action brought by Morin against the unlucky Duke for the sum of 100 francs wages due, the restitution of his box and papers now detained by his late master, and 200 francs damages for loss of time. The Duke's defence was that certain property placed in the hands of the plaintiff, and lost while so intrusted to him, was of greater value than the arrears of wages, together with the valet's box and its contents. The Courts, however, have decided against him, and the head of the Imperial Royal Ducal House of Guelph has been condemned to pay 600 francs and costs to his ex-valet.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

Confederate States of America,
War Department:
Richmond, November 26, 1863.

To His Excellency Jefferson Davis, President C.S.A.

Sir,—I have the honour to submit the following report:—

During the past year the war has raged with increased violence, and on a more extended arena. From Central Pennsylvania to Southern Texas, the shock of arms has been felt in many battles, on a grand scale, and in numberless engagements, varying from the conflicts of thousands to the skirmishes of a few.

Such extended warfare, as was almost inevitable, from the superior numbers and more abundant resources of the enemy, has been chequered by some reverses, as well as illustrated by not a few brilliant victories and glorious achievements.

These events are, at the same time, too vivid in remembrance, and too near in occurrence, to make needful or appropriate their full recital. To illustrate the sustained glory of our arms, it will fully suffice to recall, in the east, the victory, against all odds of numbers and position, at Chancellorsville, the capture of Winchester, the invasion of Pennsylvania, closing with the grand but indecisive battle of Gettysburg, where the glorious successes of two days' combat barely failed on the third of being crowned by a crushing defeat to the enemy, and inflicted such heavy loss as enabled our gallant army, with many of the ends of the movement accomplished, to retire unassailed and defiant within our limits.

In the south, the complete repulse at Charleston, in the spring, of the grand attack by sea, made with the plated ships and guns of unprecedented calibre and range, which the arrogance of the foe imagined must overpower all resistance, has been followed, in the renewed attack, conducted now by land and sea, by the bloody repulse at Wagner and Sumter, which last, reduced to a pile of crumbling ruins, yet harbours resources and heroic men, that keep in distant awe and impotent malignity the enemy, with all his ingenuity of land and naval war.

In the far west, beyond the Mississippi, the valour and patriotism of our soldiers have been signalised by achievements which, though on a less grand scale, lose not in glory by comparison with any triumphs of the war. If we have, then, to report the loss of the Arkansas Post, and the repulse at Helena, we have to glory in the hard-fought battle of Prairie Grove; at the skilful evasion of an overpowering force in Lower Louisiana; the steady resistance and judicious strategy that enabled a force wholly inadequate to a direct encounter yet to harass, pursue, and finally to expel the hordes of the enemy. Then at the brilliant success of Brashear City, Milligan's Bend, and many minor affairs that asserted again the supremacy of our arms in Western Louisiana.

Texas, meantime, has been preserved intact, feeling the step of the foe only to expel him with shame and blood in the repulses at Galveston and Sabine Pass, which, for the results obtained by limited means, have been rarely matched in history.

The gravest reverses of the year have been sustained by us in Mississippi, and resulted in the capture of Vicksburg and Port Hudson, with their garrisons; in the partial command, by the enemy, of the Mississippi river, and the temporary evacuation of Jackson, the capital of the State, by our remaining forces. Yet these were, to the enemy, bloody acquisitions, and to us errors not unredeemed by much of glory and vengeance. Port Hudson and Vicksburg, by the gallantry and constancy of their defence, fully sustained the renown of their previous deeds; and the repeated efforts of the vastly superior forces of the enemy to snatch their prizes by violence, ended only in fearful loss and shameful rout. Our brave soldiers succumbed only to privation and exhaustion. And whatever may have been the loss to the country, they, at least, lost not honour.

The campaign in Mississippi was certainly disastrous; and with the forces and resources collected in the State, it is difficult to resist the impression, that the disasters were not inevitable. Their causes, and whether attributable to any deficiencies in prescience, skill, or valour, on the part of either commanders or their troops, it is felt to be inappropriate here to discuss, as, under a just sense of what is due to all concerned as well as to the Confederacy, a court of enquiry has been instituted to make full investigation of the whole campaign. It met; but its session has, in consequence of military events occurring in its vicinity and demanding the presence of witnesses and judges at other points of duty, been temporarily suspended. It is, however, expected soon to resume and complete its enquiries. Justice requires judgment to be suspended by all, until, from such acknowledged authority, facts and conclusions can be attained.

These events caused great exultation and renewed confidence to the enemy, who imagined they had sundered the Confederacy, and secured the unlimited command and free navigation of the Mississippi river, the great conduit of western trade; while readily a corresponding shock of despondency and foreboding of the consequences to ensue from the capture of so many brave soldiers, and the loss of command over the river, and the means of ready communication with the west, affected the public mind of the Confederacy.

As results develope themselves, the exultation and the depression are found to have been alike exaggerated. The gallant soldiers captured, after brief furloughs, having, by exchanges, declared out of the excess of prisoners before so largely made by us, been released from their paroles, are, for the most part, already reorganised and equipped, and now stand ready, with their approved valour and constancy, to meet the invader of their country.

The communication with the trans-Mississippi, while rendered somewhat more precarious and insecure, is found by no means cut off, or even seriously endangered.

This cannot well be otherwise, when it is recollected how difficult it is to guard, by gunboats or troops, hundreds of miles of river bank, if even securely possessed by the enemy, and how wholly impracticable when on both sides, for the greater portion of the distance, the possession is with our own troops or people. Besides, the resources of the trans-Mississippi are such as to make it self-sustaining; and against any force which the enemy, while engaged in their desperate struggle with the States on this side, can spare for attack on those beyond, it is not extravagant to say, that they have better means of resistance, and greater assurance of final success, than the rest of the Confederacy. This department, too, in view of the contingency of losing command of that river, has been endeavouring to aid the self-sustaining capacities of that section, by the establishment of works for the production of all supplies needful for the maintenance and efficiency of its armies. To these considerations may be added, that a general, among the ablest, the most zealous and judicious, the Confederacy can boast, is happily intrusted with the command and improvement of their resources, and enjoys the full confidence of the Government, the people, and the army. With circumstances thus favourable, the people of the trans-Mississippi States have only to manifest the energy, courage, and devotion to the common cause of the Confederacy which have signalised them in the past, to dissipate, as well among themselves as their more eastern brethren, needless apprehensions.

The hopes of the enemy have proven more illusive than the forebodings of our people. The Mississippi river is not opened to them for the purposes of trade or travel.

Without a stronghold on the river where heavy guns may be placed or defended, we may not debar passage to their vessels of war. But with the command of long stretches of the river bank, and ready access to nearly all parts, it would be strange indeed if we allowed security or impunity to their boats of trade or passage. The river is nowhere so wide that sharpshooters, even, cannot prove formidable, and batteries of light artillery, sustained by small detachments of cavalry, may almost absolutely command its channel. The frequent bends of its course, opening the boats, despite all side defences, with their boilers and machinery, to a raking fire, and the wooded coverts that yet line many miles of its banks, give facilities and efficiency to such modes of attack. Above all, except as a mere outlet to the gulf, for the solid advantages of trade, which have been so realised in the past, and are now as longingly anticipated by the States of the Federal Union on the northern Mississippi and its tributaries, the river must have, in its lower course, a friendly people, engaged in the avocations of peace and productive industry, and not, as now, a desolated and deserted region, occupied only by men maddened by accumulated wrongs, and eager for every means and opportunity of retribution. The folly of these vain expectations must soon be acknowledged, and may contribute to dissipate the wilder delusion that the Confederacy can be subjugated, and the ends of unity and peace be obtained by violence and oppression.

On the other hand, the people of the Confederacy have been enabled to realise how little, with courage and constancy on their part, their fate is determined by even signal reverses, and by the loss of single strongholds, however relatively important. While material injuries are freely admitted to have resulted to the Confederacy from the disasters in Mississippi, yet some real benefits have undoubtedly accrued from the compulsory abandonment of fixed points of defence on the river. In view of the superior numbers of the enemy, and the larger appliances of war enjoyed by them, the necessity of defending special strategic points may justly be deprecated, since it retains stationary a large force, and offers a wager of battle against all odds, in which the result is less to be determined by valour and skill than by accumulated numbers and the improved armaments of modern warfare, in which alone circumstances give them unquestionable advantage. In the extent of our territory, and the absence of vital centres, the mobility of our troops gives for our defence advantages more than compensatory, and is therefore ever to be preferred.

The loss of Port Hudson and Vicksburg has, on our side, liberated, for general operations in the field, a large army, while it requires the enemy to maintain, cooped up, inactive, in positions insalubrious to their soldiers, considerable detachments from their forces.

Nor, in a country not accessible by inland waters where their gunboats can penetrate, are they enabled, from their garrisoned points, to establish control or dominion over any extended district. This is illustrated in Mississippi, where, after having overrun, amid the dismay inspired by our reverses there, a large proportion of the State, they have now been constrained to release and send off their forces, until they control little more than the ground their garrisons rest on; while the experience of their recent ravages, and the insulting presence of a hated foe on their soil, are rousing to fiercer indignation and resistance the people of the State.

In Tennessee the campaign has been conducted with more varied fortunes. The deficiency of resources in men and provisions, rather than reverses in battle, during the summer, compelled the withdrawal of our army from middle Tennessee to the south side of the Tennessee river, where, for a long time, they held at bay the superior forces of the enemy. At length, with large reinforcements, and the combination of a formidable army advancing from Kentucky, the enemy moved on the one side to possess East Tennessee, and on the other to cut off our larger army under General Bragg. The necessity of concentrating forces to encounter the main attack left East Tennessee, with feeble defence, to rely chiefly on the stronghold that guarded the main pass of the mountains. Unaccountably, and under circumstances which would force suspicion of cowardice or treachery, but for the hope of satisfactory explanation from the commander, now a prisoner to the enemy, this almost impregnable post was surrendered without a struggle. In consequence, East Tennessee came easily into the possession of the enemy; but when their invading forces, attempting to press their advantage, advanced towards South-west Virginia, they were successfully encountered and repelled by our forces in that quarter. Meantime, the grander aim of the enemy to cut off the army of General Bragg had been evaded by a quick withdrawal towards his base, and, having received considerable reinforcements from the veteran army of Northern Virginia, General Bragg advanced in turn on his pursuers. Once again, the superior prowess of our arms was established on the bloody field of Chickamauga, in what ranks among the grandest victories of the war. Its immediate effects were to relieve all the more southern States from the dread of invasion and ravage, and to hold invested, under privation and suffering, the dismayed and shattered remnants of the enemy's grand army of the West. Its ulterior results yet await development, and may bring recovery of the soil and deliverance to the people of a most important portion of Tennessee.

From the achievements of our army the transition is natural to its numbers, condition, and prospects.

The labours, perils, and sacrifices of the past year could not fail to exact losses from its glorious ranks. Time and the occasion forbid more than a passing allusion to the heroic dead, whose deeds and their memory constitute the glory of the present, as they will the proudest inheritance of future generations. To the foremost of the illustrious throng, resting in the immortality of assured fame, more special reference may be demanded by just appreciation of his heroic qualities and eminent services, and by the saddened hearts of the people of the Confederacy, who mourn the death of their chosen champion, stricken by 'an accursed chance' in the hour when the prowess of a stroke of daring and generalship, just accomplished, had opened the way to crowning victory. Without disparagement to others, it may be safely said he had become, in the estimation of the Confederacy, emphatically 'the hero of the war.' Around him clustered, with peculiar warmth, their gratitude, their affections, and their hopes. His deeds had approved him a warrior of the highest order, as the whole tenor of his life, in peace as in war, had shown him the very type and model of the Christian and hero. From the first battle of Manassas, when, by his firmness and invincible will, he earned the title now indissolubly connected with his name, down to the battle of Chancellorsville, where his dauntless valour struck its final and most decisive blow, he was identified with almost every important movement and brilliant victory in Virginia. He had lived long enough to reap a full harvest of fame, and to have become an example to his countrymen and the admiration of the civilised world. But to the Confederacy his loss is felt to be only not irreparable, because the memory of his deeds and the spirit he inspired glow through the hearts of its armies to animate to noble emulation and kindred deeds of valour, patriotism, and self-devotion. The blood of such a martyr to the cause of Southern liberty and independence canonizes it to the faith and devotion of all its defenders, and constitutes a resistless appeal to the sympathies of mankind, as to the justice of God, against the foul aggressions of our invaders.

Our army may be less in the number of effectives present, but, in every other respect, is believed to be superior to its condition at the close of the last year. The men are more veteran, indurated to all the hardships and exposures of a soldier's life, familiar with danger, and confident in themselves and their officers. Their discipline is improved, and while their fiery valour is unabated, their firmness and constancy may, under all circumstances, be more confidently relied on.

The officers, through the tests to which they have been exposed, and the purgation effected by the aid of examining boards, have been rendered more efficient and capable. Altogether, whether the character, valour, efficiency, or morale of the men and officers be regarded, it is but simple justice to them to assert that they have never been surpassed, if ever equalled, by any like number of troops in the records of modern warfare. It only remains that their numbers should be increased and kept up to the standards required by their organisations to give assurance of their invincibility and the early triumph of our cause. It becomes important to consider the sources whence such increase of numbers may be drawn.

The first means to be adopted naturally is to bring back to the army the large and undue proportion of men who, from the provisional character of the army, from the vicinity and temptations of their homes, under the trials of early service, and in a more relaxed state of discipline, have deserted and straggled from their colours.

The effective force of the army is generally a little more than a half, never two-thirds, of the numbers in the ranks. From the absentees, considerable allowance is doubtless to be made for those disabled by wounds and sickness, to whom, as the law makes as yet no adequate provision, discharges have not been granted. It may yet be safely assumed that one-third of our army, on an average, are absent from their posts, and may, with due efforts, be returned. The best means for the accomplishment of this end, it is believed, will be found in some agencies to be added to the service for the enrolment and collection of conscripts. They will be more naturally suggested in connection with the consideration which will be given to that branch of the service.

The classes liable to conscription constitute the natural aliment for the support and increase of the army. During the most trying period of the past campaign, when reverses and captures so greatly diminished our forces in one important department, it was deemed expedient to subject to the call for conscription those between the ages of forty and forty-five. Thus, the male population between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, with the exception of such as, under existing laws, are exempt, or have put in substitutes, are liable to military service. It is difficult to give, with accuracy, the number who, under the past action of the conscript law, have been brought into our armies, and still more, those who yet remain to be called into the field. The law, it will be recollected, gives to all the privilege, before being enrolled, of volunteering into the companies they may prefer; and as calls have been made, a large proportion of those who, under it, have come into service, have availed themselves of this privilege, and thus do not come under the cognisance of the conscribing officers, or on the lists of enrolment. On the nearest approximate estimate that can be made, it is believed that, to every one assigned, there have been three volunteers. The number assigned during the past year in Virginia amounts to some 5,000, and hence the addition to the army from that State would be some 20,000 men. Supposing, as there is no reason to doubt, that other States have done as well, some 80,000 to 100,000 men should have been added to our forces. Yet, with so serious an addition, our armies have not fully maintained their strength in numbers. This affords a startling, but, it is feared, not an incorrect, view of the waste by sickness, casualties of battle, captures, desertions, and discharges.

The resources of supply from collection of deserters, and from conscription, must evidently diminish as the service becomes more active, and the numbers are exhausted; and it cannot be confidently expected that they can, during another year, increase, or even maintain our army in its present numbers. Yet the enemy is making every effort, and scrupling at no means, to raise to overwhelming numbers his already superior forces. One draft for 300,000 men is scarcely finished, with results, indeed, but little satisfactory to him, before another call for a like number is made. The army of the Confederate States, it is clear, must be at least maintained, and, if practicable, even increased. Our final triumph and independence must else be precarious, and consequences worse than ever visited a conquered people may be our hateful and enduring lot. All means within our reach to swell our armies should unhesitatingly be employed.

The able-bodied men between eighteen and forty-five years of age constitute, naturally, the active force for the field, and would probably suffice, and be as numerous as the means and products of the country would equip and sustain. It seems to have been the scheme of the conscript law that all such should be so devoted to active service; but the provision allowing substitutes, and the exemption law, have exonerated considerable numbers and classes. Both, it is submitted, should be repealed.

The law allowing substitutes has proved a means for depleting the army, while it has done more than any single measure to excite discontent and impatience under service among the soldiers. The persons received as substitutes have proved for the most part wholly unreliable; have, in many cases, only entered to desert, and often elsewhere again to make sale of themselves, with a view to like shameful evasion; while the fact that the wealthy could thus indirectly purchase liberation from the toils and dangers necessary for the defence of the very means that gave them the privilege and of the country itself, [illegible] produced among the less fortunate and poorer classes repining and discontent.

The men thus exonerated, too, were, from the advantages of position and [illegible] and reliable of our soldiers who had [illegible] hardships than the perils of a soldier's life. The law is deservedly regretted and reprobated by all acquainted with its operation. It is earnestly recommended that [illegible] repealed, and that all who have enjoyed its benefits be once again subjected to the sacred duty of defending [illegible] property, their liberties, and their country. [illegible] and justice precludes this, while every [illegible] and equity commands it.

The liberty to put in a substitute as it was given by act of Congress, may, regularly and constitutionally, be abrogated by the same instrumentality. There has been [illegible] been alleged, between the soldier or conscript, exempting himself by putting in a substitute, and the Government. It is nothing more than a privilege which, from grounds of policy, the Government has accorded to him, and [illegible] at its abrogation, he ought to be grateful for the [illegible] exemption which he has been allowed to obtain. But if it may be insisted that there is a contract existing, if not between the Government and the principal, yet at least between the principal and the substitute, of which, though made on the faith of an existing law, the former loses all benefit when he is recalled to service.

Were this the correct view, it would be better for the Government that it should return to the principal a fair proportion of the sum expended by him in obtaining his substitute, in all cases in which such substitute has adhered to his engagement, and not cheated the Government of the service to which the contract bound him, than to allow the further exoneration of the principal.

But, in reality, the just view of the matter seems to be, that whenever a call is made on certain prescribed classes for military duty, the privilege of substitution only exempts from that call, and neither can, nor ought to, liberate the principal from the paramount duty, ever incumbent on every citizen as a patriot soldier, to defend his country. The principal when called, by having his substitute accepted, is exonerated from service under that call only, and if he enjoys that, has the full consideration for the contract he has made, whether with the Government or his substitute, he falls back into the body of citizens, and becomes one of the militia of the country, liable like all others to be summoned on other exigencies, and upon further calls to military service. In his exemption from service under the special call which his substitute meets, he has enjoyed his full privilege, or, if it be contract, has received his stipulated consideration; a further call may not be made, future exigencies may not demand more levies for the army; peace may be obtained, and then his exemption will have proved complete, and have been gained by the substitution. He, falling back into the militia, as every citizen liable to military duty, takes his chances of future calls and future necessities. He is subject to be again called, whenever, in the judgment of the Congress, having power to determine, the service of himself and any others is necessary for the public defence. Such need, it is submitted, now exists, and the class of principals, as well as all others constituting the militia, being under the paramount obligation, neither to be evaded nor bargained against, of military service to the State, may be summoned to the field. A man can no more, by privilege granted or contract made, escape the paramount obligation of defending his country from invasion and ruin, than, by promise or purchase of absolution, he can evade the duty of obedience to God. This view of the right of the Government to claim such service is submitted rather to remove scruples which have been imagined to exist on the part of Congress in authorising the call, than to obviate difficulties to be anticipated from the class of principals. It is confidently believed their courage, zeal, and patriotism will disdain all paltry quibbling to evade their country's call, and that by prompt response in that country's need will they manifest their appreciation of their own highest duty, and their alacrity to meet whatever of peril or sacrifice it may entail.

No records exist which will furnish the precise number of principals who may thus be recalled to service. The best conjectural computation places the number throughout the Confederacy, at not less, certainly, than 50,000 men, of an age and class calculated to make approved soldiers.

The classes covered by the exemption law may also, it is believed, be advantageously abridged. The aim of the law seems to have been to exonerate only a sufficient number of experts in various professions, trades, and mechanical pursuits, to meet the requirements of society; but as from the mode of effecting this, in various instances, all of special trades or pursuits have been exempted, the consequence has been, that a larger number of persons, more in various localities than are needed by the requirements of the country, have been relieved from service. This has caused some natural dissatisfaction among those whose services are exacted in the field, as well as operated to the diminution of the numbers liable to conscription. A wiser course, it is believed, would be to render all within the prescribed ages, capable of bearing arms, subject to conscription, and allow details to be granted from the professions and mechanical pursuits to the extent that may be necessary for the industrial wants of society. A considerable number might thus be added to the army without unduly impairing the necessary supply of skilled labour for the needs of the country.

Another means of replenishing the army would be by lessening or withdrawing the details which, from time to time, have been made from the army and from conscripts for the works and various operations of the Government. It has been the policy and earnest effort of this Department to make them as limited as possible; but still they have, under the unceasing demands of all branches of the services swollen to a number that constitutes a serious abstraction from the army. One great cause of the number thus required has been the exceptional state of the market for labour caused by the enhancement of prices and the paucity of labourers. The comparatively few men who are at command for hire claim, and can obtain, wages that almost preclude their employment by the Government; and besides, as the public works have to be carried on by labourers assembled in considerable numbers, and in many instances, as at mines, saltpetre caves, and the like, at distant points, the men above conscript age, having, for the most part, families and settled abodes, are reluctant to render their services for any rewards. The only remedy that is seen for this, would be the extension of the claim of service by Government to a greater age, and allow details from those not now subject to military calls. Priority would thus be afforded to the Government in the command of labourers; and when it was thus distinctly recognised by them as their contribution to public defence, and [illegible] them in their negro regiments, and wherever they have established anywhere a temporary occupation, they practise a regular system of compulsory recruiting from the slaves within their reach. Not merely, therefore, for the purpose of preserving to the Confederacy this valuable labour [illegible], but from the plainer necessity of preventing the enemy from recruiting their armies with our own slaves, [illegible] on the military authorities of the Confederacy to remove from any district exposed to [illegible] the effective male slaves. Were there any white population within our country so affected to the enemy as to afford recruits to their army, there could be neither doubt nor delay in removing them to a secure distance on the approach of hostile forces, and surely the obligation is even more clear in regard to the slaves, whose employment by the enemy as soldiers converts them from valuable labourers into savage instruments of [illegible] war against our people and their institutions. All male slaves capable of arms, in such cases, should, on the approach of the enemy, be at once removed, by military authority, to more secure districts, where they may be reclaimed by their masters, or, on their failure to do so, be employed, on reasonable terms of hire, by the Government. In this way, it is probable a large number of efficient negroes may be obtained to supply the details from the army for all unskilled labour, and also to liberate for arms the soldiers now engaged in unwarlike duties in the trains and camps of our armies. While it may be difficult to ascertain the precise numbers that may, from these various sources, be thrown into our armies, there can be no doubt they would be swelled considerably beyond their present numbers, and constitute an army larger, as well as more effective, than any we have yet mustered. In view of the increasing repugnance of the enemy to furnish recruits to their army, and the failing hopes it indicates, it is almost certain that manifestation of strength and resolution on the part of the people of the Confederacy would soon be decisive of the struggle. When all the disastrous consequences of long, wasting warfare are weighed, and the mighty issues to ourselves and our posterity, dependent on our success, are realised, and it is apparent our people have only, with united wills and a supreme effort, to put forth their entire strength, to assure the prize of peace and independence, should there be misgiving, or hesitancy even, in adopting all the means requisite to summon forth the full number of our population of age and ability for arms, and to hurl them against the invading foe? The only enquiry, it is hoped, will be for the agencies that can most speedily accomplish the desired marshalling.

The organisation already engaged in the execution of the conscript law, may, with some slight modifications, be readily made available. With its officers, it now extends to all portions of the Confederate States, and by systematised action it may be rendered as available to collect stragglers and deserters, to give information of the details that may be spared, and of the labourers, whether free or slave, that may be commanded to fill the places of the soldiers returned to service, as to enrol conscripts, and the exempts and principals who may be again recalled to military service. One addition may be required to give it fuller efficiency. As originally designed, the law was expected entirely to enforce itself by its prestige and the sanction of public sentiment. Every man, on being enrolled and summoned to his duty, was expected promptly to respond, and no adequate means of compulsion were incorporated. This, in the main, has been sufficient, as among a free people ready obedience to law—specially a law for the public defence—might be expected; and the appearance of compulsion, particularly by military authority, was to be deprecated as both unnecessary and revolting. But as the war has been realised in all its trials, repugnance and recusancy have, in some limited portions of country, been manifested occasionally to the call of the conscribing officers; and when desertion and straggling have added in those districts numbers of lawless and desperate men, there have been combinations and organisations for open resistance to the regular action of the law. It is always best to overcome such evils in their inception, and to prevent such lawless feelings from coming to the head of open violence and insurrection. There has, therefore, been found the necessity, at times, of small supporting forces to aid and enforce the execution of the law, both of conscription and for the arrest of deserters. Such forces could only occasionally, and at intervals, be spared from the armies in the field: and it is, therefore, found expedient to organise, of non-conscripts and the least available of the conscripts, local or temporary organisations, which could be more constantly employed in arresting deserters and collecting the conscripts. A regiment or battalion in each State would probably suffice for the full accomplishment of these ends; and while, under the general laws already existing, a few companies have been organised and are thus employed, it might be well to have more special authority of law for the constitution and employment of such limited forces by the officers of the conscript service.

One of the subjects demanding early attention is to make provision respecting the troops whose term of service will expire during the ensuing spring and summer. The number is considerable. According to the records of the Adjutant and Inspector-General's office, three hundred and fifteen regiments and fifty-eight battalions contain more or less of those whose original term of service having been for twelve months, either re-enlisted for two years, or were embraced within the operation of the act of April 16, 1862. That act authorised the re-organisation of the regiments, battalions, squadrons, and companies within its scope, which was completed—once for all. And though the individual soldiers, composing such organisations in a greater or less degree, be entitled to their discharge from them, the organisation itself is not disturbed or broken up, but remains the more or less a skeleton according to the numbers of those discharged.

It is earnestly recommended that these organisations be not broken up by any legislative action. Great injustice would thereby be done to the gallant officers who have been tested in every way; the inspiriting associations and prestige of courage and success attached to the existing organisations would be lost. Should new organisations be authorised, much injury would be done to the service, by the unsettled feelings, discontents, and the demoralisation, in order and discipline, which follow general electioneering throughout a command. These evils were so vividly realised in the re-organisation of the twelve-months men, and operated so harshly on many of the best officers in the service, that their renewal is most earnestly deprecated.

The men whose terms of service would thus expire cannot finally be discharged from the service. The country needs their assistance for defence against our oppressors. Under the present law, they would have the privilege of selecting their companies. But the exigencies of the service may advise a modification of the privilege of selecting the existing companies in which to serve, before enrolment, so as to restrict it to a company of the same arm of the service; otherwise, a partiality for certain branches of the service, as, for instance, the artillery, the desire of change, of trying a new sphere of action, so natural to the individual, may operate to impair seriously, if not destroy, the efficiency of one or more arms of the service, while others might be increased beyond all proper proportion for usefulness.

The necessary legislation is therefore recommended, to retain in service all those between the ages of eighteen and forty-five at the close of their present terms of enlistment, with the privilege of selecting beforehand an existing company in the same arm, in which to serve preserving the present organisations, with their officers, to be filled up by such selections and the assignments of enrolled conscripts.

From peculiar circumstances or influences, some of the present organisations will be greatly reduced in numbers; and to place them in a proper condition of efficiency will furnish an additional reason for the adoption of the means suggested to increase the numbers of our troops, especially of recalling to service the principals who have furnished substitutes.

In some instances, doubtless, the reduction of existing organisations will compel the necessity of consolidating them. This furnishes an additional reason to some hereafter produced for the bestowal of this power upon the Department.

The law providing boards to determine the competency of officers has operated very favourably, both to secure efficiency, and to promote improvements among all aspiring officers and men. It has done much to obviate the evils anticipated from the system of election and promotion in the provisional army, when so few had the benefit of previous learning or experience. Still, the policy of elections at all may be well questioned, since inseparable from it arise an undue regard to popularity, especially among the non-commissioned officers, and a spirit of electioneering subversive of subordination and discipline. Promotions by seniority, too, as the rule, may be judicious; but it might, considering the number of officers who have no military education, be advantageously varied with a large latitude to selection. Boards to test competency, instead of being casual and at discretion, should, it is thought, examine every officer on his promotion by seniority. The universality of the test would thus deprive it of that apparent invidiousness which often prevents its application. In that certainty, too, would be found a greater incentive to constant preparation on the part of all junior officers. It might be expedient to extend to those boards a wider power of recommendation, so that they might not be restricted to determining merely the competency of those before them, but might make recommendations of more efficient officers, whether in or out of the special organisation, giving, however, preference, on an approach to equal qualifications, to the former. In determining the competency of officers, the boards have extended their enquiries to physical disabilities. In consequence, many officers, whose gallant services are attested by their wounds, or whose health has been broken down by the privations or exposures of service, are honourably retired, and thus deprived of their commissions. The efficiency of the service may be thus promoted, but every feeling of gratitude and justice revolts at such reward for wounds and sickness received in the service of the country. From such feelings it often happens that there is no call of a board in cases of disability, and then the position of the disabled officer cannot be filled in the field, and the road to promotion is effectually blocked to the junior officers. This state of things is often felt by gallant officers under disability with such honourable sensibility, that, even without adequate provision for their own maintenance, they feel bound to resign. Nor can relief from this painful necessity be given by assigning them to posts or other duties than those of the field. For only by virtue of their commissions can such assignment be made and held; and their retention of the commission debars their juniors in the field from advancement, and leaves their command without the necessary complement of officers. All this results from the feature incident to the organisation of the provisional army, that the commission is restricted to, and dependent upon, the special organisation. To obviate the serious mischiefs resulting, it is recommended that all officers disabled by wounds or sickness incurred in the service should be honourably retired, and severed from connection with their special organisations, but be allowed during the war to retain their rank and pay. They would thus be available, as far as their disabilities for field service would permit, for posts and other light duties, and might, without injury to the service in the field, be scarcely less useful to the country in less exposed but still important positions. Some measure of relief in these cases will be promotive of the efficiency of the army in the field, while it is imperatively called for by the simplest justice to the brave officers who have been shattered in health or maimed in body in noble discharge of patriotic duty.

In connection with the subject of these boards, it seems appropriate to invite attention to the number of reports proceeding from them, and to the onerous duty which is imposed on the Executive to examine and decide on all which retire or dismiss officers. With other arduous labours, of even more importance, it is not physically possible that the proceedings should receive from the Executive a consideration that is desirable for just revision. A like remark applies to the many cases from courts-martial and the military courts, which are sent up, or brought by appeal to Executive clemency, to the consideration of this Department and the President. At the same time, a painful responsibility attaches, in all these cases, which will not allow them to be lightly treated. To obviate the difficulty, it is recommended that an officer, in the nature of a judge advocate, be appointed specially to examine all such cases, and to make report on all that require the exercise, finally, of Executive discretion. Some measure of this kind should be adopted, or the approvals of the commanders in the field be made final, except on direct appeal, within reasonable time, to the Executive.

In reference to the cavalry, under the system of requiring the men to furnish their own horses, it is becoming daily more difficult, and, it is feared, will soon become impracticable, to keep mounted a sufficient number for effective service. Under the advance in price, and the increasing scarcity of suitable horses, few have the ability to supply themselves, while the contingencies of active and exhausting service, often on inadequate forage, too frequently imposes the necessity. The difficulty is enhanced by the limited range of casualties for which provision of payment is made—only those 'killed in action.'

The difficulty of procuring horses is also becoming almost equally applicable to officers. The law of the provisional Congress, making provision for the payment for horses killed in battle, did not, according to the received construction, embrace officers. This was probably owing to the liberal rate at which, with existing values, their pay was fixed. In consequence, they would receive no allowance whatever for horses, even when killed in battle, had not a law of the United States, embraced in the general re-enactment of the provisional Congress, allowed them compensation, not exceeding in any case the sum of $260 for the horse. The change which the increase of prices has made, partially in the rate of pay, as also in the price of horses, renders it beyond the ability of many to procure suitable steeds when dismounted. Justice, as well as the interest of the service, urges the correction of these evils; and it is suggested, either that the system be changed and horses be furnished by the Government to both officers and men, with a disallowance of the compensation granted for the service or loss of the horse, or that provision be made to pay all officers, as well as men, the appraised values of their horses, when lost by any of the actual contingencies of service, and not through remissness or neglect.

The advantages anticipated from the allowance of corps of partisan rangers, with peculiar privileges of prize to stimulate their zeal and activity, have been very partially realised, while, from their independent organisation and the facilities and temptations thereby afforded to license and depredations, grave mischiefs have resulted. They have, indeed, when under inefficient officers, and operating within our own limits, come to be regarded as more formidable and destructive to our own people than to the enemy. The opportunities, too, afforded them of profit by their captures, as well as the lighter bonds of discipline under which they are held, serve to dissatisfy the trained soldiers of the provisional army, who, encountering greater perils and privations, are denied similar indulgences. There are certainly some honourable exceptions to the general estimate thus held of the partisan corps, and, in several instances, partisan leaders have distinguished themselves and their corps by services as eminent as their achievements have been daring and brilliant. They constitute only notable exceptions, and experience of the general inefficiency and even mischief of the organisations would recommend that they either be merged in the troops of the line, or be disbanded and conscribed. To preserve the few that are valuable coadjutors to the general service, a discretion may be intrusted to the Department.

The military courts have been found to operate beneficially on the morale and efficiency of the army. They have dispensed with the necessity of such frequent details of officers from their regular duties for courts-martial, and, from their disconnection with the rivalries and interests of the line, as well as their larger experience and superior qualifications, have generally secured a larger measure of satisfaction to their judgments. As the courts, under the existing law, are each separately constituted, the members cannot, under temporary exigencies, be interchanged or assigned from one court to another. Inconveniences have sometimes resulted from this, when, from any cause, it was desirable some member should not sit in a particular case, or when some members of a particular court were detained by sickness or some other reason, and, from inability to supply their places, the court is rendered inoperative. As a remedy, it is proposed the Executive be authorised, at any time, to assign judges from one court to another, as, in his judgment, the service may require. And a similar authority to detail field officers as members of the court, in temporary exigencies, might be given to the commanders of corps or departments, as is granted them, by the law creating such courts, to detail an officer to perform the duties of the judge advocate in case of his absence or disability.

For the due complement of staff officers, the powers reposed by law in the Executive seem adequate, with one exception. The appointment of quartermasters and commissaries, for service in the field, has never been extended beyond brigades, and consequently no such officers can be directly appointed for divisions, corps, or an entire army. The experience of the service indicates, that for every army a chief quartermaster and commissary, in direct communication with the general, through whom the general supplies and movements of the army may be arranged and directed, are essential. So also, as corps, and even divisions, have often, in the operations in the field, to operate separately, sometimes at considerable distances apart, almost as separate armies, for like uses, to them a principal quartermaster and commissary are always important, and, at times, indispensable. The necessity of the case has, therefore, led the generals, under their discretionary control over all the officers of their commands, to withdraw or assign from their brigades quartermasters and commissaries to act for the army, the corps and divisions; and as such assignment proved continuous, their places have not unfrequently been filled as vacancies by new appointments to the brigades. Indeed, this has become a practice so recognised, that Congress, in one of its acts, has seemed, by its reference to division quartermasters, to have given to it an implied sanction. The Department, however, has, in the absence of express law, felt an embarrassment in either making such appointment, or in giving to the officers assigned rank appropriate to their superior position and more extended duties. It is suggested that such difficulties had better be removed by direct authority for the appointment and assignment of such officers, with rank determined by the dignity of the commands to which they are to be attached.

For the more effective organisation of the army, it will be necessary to have the power, when companies or regiments are reduced in numbers below a certain complement, to consolidate and organise them anew. This is a necessity greatly to be regretted; for many honourable associations, as well as the prestige of courage and success attached to the old organisations, make it alike matter of feeling and policy to retain them. Justice to the many gallant officers, who by such consolidations must lose their commissions, likewise increases the repugnance to the proceeding. With most of the organisations contributed from the States where the conscript law can be enforced, it is hoped the necessity may be avoided. But no alternative seems to exist in regard to those coming from the States overrun or in the occupancy of the enemy. Without such measure, the organisations from these States will dwindle to extinction. From them the recruits that can be procured come only in organisations of their choice, and are generally induced to come forth from the enemy's lines by the active exertions of officers interested in forming new commands. This power of consolidation has sometimes, from the necessity of the case, been exercised by generals in commands, but, unless effected by consent, the Department has felt its inability to regard them otherwise than temporary arrangements, and as leaving the old organisations with their officers in legal existence. This leads to the inconvenience of having officers of the line retained in commission without appropriate commands, and in every way causes complaint and confusion. In an indirect way the power is indeed possessed, and, under the stress of necessity, has sometimes been exercised by the Department, of effecting consolidations—that is, by disbanding one of the organisations from the same State, thus dismissing the officers, and leaving the men liable to conscription, and then assigning the latter to the other organisation. The effect of this, however, is to retain all the officers of the one organisation, while all of the other lose their commissions; or if, in lieu of this plan, both organisations are disbanded, and the men thrown together in a new one, all the mischiefs and demoralisations resulting from elections and a new set of officers are hazarded. It evidently would be far better there should be the discretion reposed either in the commanding general or the Department to consolidate directly, and let the best officers from both organisations be selected, either by the Executive, or on the recommendation of impartial examining boards. Power should be given, too, in such cases, to permit such of the officers not needed, who are recommended as deserving, to retain their commissions, and be subject to assignment to other appropriate duties. Thus, as far as practicable, in the painful necessity of reducing commands, efficiency in the commands would be reconciled with justice to the officers.

By the means recommended, all of military capabilities between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, excepting such as the actual needs of society or the Government render more serviceable in peaceful avocations, may be effectively devoted to active service in the field. But there will still remain large numbers, of ages less adapted to the field, but still capable of arms, who may be rendered effective as a reserve, and for purposes of local defence and internal police. In a struggle such as the Confederacy is engaged in, with all the dearest interests of the present and future dependent on the successful resistance to foes superior in numbers and material resources, and animated by the most malignant passions for our complete subjugation or extermination, all of whatever age, capable of striking a blow or mustering for defence, should be unhesitatingly summoned, as they should be prompt to answer, to the sacred duty of repelling the invader. The Confederacy may well be regarded as a beleaguered city, where all capable should be placed at the guns, and all privileged from age or infirmity should yet minister to the common safety. The ruthless policy, recently adopted by the enemy, of cavalry raids through important districts of the country, with the nefarious purposes of destruction and devastation, that, by depriving of the means of production and subsistence the helpless and dependent, they may compel to submission the men they have feared to confront or been unable to subdue, renders more clear and imperative the duty of thus organising and preparing our reserve population. These raids, hitherto made with little danger through extensive but sparsely populated districts, and prosecuted rather in the spirit of brigands than of soldiers, might be easily checked and punished by comparatively few brave men, however little adapted to continuous service, if only duly organised and armed. A few instances of merited vengeance from the intended victims of their rapacity and cruelty would effectually stop such malignant marauders. To accomplish such organisation, it will only be necessary to enforce, as an obligation, the duty on all capable of arms to unite in such companies as are provided for voluntary engagements by the acts of August 21, 1861, and October 13, 1862. The former contemplated organisations for local defence and special service within prescribed districts, when the members remained uninterrupted in their ordinary avocations until, on the occurrence of an emergency, called by the President into actual service, and, when the need had passed, were again returned to their civil pursuits. While in service, they are armed, paid, and provided by the Confederate Government, and constitute a part of the provisional army, subject to the military authority, and governed by the rules and articles of war. The latter provided for mere defensive bands of twenty or more, who, on the approach of a hostile incursion, should, with their own arms and means, bravely seek to defend their homes and punish the spoilers. It cast around them the ægis of the Government, and recognised them as among the authorised defenders of their country.

These two laws may readily be adapted to a division of the reserve population into two classes—those whose age and health would sustain service throughout the State, or some extensive district, and who might be called on for continuous service during an emergency; and those who would only be adapted to defensive or police operations within their counties. By this adaptation, and a compulsory requirement, the whole arms-bearing population not in active service could, without seriously impairing the productive and industrial resources of the country, be organised as effective aids in our great struggle. They would suffice to insure defence and internal security to each State and county, while the armies in the field could be employed solely in overthrowing the invading hosts of the enemy. A grander spectacle would never have been presented in history than a whole people thus organised and armed, prepared, old and young alike, at home and on their frontiers, to meet and repel their rapacious aggressors.

The subject of the exchange of prisoners of war has excited much attention, and has a painful interest to our people and our brave soldiers, whom the fortune of war has thrown into the hands of our enemies. It was the desire of the Government, from an early period of the war, to agree upon a fair and equitable system of exchanges. The large preponderance of prisoners being on our side, negotiations were opened and had been nearly consummated, the terms having been agreed upon in accordance with the views of his Government as expressed by the Commissioner of the United States, and under his assurance of satisfactory settlement, a large number of prisoners held by us were delivered up. Some serious reverses, however, just then befalling us, and large numbers of prisoners being taken by the enemy, they refused to consummate the agreement, and broke off the negotiation. Their losses in prisoners in subsequent military operations, especially in their disastrous defeats around this city, again giving us the preponderance, a cartel of exchange was agreed on and executed. Various efforts to obtain unfair advantages by quibbling as to its terms and operation were made, and its provisions violated by the enemy, but the cartel was recognised as being in force, and exchanges continued to be made. Our reverses in July again gave them, as they claim, the preponderance in the number of prisoners, since which time they have openly disregarded its obligations, and have now, upon a false and flimsy pretext, declared it to be inoperative. All exchanges have now ceased, with little apparent prospect of renewal. The exchange of prisoners was desired on our part for the sake of humanity, to prevent, in accordance with the usages of war among civilised nations, individual suffering, as far as practicable. And all the obligations imposed on us, as to the treatment of prisoners and exchange, by such usages and the cartel of exchange, have been fulfilled on our part with entire and scrupulous good faith, while the course of our enemies has been marked by perfidy and a disregard of their engagements and the dictates of humanity.

The report of Mr. Ould, our Commissioner of Exchange, which accompanies this, will fully explain the present position of this interesting subject.

It is gratifying to be able to report that, during the past year, the ordnance and mining bureau has steadily increased the production and supply of arms and munitions. Notwithstanding the serious injury sustained from fire by one of the leading establishments of the Confederacy for the manufacture of ordnance, yet, by prompt repairs and the establishment of similar works in other portions of the Confederacy, the manufacture has rather increased, and is now believed to be adequate to the regular demands of the service. Arms, too, of approved kinds are being made with more facility, at more places and in larger numbers, than at any previous time. Very valuable additions to our supplies of arms have been made during the year by importations from abroad, and thus have enabled the bureau promptly to repair the very heavy losses which were sustained in the disastrous campaign in Mississippi. But without such aids in the future, unless unwonted losses occur, confidence is felt in our ability, by internal manufacture, to provide arms adequate to the demands of our armies. In the manufacture of powder, balls, shell, &c., progress has been marked, and with some addition in the supplies of nitre from foreign sources, there will be no want of adequate supplies of superior quality. Special attention has been given to the distribution of these works in different portions of the Confederacy, so as not to leave our supplies dependent on single disasters. While not yet wholly independent in the supply of nitre, there has been, until very recently, marked increase in its production. That increase has, during the past year, nearly doubled from production. The temporary occupancy by the enemy of the districts of the country where the richest deposits of nitrous earth were found, has, for the present, diminished the production; but it is encouraging to know that the artificial sources of supply, in beds of nitrous earth, will soon begin to be available, and much more than supply the deficiencies which have resulted from the operations of the enemy.

The mining operations in iron, lead, and coal have all been pushed with remarkable skill and activity, under the direction of the zealous head of the nitre and mining bureau, in despite of all the embarrassments resulting from paucity of labourers and fluctuating prices; and the result has been in each more abundant production, and a better prospect of future sufficiency, than we have yet enjoyed. A more decisive exhibition of the resources and exhaustless capacities of endurance possessed by the Confederacy could not well be presented than the decided increase, amid unprecedented efforts and sacrifices in the field and numberless impediments in procuring machinery, labour, and supplies, of all the great manufactures essential for successful defence.

The quartermaster and commissary generals, in the administration of their respective departments, have had, during the past year, extraordinary difficulties and embarrassments to encounter. The manufacturing operations of the former, as in the other bureaus, have indeed been conducted on a large scale, with more economy of material and with greater skill and energy than at past periods, and have made more largely the supplies for the army from internal resources; but still for some essential articles, such as shoes, blankets, and woollen cloths, partial dependence on importations could not be avoided. In these articles it can scarcely be expected that domestic production can be increased, for, under the wasting consumption of war, the production of the raw material is more likely to be diminished than increased. But the difficulties of both the quartermaster and commissary generals have been most grave in the large necessary purchases and transportation of forage and subsistence. The abstraction of so much male labour from culture, and the barbarous ravages of the enemy pursued with a systematic view to curtail our resources by spoliation and destruction, combined with unfavourable seasons to limit, almost beyond precedent, the production of these essential articles. The scarcity, too, was greatest in one or two of the States nearest to our largest armies; and the necessity for months of sustaining almost entirely the armies of Northern Virginia from supplies of corn drawn from South Carolina and Georgia will strikingly illustrate both the dearth and the difficulty of supplying it. At one time it was thought necessary to make appeal direct to the feelings and patriotism of the people for the prompt rendition of all surplus of supplies for subsistence; and it is a grateful duty to acknowledge that they who have never failed to recognise as their own the cause of the Confederacy, with zeal and emulation met the exigencies of the case, and, in very many instances, stinted themselves and their dependents to supply the army. It is most creditable to these departments that they have been able, amid the real deficiencies existing, and the many hindrances from distance, defective transportation, and other causes, to keep the armies at all times moderately supplied, and even able to make all the movements in the field which the exigencies of the campaign demanded. How long their exertion will avail to assure such results, it must be confessed, is now a matter of grave anxiety.

The consumption of all animal life in the army has been very great [illegible] and well-spread [illegible] constitute the [illegible] ferment [illegible] the army and the people [illegible] It is considerably [illegible] most in the Confederacy, to [illegible] army and yet [illegible] people [illegible] result it must be [illegible] country than our people have been [illegible] The supplies of beef and bacon [illegible] doubtedly [illegible] in superabundance in the Confederacy [illegible] decidedly unfavourable. Many [illegible] of long forage may be readily [illegible] hoped the people will recognise the necessity of [illegible] the best of their stores for the use of the [illegible] the much harsher toils and labour of the [illegible] more necessary, as another of our immediate needs [illegible] supply of horses for cavalry and artillery, and [illegible] of the service. Our safety demands that we preserve [illegible] during the rigours of the winter, and in a condition to render efficient service in the spring, as it would then be next to impossible to replace them.

But the gravest difficulty encountered by the [illegible] Department is, that the only mode of obtaining supplies [illegible] to them is impressment. The inflation of the currency, and the insatiable thirst for gain and speculation [illegible] have caused inordinate enhancement of the prices of all products, and a yet continuing advance, stimulated in part by the increasing volume of the currency, and in part by the [illegible] calculation of large gains from hoarding by holders or speculators. To this has likewise contributed some distrust, not of the cause of the Confederacy, but of its future ability, however earnest its desire to preserve its credit and good faith, to redeem the large issues which such enhancements of price rendered inevitable. The consequences have been an almost universal repugnance on the part of producers and holders to sell at any price, except under compulsion. This evil had begun to manifest itself before the close of the last Congress, to such a degree that some legislative remedy was recognised to be indispensable. To buy at current prices was seen to be suicidal to the credit of the Government, to swell its indebtedness, in a brief period, beyond its utmost capacities for redemption, and, at the same time, to raise, by daily accessions, the advancing scale of extravagant prices, until both the fears and interests of the holders would forbid sales at all. Under these circumstances, Congress devised and authorised a system of impressment of all property required 'for the good of the service,' or the accumulation of adequate supplies for the army, at the same time recognising, that under the exceptional circumstances of the country, and the disturbance of the ordinary laws of trade regulating supply and demand, current prices constituted no criterion of just compensation required by the Constitution to be allowed for the appropriation of private property to public uses. Congress provided for the ascertainment of such just compensation by reference, in the first instance, in part to local appraisers, and then to two commissioners to be appointed for each State, one by the Governor and the other by the President of the Confederacy. These officers, combining, by their appointment, the sanction of the State and Confederate authorities, were not only to entertain appeals from local appraisements, but from time to time to ascertain and prescribe fair rates of valuation to govern in impressments. As there seems no other alternative, this was, perhaps, as judicious an arrangement on this delicate and difficult subject as was practicable, and on it the Government has been compelled to rely almost exclusively during the past year. This resource, operating with increasing stringency and strain, is, at this time, its only reliance. The evils attending it are, however, very great, and only less than the failure or deficiency of supplies, which, so far, it has managed to avert. Impressment is, evidently, a harsh, unequal, and odious mode of supply. With the utmost forbearance and consideration, even its occasional exercise is harassing and irritating; but when it has to prevail as a general practice, to be exercised inquisitorially and summarily in almost every private domain, by a multitude of subordinate officers, it becomes beyond measure offensive and repugnant to the sense of justice and prevalent sentiment of our people. It has been, perhaps, the sorest test of their patriotism and self-sacrificing spirit afforded by the war, and no other people, it is believed, would have endured it without undue manifestations of discontent and resistance. It has caused much murmuring and dissatisfaction; but a knowledge of the necessities which alone justified it has caused the outcry to be directed rather to the mode and, as alleged, occasional excesses of its exercise, than against the system itself. Casual irregularities and abuses in the use of such a power, by numerous agents in so many quarters, may not be wholly unavoidable, but every effort to obtain information respecting them, and to afford prompt correctives, has been earnestly made by the Department. As to the mode of action, great misapprehension has prevailed. It has been supposed that it was the system of the Department to attempt to regulate the prices for the public, according to the schedule rates prescribed by the State appraisers, by impressing the products held by all who sold at higher rates, and in like spirit to keep supplies from being enhanced in price by the competition of consumers in the large cities, by the impressment of all supplies in transitu to market, unless the holders would agree to sell at schedule prices. To this supposed policy was ascribed the great enhancement of prices in the markets of the cities, and the gravest apprehensions of want were entertained by many, from the alleged exclusion of free supplies to the cities. The orders and instructions of the Department had been, in fact, against such policy, and the republication and reiteration of the regulations on the subject, which had been made soon after the initiation of the system, have, it is hoped, removed such injurious impressions. At the same time, it is found, as throughout it had been feared by the Department, that the scarcity and high prices of supplies in the markets of the country have not been due to the law of impressment, or to the supposed policy under it. The impressment law applies only to the surplus of producers, and expressly exempts, to them and others, the reasonable supplies they may have or obtain for the consumption of themselves, their families, or dependents. Thus, all consumers are privileged freely to supply themselves. All supplies, too, it is now at least fully known, are exempt in transitu to market, and for a reasonable time afterwards. Yet it is found that all prices have only the more rapidly advanced, and are still advancing, and that neither are the markets of the cities adequately supplied, nor can consumers, by purchase at current rates, without the utmost difficulty supply themselves. The truth is, that the explanation, as the cause, is to be found outside of the impressment law, or the action under it. The real difficulty is, that the price advancing from day to day, with an [illegible]

[illegible] character. If the present system be continued [illegible] many hundred per cent. above [illegible] enhanced, the credit of the Government [illegible] utterly, and no alternative left for the [illegible] tracted struggle, and the preservation of our [illegible] but grinding taxation, and the [illegible] present compensation of all supplies [illegible] as well as the armies of the Confederacy.

The necessity of reliance on impressment, as the ordinary mode of supply, it is trusted, will, by judicious [illegible] be obviated; but, as it may, at all times, be of occasional necessity and employment, it is desirable that the law should be perfected in some of its features. In [illegible] with justice in the main, in the deference of our people for law, and in their patriotic disposition to comply with the requirements for their defence, Congress has made imperfect provision as to the mode of procedure for its enforcement, especially when evaded or resisted. It is very important that the enforcement of all laws, even those having direct connection with military affairs, should not look to, or be dependent in the first instance on, the sanction of armed force, but should be attained by civil procedures, and the regular administration of justice. The absence of such provisions in this law has compelled the Department to frame and issue regulations assimilating the proceedings to civil administration, which regulations partake more the character of legislation than is felt to be appropriate to military orders. They have been acquiesced in, with commendable recognition of their aim, by the public, but it is preferable they, or more perfect provisions, should have the legislative sanction.

The tax in kind, which was adopted in some measure to obviate the issue of notes and the resort to impressment, has been as yet but measurably operative; but beneficial results have so far followed, and greater are expected to flow from its application. Delays have resulted, it is believed, from inevitable causes for the most part, in the lists of assessment to be made by the officers of the Treasury, and handed over to the quartermasters. To obviate these, and realise early supplies, invitations were extended to all producers to deliver spontaneously to the quartermasters and commissaries what they considered as their tithes, for which receipts would be given, to be allowed in evidence of delivery on the future reception of the assessor's lists. To some extent this invitation has been responded to, and has relieved, so far, the Department from the necessity of impressing supplies, and had lightened the labour of future deliveries. Owing to reluctance, however, generally felt by producers, either to indicate the extent of their crops, or to prepare them for market, from both the fear of impressment, and the indisposition to sell, deliveries before assessment have been less prevalent than was anticipated. It is yet too early to form any reliable estimates of the amounts of supplies that may be counted on from this tax, but it is certain that the loss of several productive districts, the wanton ravages of the enemy in others, and an unfavourable season for growth in considerable regions of the Confederacy, must materially lessen the supplies that were calculated on from this source. Enough has been realised to justify the wisdom of the imposition of this tax, and as earnest injunctions have been given to both assessors and collectors to expedite as far as practicable their operations, it is hoped sufficient returns may be obtained at an early day to direct the future legislation of Congress to the attainment of larger supplies by this mode of taxation. Its increase would evidently contribute to the financial relief of the Government, while a larger contribution in kind, if only equitably apportioned in comparison with the impositions on other classes, would probably prove to the producers the most acceptable mode of taxation.

The inflation of the currency and inordinate prices of all supplies have caused to the Department a painful embarrassment, from the inadequacy of the salaries and all wages of its clerks and employes to maintain them. Single men in such positions are barely able to subsist on their official compensation, and those with families, when without other means, have been obliged to yield their places, depend on the charity of friends, or suffer dire privations. Cases of such real suffering have resulted from this cause, that it would be culpable remissness, or unfeeling obduracy, not to urge earnestly a more just provision for them. Their whole time and labour are given, with a zeal, devotion, and industry rarely surpassed, to the toilsome and unostentatious duties of the bureaus and offices. Means at least of subsistence and lodging should be accorded without delay, by the Government, to such faithful labourers.

Captain James F. Lalor, C.S.A., has arrived in this country from Richmond as a bearer of despatches and on leave of absence. Captain Lalor was formerly of Dublin.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through HENRY HOYLE, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 3s. 6d.; payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. HOPKINS, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. HUTTON, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.

At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq. Manchester Southern Club Office, Market Street.

At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER & MULLER, 52 Rue du Château d'Eu, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4 Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), to C. W. WHITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

The War.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL ULYSSES GRANT, for whom the New York press, with true classical and historical instinct, has invented another cognomen—SCIPIO AFRICANUS—is appointed Commander-in-Chief of the United States Armies, vice HALLECK, dethroned. With characteristic promptitude, the new Generalissimo has placed all the most important commands in the hands of officers who have been his own colleagues in the late campaigns in the South-west; and thus Generals MACPHERSON and SHERMAN have jumped at once over the heads of a dozen generals, their superiors in rank and experience, and have attained a position and responsibilities which NAPOLEON I. would hardly have delegated to the most tried and able of his Marshals. MACPHERSON is twenty-seven years old. He is energetic and 'plucky,' but there his qualifications end, and he is to command the department of Tennessee; that is to say, he has to protect the long Federal lines from Memphis to Chattanooga, and from Louisville to Nashville and Knoxville, to hold Chattanooga and the capital of Eastern Tennessee, and to make head against two such commanders as LONGSTREET and JOHNSTON. General SHERMAN, whose most remarkable military exploit is his march from Vicksburg to Meridian and back again, takes the division of the Mississippi, including, we presume, Louisiana and Arkansas. General GRANT will establish his head-quarters in the field, 'with the respective armies operating under his personal supervision.' Considering that the North has about six large armies in the field, General GRANT's powers of ubiquity will be pretty well tested; but how on earth he is to 'personally superintend the operations of the respective armies,' conducting a series of campaigns over an area as large as half Europe, must surpass the comprehension and faith of any one but the editor of a New York paper. It is true the elevation of General GRANT is not announced with the usual exultation of Yankee journalism. Whether successive failures have made the press cautious, or whether the appointment is regarded as another of those clever dodges of 'honest ABE LINCOLN' by which a dangerous rival for Presidential honours is to be got out of the way, certain it is that GRANT's command has excited very little enthusiasm, and that its probable political results are much more a matter of speculation and discussion than its prospective military triumphs. A month ago GRANT's praises were very loudly sounded. Then his Anaconda scheme No. 2 was on the verge of execution. He had submitted a plan which could not fail. SHERMAN, THOMAS, GRIERSON, SEYMOUR, and FARRAGUT were threatening the cotton States at all points, and SCIPIO AFRICANUS—we beg his pardon, ULYSSES GRANT—was the man who had inventé la poudre which was to shatter the Confederacy into ruins. We all know how the affair has ended; how FARRAGUT is still pounding away at the outer defences of Mobile Harbour, with about as much hope, and probably as little desire of attempting a passage of the Channel, as Admiral DAHLGREN has of testing the inner batteries of Charleston; how GRIERSON's command fled in disorder into Memphis; how SHERMAN, after marching up and down Mississippi with 'wonderful vigour and celerity,' thought himself lucky in reaching Vicksburg; how THOMAS tried at Dalton, only to suffer a disastrous repulse; and how SEYMOUR got hopelessly beaten at Olustee with the loss of a third of his army. It is not to be wondered that, after this surprising proof of General GRANT's abilities for directing a bold and comprehensive plan of campaign against the South, the Federals should regard his appointment with more of curiosity than delight, and, in the modest words of the New York Times, should 'look anxiously for speedy and happy results as the consequence of these fundamental changes in command.'

As we anticipated, a period of inaction has succeeded the last disastrous effort of the North. It is not given even to a GRANT to initiate a new plan of campaign once a month. The recent changes demand time for their carrying out in all the Departments, and the strength of the Confederacy has been so clearly demonstrated that the enemy must wait until re-enlistments and the draft have placed it on its old footing of numerical superiority at all points. It is probable, then, that the next important blow will be struck by the Southern armies. By the latest mail we learn that General JOHNSTON has moved forward his artillery to Ringgold, an advance which probably accounts for GRANT's sudden departure from Washington for the South-West. The Federal army at Chattanooga is notoriously weakened by the withdrawal of large numbers of the three years' service men, the élite of the Northern troops, and is not in a position to receive large reinforcements from any quarter. By assuming a threatening attitude near Chattanooga, General JOHNSTON will compel such a concentration of troops at this point as will leave Eastern and Middle Tennessee in considerable danger from the unrestrained movements of MORGAN's cavalry and LONGSTREET's army. The whereabouts of the latter general sadly discomposes the Federals. They have not the slightest clue to his movements or his objects. In some quarters he is represented as falling back into Virginia to effect a junction with General LEE; in others he is said to be making for North Carolina; a third report sends him on his way to JOHNSTON; another alarms the whole North with the promise of an invasion of Ohio through Western Virginia. It is a tolerably good sign of the weakness of the North that there should be this general uneasiness and ignorance about the movements of an army of 40,000 men close enough to penetrate the Federal lines at any moment. Nor is this uneasiness surprising. The State of Kentucky is full of combustible materials which any Confederate success near its borders may explode. It is plain that a very formidable and extensive conspiracy against the United States authority is in existence, that the forcible enlistments of negroes have aroused a deep-seated spirit of hostility to the Washington Cabinet, and that the presence of a Confederate force in Kentucky would secure to the South a very considerable body of sympathisers. General MORGAN is said to have been for some time meditating a raid into this State, which would at once enlist all the disaffected on the side of the Confederacy, and seriously imperil the Federal garrison at Knoxville. We shall not be surprised to hear in a week or two that something of the kind has been attempted. In other quarters, the Confederates are openly threatening the initiative. A movement of STEWART's cavalry across the Rappahannock is reported, which may turn out a raid, but which is not unlikely to prove the prelude to a general advance by General LEE. At the same time a Confederate army is slowly closing in, apparently for an attack upon Newbern, and the Federal garrison is in a state of constant anxiety about some mysterious ironclads which are to take part in a general attack upon its defences in North Carolina. En révanche General GRANT is supposed to contemplate the concentration of a large force for an attack upon Richmond. A simultaneous advance is to be made from the Rappahannock, from Western Virginia, from York Town, and from Newbern. The plan had its favourable aspect two years ago, when M'CLELLAN was in command of the finest army the North ever possessed. But where now are the 200,000 men necessary for such a combination? President LINCOLN has done wisely in proclaiming another draft to meet the emergency. He will want every man of it.

In the meantime, a new conquest of Western Louisiana is said to have been decided on, and a great expedition of troops and gunboats is being assembled at the mouth of the Red River, to overrun and ruin the territory that has been twice ravaged and twice abandoned by Federal armies. It is perfectly well known now that the campaign in Texas is a failure, and that the North has only been able to gain a hold of such positions on the coast as can be protected by its gunboats, whilst it has prudently avoided fresh disasters at Galveston and Sabine Pass. So, for the third time, Louisiana is to be added to the Union. The operations in this quarter will exercise so slight an influence upon the issue of the war, that the warmest friend of the South could hardly select a better field for Federal operations. We can only hope that the news is not too good to be true, and that the War Administration of Washington, not convinced by failure in Texas, at Charleston, and at Mobile, is still intent upon fretting away the strength of its armies upon remote and isolated points of attack, whilst the decisive battles of the war are fought out thousands of miles away.

The Entente Cordiale.

THE alliance, or, to speak more accurately, the cordial union, of France and England has been, since 1851, the turning-point of European politics. With the Republic it was impossible for English statesmen to act; for no one regarded the Republic as anything more than a transition, the end of which must be at hand. On LOUIS-PHILIPPE it was impossible to depend; a less honourable man, a prince less mindful of his duty, less honest in his personal conduct, less loyal to his word, or more capable of the worst and meanest political treachery, never filled the throne of France since LOUIS XI. descended to his grave, laden with the curses of his subjects and the contempt of Europe. The bestowal of supreme power on LOUIS-NAPOLEON first presented to the mind of the experienced diplomatist who then presided at the Foreign Office a prospect of permanent alliance between the two most powerful and most civilised nations of the world; and the opportunity was seized with an eagerness which overstepped the bounds of respect towards his own Sovereign, and provoked HER MAJESTY to dismiss Lord PALMERSTON from office. But Lord MALMESBURY carried out the views of Lord PALMERSTON so prudently and effectually as to establish a thoroughly cordial relation with the EMPEROR without offending the strong anti-imperial feeling which the events of December 1851 had aroused in England; and since that time the policy of both countries and the destinies of Europe have been principally controlled by the joint counsels and united action of the English and French Governments. Coolness between England and France has twice led to European wars. The Crimean war might well have been averted had the CZAR comprehended the possibility of an intimate and effective alliance between the two great Western Powers. Our relations with France were not cordial in 1858-59, and France plunged into the Italian campaign. Our relations with France were again disturbed in the winter just passed away, and Austria and Prussia were thereby emboldened to push their quarrel with Denmark to the extremity of war. Separate, the two Powers can do little or nothing save by force; united, they can carry almost any just proposition without the necessity of even menacing a recourse to arms.

Beyond the bounds of Europe, England and France are the representatives of European ideas and European civilisation. They are propagandists of Christian principles and commercial intercourse—France intentionally and by choice, England by the necessity of her national character, and in spite of her declared intentions to the contrary. When their flags appeared side by side in the Eastern seas, they brought Japan into connection with the commercial world, and forced upon China a liberal policy towards the mercantile pioneers of European principles of government and international relations. Side by side, in the West, they resolved to bring Mexico within the pale of civilisation, and to terminate the miserable anarchy which has deprived that magnificent country of liberty, of prosperity, and almost of hope—side by side at the commencement, though the enterprise was finally carried out by France alone. Where they act in opposition to each other, as in Turkey, law and liberty make no progress, and barbarism maintains its ascendency. Where, as in the American quarrel, they resolve to remain quiescent, there is no power on earth that can interpose with effect between warring nations, whether to terminate an equal struggle that has lasted longer than modern principles teach us that such wars ought to last, or to assert against infuriated enemies the supreme authority of the usages of civilised warfare, or to pronounce in the name of Europe the fiat which declares that a people has maintained its independence by the sword, and is entitled to admission as a member of the family of nations. The abstinence of France and England is nothing less than the abdication of its powers by the Supreme Tribunal of the world, the public opinion of Christendom; the divergence of policy which causes such abstinence amounts to nothing less than the paralysis of the moral force of Europe. And if such divergence should become permanent, or should even be of long continuance, farewell to the great result obtained by the progress of diplomacy and of enlightenment during half a century of peace—the authority, in international quarrels, of the great neutral Powers. In that case, every war would threaten to become general; for no preponderating and decisive force can be brought to bear on one side, which may not be or is not likely to be checked by a countervailing interposition on the other.

In Europe, France and England, united, are the competent, and the only competent, upholders of public law against the wrongdoing of powerful nations. Sovereigns will rarely yield to reason, however strong: for before their own course has been decided on, they have had the means of hearing whatever reasons can be urged; and their pride disposes them to listen more readily to the arguments of their servants than to those of their equals. It is, therefore, simple folly on the part of a statesman to lecture or to argue with a foreign Government. Reasoning, in diplomacy, assumes the form of protest, and the only argument which is seriously respected is heard from the lips of cannon. When both parties to a quarrel are honest, and desire not so much to fight as to obtain an honourable settlement of a dispute, one foreign Power, if respected by both parties, may offer mediation; but where the aggressor cherishes designs he will not avow, the only interposition that can be effectual must be one which can command attention. Now no one of the great Powers will yield, without fighting, to an equal, if she have gone so far that she must appear to yield; but no one of them would be ashamed to make any honourable concession to France and England combined. And this, not merely because France and England command half the effective force of the world, but because the two conjointly have something of the moral authority of an international tribunal. First, they have no joint interest. It is well understood that England covets nothing, and will not let France take anything; and that, therefore, when England and France interpose together, they do so disinterestedly, and in the name of what they conceive to be public justice. Again, France and England represent in effect the enlightened public opinion of Europe. The opinion of Germany has even less weight than it deserves, and there is no such thing in Russia. To defy France and England, then, is to defy European public opinion, and that is a thing which only a very perverse and foolish Government would willingly do. Finally, to break a law which France and England arm to uphold is to incur certain failure and punishment; and therefore, when France and England are known to be on good terms, no European Power will venture to commit a wrong which these two nations are likely to resent. Denmark would never have been assailed, had France and England sent a joint remonstrance to the German Courts.

Finally, France and England represent and champion the cause of national independence, of civil and religious liberty. True, they interpret these words very differently. England has none of that enthusiasm for the formulæ of nationality which inspires France, and especially her Emperor; France understands religious liberty better than civil, and of political freedom she only desires

> The liberty to choose her chief,
> And bow to none beside.

But practically, in every European question between Governments and their subjects—in Poland, Germany, Italy, Hungary—the sympathies of France and England are, though for different reasons, on the same side. Still more is it the case that France agrees with England in desiring to uphold those constitutional Governments which are so obnoxious to men like M. von Bismark and his master—that it is her policy as much as ours to maintain the Parliamentary Governments of Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Italy, against their foreign enemies.

Thus the alliance of England and France is at once the best security for the extension of civilisation, the only guarantee for the preservation of peace and public justice in Europe, and the main reliance of those who hope to witness the gradual extension of enlightenment, constitutional principles, and self-government among civilised nations. On this account the wisest statesmen on both sides of the Channel are anxious to maintain it. On this account—from an instinctive sense rather than from a logical appreciation of its uses—the English people wish to see it maintained, without anything like servility or complaisance towards the French Government, but with loyal good faith and frankness, with courtesy and mutual consideration. And we should have thought, of all living statesmen Lord Palmerston, author and martyr of the entente cordiale, would have jealously maintained the keystone of his policy, the crowning achievement of his diplomatic life. But we know that the two Governments are at present on far from friendly terms, and that, in consequence of their misunderstanding, Denmark has been left at the mercy of Germany. If the result of the invasion of Slesvig should be a general war, the responsibility of that war will rest ultimately with the statesmen whose policy has produced this mutual alienation between the Governments of France and England.

It is not difficult to trace the causes of that alienation, one by one, in the conduct of the English Ministry. Not that the Emperor has asked from them unworthy or unrighteous concessions, and taken umbrage at their refusal. The Emperor understands England thoroughly; and if he did not, the experience of 1858 would teach him that no English Government which should make any sacrifice of English honour or English interests at his demand could hope to retain power. He has never asked or expected servile compliance with his policy: but he, like all other men, deserves from his allies courtesy and good faith. Now, as we know from the rest of his policy, Lord Russell can be servile to the lowest degree of abasement—as servile as an Oriental courtier or an American demagogue—but loyal or courteous he cannot be. And it is by a series of disloyal and discourteous acts that he has disgusted and irritated the French Emperor to the point of severing every tie beyond that of mere amity between the two countries. Those acts are diplomatically recorded; their effects are visible in the whole of the recent history of Europe.

Our Government consented to join with those of France and Spain in the Mexican expedition: which certainly had more extensive objects than that of extorting a promise from Juarez to acknowledge debts which he had no means of liquidating. The necessity of restoring law and order in Mexico was admitted and alleged by the Allies as a principal justification of the war. But the moment that France proposed to carry that purpose into vigorous execution, the English Government hesitated, and finally drew back, throwing the whole peril and expense of the enterprise upon France. Perhaps this was not the result of bad faith, but of sheer irresolution. Perhaps Lord Palmerston's Ministry had agreed too readily to a vague proposition, without taking thought how it was to be reduced to practice. Some irritation was caused in France by this desertion. But the Emperor, who understood his position, and was determined not to be made ridiculous, went on alone, and conquered. Alone he had reduced and given away an empire; and he could have forgiven the desertion which had left him free in such an enterprise and secured him the sole glory of such a triumph, had this been the sole shortcoming of his ally.

But the restless activity of Lord Russell prompted him to meddle where he could only act as the enemy of France. He proposed to the Pope to quit Rome and place himself under British protection. His Holiness demurred, and was angrily informed that France would not always be willing or able to protect him in his capital. This intrigue, conducted in secret, was revealed to the French Ambassador, whose master took just and deep umbrage, not at the opposition to his policy, but at the treachery which had accompanied it. He knows that England wishes his troops removed from Rome; it is one of the points on which the two Governments agree to differ. But, as our intimate friend and ally, he had a right to expect that we should not attempt to thwart and outdo him by an underhand intrigue; and the detection of Lord Russell's manœuvre naturally incensed him against a statesman so incapable of comprehending the requirements of friendship and good faith.

Next, the two Governments concerted with Austria a joint interposition on behalf of Poland. They talked loudly, they wrote indignantly; they went so far that honour certainly seemed to require that, if refused attention by the Russian Government, they should enforce their remonstrances at the point of the sword. At this conjuncture Lord Russell thought proper publicly to declare that England would not fight, happen what might. Of course, on receiving this intimation, Russia took the opportunity of rebuking, in the haughtiest terms, the Governments which had gone so far in threats while utterly unprepared for action. We were snubbed in the most humiliating manner. France was equally snubbed; and was, moreover, accused of fomenting discontent and exciting rebellion in Poland. The Emperor is a calm, cold-tempered, self-controlled statesman; but his blood must have boiled under this affront. His ally, however, who had induced him to go so far by the semblance of cordial support, had deserted him, and left him powerless to avenge the insult—left him humbled in the face of the world—and, which alone can endanger him, ridiculous in the eyes of France. How keenly he felt this desertion and its consequences, we know by the despatch in which M. Drouyn de Lhuys informs Lord Russell of the determination of the French Government not again to unite with England in a joint remonstrance which is not to be followed by action—not to be insulted by Germany as it had been snubbed by Russia. To the imbecility and disloyalty of Lord Russell on that occasion, we owe the Danish war. Had it not been understood that France would no longer act with us, Germany would never have dared to act in contempt of us.

To cover his retreat from the Polish disaster, the Emperor proposed a Congress. The proposal was open to many objections, and, in truth, seemed to most statesmen wholly impracticable. But the objections concerned not us. The objects to be attained were all objects which England has much at heart; the views of France and England thereupon are not very divergent, certainly not antagonistic; and if we had cordially supported the Emperor's project, we should have had a claim on him for goodwill if it had failed, for concessions if it had succeeded. Englishmen generally and the English Government did not incline to it. They thought that the Congress probably would not meet, and certainly would fail, because three out of the four great Powers would have to be asked for sacrifices which they would not make. But surely it might have been left to them to object. England might safely have said, 'We approve the proposal, and will join in the Congress if the other Powers will do so, and on certain terms,' leaving it to those whose interests were threatened to take care of themselves. We owed something to our ally; we ought to have shown ourselves willing to help him out of the scrape in which we had entangled him, even if we did not overmuch relish the mode of extrication he had chosen. But Lord Russell saw an opportunity for a display of dialectics and discourtesy, and he sent a peremptory refusal, the sting of which was envenomed by needless refutation. The Emperor would have been endowed with more than the proverbial patience of politicians, if, after these repeated affronts, he had maintained the old relations of confidence and intimacy with the English Ministry, and its mischief-making, pretentious, unreliable Foreign Secretary.

One more opportunity for insult and offence occurred; and it has not been thrown away. The Imperial police reported that they had detected a plot against the Emperor's life. Papers produced, and the confession of the accused, point to Mazzini as the author of the plot, and to Mr. Stansfeld, Civil Lord of the Admiralty, as the unconscious intermediary of the correspondence. The charge was publicly made by the Attorney-General of France: Mr. Stansfeld, amid many indignant protests against charges which were not in point, admitted that Mazzini's correspondence had passed through his hands, so that, if Mazzini were guilty, the charge against Mr. Stansfeld would seem probable enough. No one suspected him of voluntary connection with the plot; the question was whether, among the uses to which Mazzini has put his friend's address, it had been employed to cover the correspondence of assassins. If so, it was clear that Mr. Stansfeld ought not to remain a member of the Government, and that an apology was due to the Emperor of the French. If, on the other hand, as Mr. Stansfeld's friends affirmed, the whole plot was a fabrication, got up to injure Mazzini and his English partisans, amends were due from the French Government to Mr. Stansfeld. The charge was not absurd enough to be laughed at; for Mr. Stansfeld had been the intermediary of Mazzini's correspondence, and Mazzini had, once in his life, been privy to a conspiracy to murder. It was too serious to be neglected; for it is not pardonable that the address of a Minister should cover, by his indiscretion, the correspondence of those who would assassinate our ally. The duty of our Government was either to have said to France, 'Your police have made a false accusation. Mazzini never corresponded with assassins; therefore, Mr. Stansfeld never covered such correspondence;' or to have said, 'You have allowed a serious accusation to be made against a member of our Government. Bring forward your proofs; and we will bring Mazzini to trial, and we will have this matter thoroughly cleared up. We cannot suppose that such accusations have been made without evidence.' This would be but justice to Mr. Stansfeld and Signor Mazzini, if they be innocent of the respective charges; in any case, it is but justice to the French Government. To allow Mr. Layard, in his place in Parliament, to 'treat with contempt' a charge of this kind, made on such high authority, is to offer a flagrant insult to France. While the matter remains in this condition—on the one hand an unretracted charge against a member of the English Government of lending his house to men who plot against the life of the Emperor—on the other hand a 'contemptuous' disregard of that charge by our Foreign Office—it is impossible that the two Governments should be on any other terms than those of distance, coldness, and mutual suspicion.

An Infamous Outrage.

It is not the purpose of this article to offer any criticism upon the expediency or morality of the system of non-intervention on which Earl Russell now conducts the foreign affairs of England. On this occasion let us assume that when, as in the case of Denmark, the territory of a faithful ally is invaded without any justification, and treaties to which we are parties are grossly violated, it is not our duty to interfere except by tendering advice which is treated with contempt. Let us assume that after three years of successful warfare, it is right to still refuse to recognise the independence of the Confederate States. Let us for argument's sake admit that because Mr. Lincoln has had to call for 2,239,748 soldiers to carry on the invasion of the South, that such a fact does not afford sufficient evidence of the strength and endurance of the Confederacy to entitle it to recognition. Let us say that it consorts with our obligations and our interests as one of the Great Powers to make no effort to stop a useless warfare which will for years to come cripple our industry and our commerce. Yet, though we may not intervene, and though our Government is bound to submit to all kinds of insults rather than offend the Federal Government, we trust that the men of English birth who think that the people of this country are not to denounce the savage brutality of the Federals can be counted upon our fingers. It may be a poor gratification to hiss at Federal outrages, and sure are we that Mr. Lincoln's creatures will not blush to find themselves infamous, yet it is fitting that we do denounce them. We owe it to our good name when Yankee ingenuity discovers a novel kind of villany to put on record our disgust and detestation of crimes which are a disgrace to civilisation and to humanity.

We need not resort to Confederate witness to prove that the Federals wage war with unparalleled barbarity. Their official reports and official documents too amply testify to it. When they make a raid, or when one of their expeditions is driven back, the shame of defeat is forgotten in loud boastings of having devastated large tracts of country, destroyed farming implements, and burnt the mills that converted the grain to flour. They glory in making war on women and children, and reducing the districts they overrun to a state of famine. It was in Northern newspapers we read of Union soldiers warming themselves at a fire whilst their prisoners were frozen to death in open cars. It is in Northern newspapers we read of the horrible sufferings of the negroes who have fallen under Yankee dominion. It is in Northern newspapers we find accounts of Butler's rule in Norfolk, of how a clergyman is condemned to sweep the roads, of how an elderly gentleman is condemned to imprisonment, hard labour, and cruel torture, and we know that these things are slight offences compared to Butler's ill-treatment of Southern ladies. The history of the war, even upon Federal testimony, is a catalogue of wanton barbarities and scandalous outrages; but we question whether, with all their inventiveness, the trusted agents of the Federal Government will be able to do anything more cowardly and despicable than that conduct to which we now invite attention.

In New Orleans two events occurred on March 4, both calling for comment though neither of any political importance. On that day Mr. Hahn, elected by Mr. Lincoln's soldiers, was inaugurated as Governor of Louisiana. Of this Hahn it will be sufficient to remark that he is a disreputable adventurer and a purchased renegade. Whilst the Confederates were in possession of the city he sought to curry favour with the authorities, and, amongst other manifestations of zeal, presented some colours to a company of Confederate soldiers. When Butler came to New Orleans, he made overtures to Hahn, who readily accepted them, and, besides other dirty work, managed the True Delta newspaper, after it had been confiscated by Butler. We may here remark that when Banks succeeded Butler, the True Delta was replaced by the Era, and a Lieutenant-Colonel of the Corps d'Afrique was detailed for duty as editor. It was reported that the editor was a negro, but, says the New York World, referring to a passage which we shall also quote: 'This was no doubt a blunder, for no negro could be found in Louisiana who would degrade himself so much as to use the language quoted below.'

The papers that gave an account of the inauguration of Hahn also contained an account of the funeral of the wife of General Beauregard. For nearly three years the deceased lady had been separated from her husband by the cruel fortune of war. Being connected with some of the first families of Louisiana and of France, and being highly esteemed for her own and for her husband's sake, she had about a year ago, when seized with an illness which her medical attendants deemed mortal, the opportunity of rejoining the General. She was a fond wife and yet refused the proffered boon, lest she should be a burden to one who had momentous duties to discharge for his country. She was most assiduous in concealing her sad condition from him, and the better to do so bore her long sufferings with such courageous cheerfulness as to deceive every one except the physician. At length her time came, and, surrounded by friends who were privileged to wait upon her, she died on the morning of March 2. When the people of New Orleans read, amongst the obituary notices, the death of 'Marguerite Caroline Deslonde, wife of General G. T. Beauregard, C.S.A.,' we can understand how even those who only knew her by name, must have felt sorrow for the bereavement of her husband. And all that the people could do was done by them to mark their sympathy and respect. The streets through which the funeral passed were crowded with rich and poor and the funeral service was performed by the Archbishop, assisted by a numerous body of the Catholic Clergy. This homage did no good to the dead, but it honoured them who rendered it,—nor could an insult offered by the Federal authorities hurt the dead, though it brands its authors with lasting infamy.

The Era, as we have explained above, is the organ of Mr. Lincoln's proconsul Banks, and is not edited by, but under the immediate direction of the sham Governor, the perjured and contemptible puppet, Hahn. And here follows what the Era, the official Lincoln organ, published about the brave lady whilst she was yet lying dead in the city—about the wife of the gallant soldier whose heroism even his enemies have confessed, and who on all occasions has treated his enemies as a Christian gentleman should do:—

[From the Evening Era, March 3.]

Death of Mrs. Beauregard.—The morning papers announce the death of the wife of P. T. Beauregard. She died at her residence on Esplanade Street, on the evening of the 2nd inst. This woman has, we learn, been in poor health for the past two or three years, and has required what has been denied her, the care and attention of the man who gave her his word at the altar to cherish and protect her. He also swore at one time to support the Constitution of the United States. He does not hold his oaths in very high estimation, as we find him not only plotting for the destruction of his country, but deserting his invalid wife for years together, and leaving her dependent upon others for those acts of kindness and support that should be given by a husband. We know very little of the life or character of the deceased, further than she was an invalid, neglected by her sworn protector, and left by him under the powerful protection of the flag whose glory he is devoting his puny energies to sully. But when he is called to his final account, he will have the mortification of knowing that the lustre of the stars and stripes is all the brighter, and his betrayed country the more powerful, for the treason of himself and co-conspirators.

Commenting on this the correspondent of the New York World writes:—

As the Era is the property, so to speak, of the United States military authorities—for they have seized and hold it as their own—as it is edited by men detailed for the purpose, as the persons held out as proprietors have not even a qualified right of ownership in it, but can be turned off as readily by the commanding-general as could be his orderlies, it is not strange that the people hold the United States Government responsible for this wanton insult to common decency and humanity. Of all the many acts which have been done in this city, from the first landing of Butler down to the present time, to alienate this people from the Union to which they were once devotedly attached, there has occurred nothing, not even the infamous 'woman order' of Butler, which has done more to destroy any remains of real attachment to the United States which still abided in their hearts than this despicable and cowardly paragraph, which will go to Europe and all over this continent as indicative of the sentiments which inspire the conduct of the administration in this war.

We repeat we do not now enter into the question of the righteousness and policy of non-intervention or non-intercourse. We merely assert the right and bounden duty of all honourable men to express, and not with bated breath, their abhorrence of Federal barbarity. We say every honourable man who reads the passage which we have quoted from the New Orleans Era, cannot help denouncing such cowardly and heartless brutality. What! does it not satisfy Mr. Lincoln's chosen officers to insult and maltreat living women, but that they must spit their venom on the coffins of the dead? No words have yet been coined which fully express the ineffable contempt and loathing which are called forth by such a pitiful, scandalous outrage.

The Confederate Commercial Policy.

RECENT ACTS OF THE CONFEDERATE CONGRESS.

Some weeks since it was announced by telegraph from New York, that President Davis had approved various Acts of the Confederate Congress, prohibiting the exportation of cotton except on account of the Government or its creditors, and also the importation of certain specified articles of luxury. We are now able to lay before our readers the authentic text of the two most important of these Acts, from which it will appear that we have correctly anticipated their intent and scope in former articles on this subject.

An Act to establish a Bureau of Foreign Supplies.

Section 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That, for the purpose of exporting cotton and other produce to supply by import the military and other necessities of the Government, during the continuance of the war with the United States, an independent bureau of the War Department be established, to be entitled the 'Bureau of Foreign Supplies.'

Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, That the said bureau shall be charged with the purchase of cotton and other produce for export, and with all the duties and expenditures connected with the import of munitions of war, and such other supplies as may be required by the several departments of the Government.

Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, That all steamers now owned by any of the departments of the Government, and used to supply their necessities from abroad, and all contracts for the increase of the number of such steamers and vessels, be and are hereby transferred to the said bureau

Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, That the chief of the said bureau shall, under the Secretary of War, have full power to purchase and contract for such steamers and vessels, to be owned wholly or in part by the Government, as may be necessary for the discharge of the duties imposed upon the bureau, and to attain the general objects of its establishment, as set forth in the first section of this Act.

Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, That all permits or licenses for the exportation of cotton or other domestic produce on private account, that may be authorised by the Act of Congress entitled 'An Act,' &c., shall be issued from this bureau, under such regulations as may be prescribed in the said Act, or under any authority granted therein to the President, the Secretary of War, or other department, and under such conditions as may be effectual to secure the fulfilment of the objects of the present Act: Provided, That nothing in the present Act shall be construed to affect the export of cotton or other produce under the control of the Treasury or other departments, to secure any of the bonds or obligations of the Confederate States.

Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, That the said bureau shall devote to the wants of the several departments of the Government such proportion of the exporting and importing facilities at its command as may from time to time be fixed by the President.

Sec. 7. Be it further enacted, That the said bureau shall consist of one colonel, and such subordinate officers as may be necessary, said agents to be appointed and to have their compensation fixed by the Secretary of War.

An Act to prevent the running of the blockade, except on Government account for articles necessary to the prosecution of the war

Section 1. The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the export of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such regulations as shall be made by a Bureau of Foreign Supplies to be hereafter established, or it may be by the President of the Confederate States.

Sec. 2. That if any person or persons shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, vessel, or any other water-craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this Act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, the said articles and the ship or other water-craft, wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves or animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and be punishable by such fine as the court may impose.

Sec. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, steamboat, vessel, or other water-craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance as aforesaid, any of the articles aforesaid, unless a permit be previously obtained from some officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water-craft, or wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this Act.

Sec. 4. That the collectors of all the districts, upon application of any officer or agent of the Bureau of Foreign Supplies hereinbefore mentioned, and any other officer of the Confederate States shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned, found in any ship, steamboat, or other water-craft, when there is reason to believe they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or territory in the occupancy of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported; and not to permit the same to be removed until bonds shall be given, and satisfactory sureties that no violation of this Act, and the regulations under the same, be intended.

Sec. 5. That the powers granted by this Act to the revenue or other officers of the Confederate States, under this Act, to allow, or to refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure and detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Department of War or of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this Act, or of the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bonds as sureties as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure this Act from violation, and in case of refusal may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner, if circumstances warrant it.

Sec. 6. That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States, and all suits or actions that may arise under this Act, whether in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines for forfeitures and penalties imposed on the same by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and of all suits against them for acts done or committed under the same, and the distribution of the penalties and fines, shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue Acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied as in similar cases.

Sec. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval forces of the Confederate States, or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water-craft, or for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress any armed or riotous assemblage of persons, who may resist the execution of the Act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

It will be seen from the proviso in the 5th section of the Act to establish a Bureau of Supplies, that the holders of any bonds or obligations of the Confederate States are fully secured in their rights. To place these, however, in the most favourable position possible, a special Bill formally recognising the right of foreign creditors to introduce their own ships, and to carry out cotton due to them, was framed. There is no doubt whatever that this Bill also became a law before the adjournment of the Congress; and we are in hopes of being able to give it in extenso on the receipt of the next mail from Richmond, as well as the Act for the prohibition of luxuries. In this connection, we take great pleasure in availing ourselves of the permission to publish the subjoined letter from the chief of the Bureau of Supplies, established by the Act above quoted, to a prominent officer of the Confederate Government in Europe. The letter, it will be observed, was written before the legislation on the various subjects referred to had passed Congress; but it clearly indicates the spirit and the policy of that legislation:—

* * * * * *

The steamer Denbigh has arrived safely at Mobile. In consideration of the fact that she was specifically sent out by the holders of the Government cotton obligations for cotton due to them, the Secretary of War at once instructed the agent at Mobile to exonerate her from the usual requirement of carrying out a proportion of cargo for account of the Government. This may be taken as an intimation of the policy to be pursued in similar cases. Far from throwing any obstacles in the way, every facility is to be afforded the bondholders to get out their cotton. While there is no obligation to actively aid them in getting it through the blockade, it would be manifestly bad policy, to put it on no higher grounds, to interfere with any proper agencies they might employ for the purpose. They could not expect us to yield up any part of the tonnage now at our command, or that may hereafter be at our command, to carry out cotton for them; but when, as in the case of the Denbigh, a new vessel is specifically purchased or chartered by them, and sent to one of our ports for the purpose, they may reasonably expect us not only not to interfere with such arrangement, but to afford any facilities in our power to the despatch of such vessel's mission.

In the contemplated legislation, the matter is now under discussion in both Houses of Congress, restricting the export of cotton and other produce except for account of the Government. A special exception will doubtless be made in favour of all our foreign cotton creditors.

At first blush it may have appeared to many persons that the assumption, by the Confederate Government, of the entire direction of the foreign commerce of the country, was too violent an interference with the operations of private enterprise. We have on several occasions pointed out that the abnormal position in which the Confederacy was placed deprived such an objection of all the weight which it would have under ordinary circumstances and until the natural laws of trade are forcibly suspended. At present, we believe, the wisdom and the justice of the course adopted by the Confederate Government are universally recognised; and since all fears are removed that this course might interfere with pre-existing obligations or private rights, the expediency of the measure meets no longer with any opposition. Its beneficial effects have already been abundantly felt by those to whom Confederate interests are intrusted abroad, and from the multitude of propositions submitted to them they could scarcely select one so likely to place the Government in a more advantageous financial position than it has enjoyed since the beginning of the war. This, coupled with the gradual absorption of the home currency, which has now commenced by a system of taxation practically amounting to the calling in of two-thirds of the circulating medium and the consequent appreciation of the remainder, warrants the confident prediction that an entirely new era of Confederate credit has been auspiciously inaugurated. This is done, literally, to the advantage of every class that have had dealings with the Confederacy. The holders of contracts entered into before the passage of the prohibitory measures, are benefited by being freed from the risks of competition; the commercial public at large by dealing henceforth with the Government directly and without the interposition of third parties. But it is, of course, especially the policy of the Confederate Government to favour, by every legitimate means, the bondholders who trusted it in the hour of its greatest need; and the success which has attended such experiments as that of the Denbigh, to bring out cotton under the Erlanger loan, renders it not only certain that the bonds of that loan will experience a steady and rapid rise, but also exceedingly probable that the greater part, if not the whole, will ere long be absorbed and disappear from the market, thus presenting to the world the unprecedented spectacle of a Government at war paying off its foreign war debt pendente lite.

LITERARY NOTES.

Sir Emerson Tennent's 'Story of the Guns'* is hardly so impartial as a work of that sort ought to be. The writer has an enthusiastic admiration for Mr. Whitworth, who is no doubt a very able engineer, and a mechanician of genius unrivalled in the present day. If this admiration were a little less vehement and obtrusive, the work would be more satisfactory, and would do more effectual justice to the merits of a man who has really rendered great services to the country. The first part of the work, and that which will have most interest for the general reader, has reference to small arms. It carries us back to the time—not many years ago—when old 'Brown Bess' was the weapon of the British army; when it was calculated that one shot in 250 found a lodgment in the body of an enemy; when the soldier's rule was to wait till he could see the whites of his enemy's eyes before he fired; when the fire of a square of infantry at close quarters only emptied three or four saddles in a charging force of cavalry; when a target twelve feet by six was not hit, at 250 yards, by one shot in ten; and when it was literally true that a trained marksman could not, with the regulation weapon, hit a haystack at the lowest range at which rifle practice now commences. No change took place till after the death of the Duke of Wellington, though that distinguished captain and statesman was well aware of the deficiency of the old musket, and in 1851 took measures to have the Minié substituted for it. The Minié did not prove altogether satisfactory, and it was superseded in 1853 by the Enfield. About this time application was made to Mr. Whitworth for his advice and assistance. He was no gunmaker; but the gunmakers could not do what was wanted of them. The problem was not to produce now and then a first-rate rifle, but to produce a vast number of first-rate rifles uniform in character and quality. To ascertain whether this could be done, it was natural to consult a mechanician whose reputation was chiefly due to his marvellous inventions for securing mechanical accuracy. Before his time the 50th part of an inch was an almost inappreciable error; he had contrived machinery for detecting and rectifying errors of $\frac{1}{10000}$ (·0001) of an inch. Mr. Whitworth took up the matter with great earnestness; he induced the Government to build him a rifle gallery near Manchester, wherein experiments might be tried under the most favourable circumstances; and, finally, he produced an hexagonal barrel, wherein the ball must make a complete revolution in 20 inches—thus obtaining a rapidity of rotation which is found to obviate the principal difficulties which previously attached to the Enfield. At first the Whitworth rifle had one serious defect. Its cartridges were too long—so long that they were certain to break in the hands of careless soldiers, or even in their cartridge-boxes; but this has since been corrected. It has the advantage of carrying a harder bullet than the Enfield, it is made of a better and more durable material, and it has infinitely greater accuracy. At 500 yards it was found that the Enfield, without Mr. Whitworth's improvements, could lodge its bullets, one after another, within a circle of 27 inches radius; the Whitworth bullets all lodged within 2½ inches of the centre. Sir Emerson Tennent inserts a diagram, exhibiting the targets riddled by the two rifles; of which we can best give an idea by saying that, while the Enfield marks are scattered over half a page, those of the Whitworth all lie in a cluster which may be covered by a sixpence. And we believe there is no doubt of the infinite superiority of the Whitworth rifle as a marksman's weapon; what doubts there are have reference to the quickness of firing so essential in actual service, and to the delicate character of the weapon, which is said to unfit it for the use of the common soldier. The Whitworth cannon is made on the same principle; but it enters into competition, and very angry competition, with a number of other weapons, all of them possessing merits of no ordinary kind. Into this part of the subject we shall not venture to follow the author; those who feel competent and anxious to understand the subject ought certainly to read, among other works, this 'Story of the Guns.'

Dr. Sandwith, to whom the public were indebted some time ago for a very interesting narrative of the siege of Kars, has published what we suppose must be called by courtesy a tale of Turkish life.† Its hero is an Italian adventurer of the medical profession, who seeks employment in Turkey, and endeavours to ingratiate himself with Beys and Pashas by the basest arts. As a fiction, the work has no merit whatever. Every one you meet in its pages is a scoundrel, and the hero is perhaps the greatest scoundrel of all. Not a single virtue is allowed to any one of the many Turks introduced upon the scene, from the Grand Vizier downwards; nor is there a character in the book in whose fortunes it is possible to take the slightest interest. But the 'Hekim Bashi' is not to be judged as a tale. It is simply a two-volume pamphlet on the evils of Ottoman dominion; and a more violent, abusive, and unreliable pamphlet it has not often been our lot to read. If we are to believe Dr. Sandwith, the government of Turkey, from the capital to the remotest provinces, is not bad, not tyrannical, not iniquitous or corrupt, but simply diabolical, directed to no other purpose than the misery of the people and the impoverishment of the country. Murder, rape, and robbery are not merely frequent outrages very ill-repressed and very little regarded—they are the daily occupation and nightly amusement of every servant of the Sublime Porte, from the Minister of State down to the cadi of the village. Every Turk is corrupt beyond all Western precedent, living only to rob his inferiors, and purchasing permission to do so by sharing his gains with those above him: all are cruel without provocation, and dishonest without limit; their sensuality is loathsome beyond description, their ignorance is profound, and their degradation hardly less vile than that of the African savage. We do not hesitate to say that it is simply impossible that a tithe of what the author would have us believe can be true. When we find that he attributes the massacres in Syria to the instigation of the Ottoman Government, and altogether ignores all misconduct and provocation on the part of the Maronites, we need hardly trouble ourselves to pay more attention to the remainder of his diatribes than we should accord to Mr. Urquhart's account of Lord Palmerston's treasonable compact with Russia, or to Mrs. Stowe's descriptions of Southern slavery. The exact truth in regard to the government of the Turks is not easily to be ascertained; but we believe that all unprejudiced Europeans who know the country agree that it is abominably ill-governed, a little worse than Greece was governed by Otho, and not quite so ill as Naples was governed by Ferdinand II.—that the Turks are frequently corrupt, generally tyrannical, and almost always given to disgusting sensuality, but that the Greeks are quite as corrupt and cruel, rather more bestial, and—which the Turks are not—cowardly and treacherous. Such extravagant representations as those of Dr. Sandwith only injure the cause they are intended to serve; independently of which, it is not to be tolerated that heinous accusations against a whole nation should be preferred under the guise of fiction. The license accorded to the novelist must be used for its proper ends, not perverted to serve the purposes of international animosity or political malice.

We trust that some of the morbid interest which, a few years back, attached to the criminal class, and particularly to female criminals, has died out; and that the interest which is still felt in one of the most difficult of the social problems which this generation is called upon to solve is rather of a political than of a philanthropic character. So far as legislators and administrators are concerned, there is no proper place for sympathy in dealing with convicts. They are not misguided and much-tempted brethren who in a moment of weakness have fallen into error, but enemies of society, peace, property, and industry, against whom we must wage a constant and unsparing war. They are not sinners by misfortune, but criminals by trade; and the first thing to be done is to teach them, by sharp and painful lessons, that their trade will not pay—that it involves severer sufferings and worse privations than attend on the career of the honest but unskilled labourer. Having taught them this lesson effectually, we may busy ourselves with finding them other occupation; but it would be sheer waste of time to do this till we have taught them that they must perforce abandon the old. Those who have learnt this much may read 'Jane Cameron'* with advantage; it is a work which throws a good deal of light on a part of the task in hand which, though not extensive, is beset with peculiar difficulties. The female thief is a very curious specimen of human nature, and differs more widely from ordinary women than the burglar or the footpad from the common run of men. In prison she is especially difficult to manage. She is liable to fits of ungovernable fury, in which she will do all possible mischief for mischief's sake; and the prompt and sharp remedies which are applied to outbreaks among men cannot be employed against the other sex. Hence 'breaking out'—that is, an ebullition of sudden and apparently causeless fury, in which the criminal destroys her bedding, window, clothing, and everything within reach, and finally screams with all her force till utter exhaustion silences her—is a regular incident of female life in prison, and the worst trouble and terror of the officers of female prisons. The dark cell is not found an effectual preventive, and one woman after another breaks out until prison officers are fain to relax the already mild discipline of the gaols as the only method of obtaining peace. The same peculiarities of temper which make the female convict so uncontrollable in prison, place extreme difficulties in the way of all efforts to reclaim her afterwards. Happily the number of female criminals is comparatively small, and their line of life does not include as a rule the more formidable class of crimes; so that, if sufficiently deterrent influences can be brought to bear upon the men, the women may safely be left to the care of the philanthropists, and to that dread of the monotony and solitude of a prison which is much stronger in them than in the other sex. We are sorry to say that the Prison Matron betrays an inclination to regard the criminal with too much compassion and too little severity—to think less of what is due to the protection of the innocent than of what may be done for the benefit of the guilty. But she is a very truthful relator of facts; and her book, while it possesses a good deal of the merits and interest of a well-conceived fiction, gives substantially a true and useful picture of a character which may be considered typical of a large class of thieves. It has this further value, that it exposes incidentally some very common and pernicious delusions in regard to prison discipline; among others, the delusion that mere good conduct and obedience to rules in prison is any test of merit or any proof of an honest intention to lead a better life after release.

'Peculiar'† is a work of which it would be difficult to speak in terms too condemnatory, if it were to be regarded as the production of an accountable being. Abolitionist tales are always full of falsehood and lewdness; but this certainly outdoes all that we have ever read. We need hardly say that it depicts the slaveowners as at once ruffians and cowards, while the Abolitionists—the 'hellfire and Greek-fire' party—figure as gentlemen of the mildest temper and the noblest spirit. The reader will be surprised, however, to learn that Mr. Lincoln is pronounced to be intellectually the superior of Mr. Davis; and that certain conversations between the Southern President and one of the villains of the book are invented to confirm this novel assertion. This is a transgression of the laws of literary decency which ought not to pass unnoticed, and to which we wish to direct the attention of Messrs. Hurst & Blackett. It is open to them to publish, if they choose, the loathsome imaginations of morbid sensuality; it is open to them to print assertions of 'facts' the most monstrous on the authority of 'respectable' Abolitionists who dare not give their names. These are matters of which they are the fittest judges. But no respectable firm has a right to publish a book in which language which he never used is put into the mouth of a living man—in which a distinguished statesman is vilified as the associate of imaginary scoundrels.

'Mr. and Mrs. Falconbridge'* is a novel not without merit. It is not very interesting. It opens with large promises of a future which never arrives, and it turns upon a clumsy device by which a sister is made to pass as a wife—a stratagem which, it is needless to say, belongs as completely to the realm of the impossible as the female pages of mediæval romance. But the tale is well written; the characters are natural, and the story runs easily onward to its dénouement. It is altogether unworthy of the reputation of Hamilton Aidé, but it would do credit to a writer who had earned less credit already.

Major Evans Bell is one among several of our Indian administrators who condemned the annexations of Lord Dalhousie, and stoutly maintained the righteousness of the Hindoo law of adoption. His work,† as proceeding from a man of practical knowledge, without that unworthy jealousy of the public service and the local government which distinguishes the European settlers in India, is well worth reading.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: March 15, 1864.

FEDERAL FAILURES—THE NEXT SCENE OF ACTION—LIEUTENANT-GENERAL GRANT—GENERAL MEADE—ANOTHER CALL FOR MEN—THE STRENGTH AND RESOLUTION OF THE SOUTH—FEDERAL ATROCITIES—THE KILPATRICK EXPEDITION—RESPONSIBILITY OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT—THE FEEBLE ATTEMPT TO DENY THE AUTHENTICITY OF THE DAHLGREN PAPERS—EXCITEMENT IN RICHMOND—THE DEMAND FOR RETALLIATION—THE PRESIDENTIAL CAMPAIGN.

The Confederates at the South are more buoyant and hopeful now than they have been at any time before for two years past. Their arms have been successful at every point on which they have been assailed. Every 'Federal advance' has turned out a failure or a disaster. The losses of Smith in the abortive raid from Memphis are yet unknown, and all official accounts are suppressed; a letter from a Federal officer which has got into print expresses an apprehension that they will amount to two thousand men. Sherman has got back to Vicksburg, and the newspaper accounts make it out that he lost only a few men, and brought back immense spoils, after having desolated the whole country. The devastating part of the story may have a grain of truth in it; but that he achieved this without resistance and without loss, is contradicted by the official statement of the Confederate General Polk, who, with a far inferior force, hovered about him and contested his advance. Under date of February 26, he announces that he compelled the retreat of the enemy, with the loss of men, small arms, and artillery, and still harassed in their retreat by the pursuing cavalry. Sherman was back at Vicksburg, and afterwards in New Orleans, consulting with General Banks on some retrieving move. It was during his presence there that private accounts were received from that city of the great losses sustained by his expedition, which the papers here refuse to publish. The advance of Grant on Dalton has been turned back, the siege of Charleston is virtually at an end, and the army in the process of being gradually transported elsewhere. Texas is almost abandoned by the Federal troops, and Mobile resists successfully the attempts of Farragut to enter the harbour. When he gets there he has heavy work to do to get up to the city.

Western Louisiana is thought to be the next scene of action in the south-west. A large force is assembled at New Orleans, and the visit of General Sherman there is supposed to be for the purpose of arranging a combined effort to get possession of the Red River region, and reach the north-western section viâ Alexandria, in order to force the Confederate State authorities out of Shreveport, to which place on the Red River, near the border of Texas, the State Government has been removed.

The new Lieutenant-General Grant was hastily summoned to Washington, to consult on the means for reconstructing the campaign and retrieving their disasters. He has gone west again, but with the annunciation that he means to return shortly; and the rumour is that he is to assume the direction of affairs on the Potomac, and make the capture of Richmond the first and paramount object of the year's work. It is predicted of him, by those who know him, that he will be another failure, and a more complete one than his predecessors in that place, from McDowell and McClellan, down through Pope, Burnside, Hooker, and Meade. This last general has been sick in Philadelphia, and is not yet recovered. During his illness there has been a great effort among the generals under him to have him displaced, for alleged mismanagement at Gettysburg and general want of tact as a commander. At one time it was positively announced that he was to be removed, and his successor was named: I think there will be no change until General Grant gets back. The Federals have suddenly awakened to the knowledge that they have heavy work before them this spring, and the President is particularly anxious for some military success, wherewith to go before the Republican nominating Convention in June. The failures at all points, during the months of February and March, have made some of the most ardent Republicans impatient with the management of affairs at Washington, and given the President's rivals a sharp weapon to handle against him.

It has been rumoured for some time that, as soon as the present call for five hundred thousand men is filled up, another for three hundred thousand more is to be issued, and enforced by draft. The rumour gains credence from an official letter recently written by the Provost-Marshal-General, in which he states that the excess of volunteers obtained, in certain places, over the quota for conscription, will be credited in the 'next draft.' These words have created a feeling of uneasiness, because the most extraordinary efforts and lavish contributions have been made to get the five hundred thousand call filled up without resort to drafting, on the assurance that it was the last call, and would be ample for all the possible wants of the Government in finishing up the war. To have a call for another 300,000 announced is a shock, and is resented as bad faith. The call for the half-million was, at the time, felt to be the confession that the Government had no faith in its own vainglorious proclamations of the disintegration of the Confederacy, the disorganisation of the Southern armies, and the despair of the people. Since they have struck back so proudly and fiercely, the assumed necessity of an additional enormous force will be taken as the measure of its estimate of its recent disasters, and its increased conviction of the unity, power, and resolution of the South. What do you in Europe think of Mr. Seward's little disturbance of 1861, which he advised Mr. Lincoln to disperse by reading a riot act, and which, after three years of such gigantic efforts as never nation in the world's history ever sustained so long before, still places among the confessed necessities of the Government a fresh demand for this one year of 500,000, and now 300,000 men—800,000 soldiers beyond what can be retained of the enormous force already in the field? And what do Englishmen, whose instincts have been always on the side of the weak everywhere, in the struggles of the oppressed to throw off bad governments, and who now feel so strongly for the gallant Poles, and are fretting with generous impatience to help the Danes—what do they now think of the title to independence of that people who have heroically sustained these successive shocks from thrice their own numbers, and still stand up, not merely unconquered, but undismayed, and resolute, and hopeful?

All the accounts which reach here from within the Confederacy testify to this tone of courage and hopefulness, and, beyond this, to an unflinching and unanimous purpose to let no adverse fortune, if such should come, abate one jot of the inflexible resolve never to assent to peace with the North on any terms short of final separation and absolute independence. The conviction there is, that the South is now stronger in its military organisation, has a larger army, better armed, and fed, and clothed, and supported by a more absolute dedication to the cause of all the strength and all the means of the people, than at any period since the war began.

As the war goes on, the feelings of mutual exasperation which it engenders are rising to a height which threatens to make it a war of horrors. The late raid upon Richmond by Kilpatrick's cavalry, with its attending circumstances of brutality of conduct and discovered atrocity of purpose, created an intense excitement there, which is likely to bring the Richmond Government up to the point of instituting some general system of unrelenting retaliation and reprisal, to compel the observance by the Federal Government of the usages of civilised warfare, and exact for the soldiers, the inhabitants, and the territory of the Confederates, the full rights of lawful belligerents.

The Southern patience has been sorely tried, at different periods of the war, by the brutalities of Federal generals in various quarters, in treating the Southern country as a mere field for depredation, and its inhabitants as outlaws. The Government at Richmond steadily resisted the popular cry that this system of warfare should be met by one equally stern and unsparing. Of late these practices have come to be all but universal; every inhabitant of the South, whom a Federal force can reach, is held to be stripped at once of his right to property and life, unless he will renounce his Government and swear fealty to its enemies. It has evidently become a settled maxim of the Federal Government that the Southern Confederacy is only to be successfully assaulted by making a war on the unarmed populations, carrying the torch and the sword into their habitations, robbing them of their food, destroying their crops, laying waste their lands, and depriving them of the means of subsistence. Immense cavalry expeditions are sent out, not to meet Southern armies, or to occupy or even to seize the country, but simply to plunder it and leave it desolate. The four great enterprises which Southern valour has lately baffled have here been applauded as important and brilliant achievements, because they destroyed and carried away such immense amounts of the food and property of the non-combatant inhabitants, the aged, and women and children, whose defenders were absent. General Seymour, just before his terrible defeat at Olustee, bragged of the million and a half of which he had robbed the people of Florida. Gen. Smith, driven back with the loss of a thousand men from his raid into Northern Mississippi, is lauded for a successful 'reconnaissance,' because he killed or carried off the cattle of the country, burned 'two millions of bushels of corn,' and 'left the land impoverished.' General Sherman, with nearly 25,000 men, marched across the State of Mississippi and back again, with what loss of men he has not stated; but it was a brilliant demonstration, because it effected the purpose of destroying the food and habitations of the people. No official account has been given; but one of his officers, writing to contradict the rumour that the expedition was a failure, calls it a great success, because 'the entire country through which the expedition passed was desolated, scarcely a vestige of a house, barn, or fence being left behind. Brigade commanders were instructed to burn all unoccupied houses, but the soldiers were not very particular whether the houses were occupied or not.'

After General Sherman got back to Vicksburg from this raid, he went to New Orleans, and was there when the Federal newspaper boasted for him that 'he burned and destroyed whatever he could not carry off. The retribution has fallen heavily on the people of this section; everything which could support the life of man or beast, or contribute to rebel arms, has been crushed. He went empty and came back full.' The hideous vanity of successful crime has doubtless exaggerated this picture. The Confederate troops, though inferior in numbers, were near enough to prevent such a wholesale stripping of the entire country as this fiendlike glee attempts to describe and gloat over. But the demon spirit is there, and the horrible warfare of the Union troops upon the unarmed and helpless inhabitants of the country is a matter for boastful and exaggerated triumph. The seven thousand from Memphis, and the twenty-five thousand from Vicksburg, are excused for the want of any military success on encountering the armed defenders of the South, because they have proved themselves mighty marauders among terrified women and children.

Next, and nearly contemporaneous, is the raid from Washington on Richmond, with some attendant circumstances of its own which identify more completely the highest authorities at Washington and the popular sentiment at the North with the most malignant spirit and atrocious practices the war of devastation. That raid never had more than the faintest pretence to be a military movement directed against the military prison of the Confederacy. It was the special act of the President, without a military object which he could get his generals to approve. Six thousand cavalry were sent under two young and reckless officers with a mission which proves that of havoc and destructiveness. Their track was that of a gang of marauders intent on laying waste everything within their reach which could be used for the sustenance of man, woman, or child. They destroyed or carried away, as far as their hurry would permit, every sort of provisions for man or beast. They broke into barns, and pillaged and burned them, shot cattle and horses, sacked farmers' houses, hacked the furniture to pieces, and, where the humour took them, applied the torch. From mere revenge, they set fire to the dwellings of gentlemen of estate who were absent in the Confederate service. They added hateful personal wrongs, and acts of shocking outrage upon the persons of unarmed men and helpless women. It was, under the direct mission from the President of the United States, more of a Cossack descent on the unsuspecting village of an absent enemy, than the march of a troop of civilised soldiers in a lawful war between Christian nations.

Next to Kilpatrick and the actual commander of the force, most active was Colonel Dahlgren, who was killed in a night march of his troop towards Richmond. Upon his person was found a copy or the original of his plan of attack, and the line of action which his men were expected to observe in their march to, and when they reached Richmond, of which he appears to have had a strong expectation. It contains the following passages:—

'In approaching the city, all the mills must be burned, and the canal destroyed.'

'The bridges once secured, and the prisoners loose and over the river, the bridges will be secured and the city destroyed.'

'The men must keep together and well in hand, and, once in the city, it must be destroyed, and Jeff. Davis and Cabinet killed.'

'The prisoners,' when released, 'are to go along with combustible material.'

'Pioneers are to have plenty of oakum and turpentine for burning, which will be rolled into soaked balls, and given to the men to burn when we get into the city.'

In getting off, 'horses and cattle which we do not need immediately must be shot rather than left.'

These directions might have been given by one of the old buccaneers, starting on a midnight expedition to pillage and burn one of the defenceless cities of Spanish America. They show a horrible malignity of purpose, traced by the hand of an American officer in this day, and directed against an American city filled with thousands upon thousands of women and children, whose roofs he thus devotes to the flames, and their bodies to the tender mercies of the actors in such an infernal deed.

There has been a feeble attempt in the Northern journals to dispute the authenticity of this paper, and to pronounce it a forgery, since the attempt failed, and cannot be claimed as a glorious achievement for the cause of the Union. One of his friends, who accompanied the expedition, has come forward to express his opinion that the paper was never prepared by Colonel Dahlgren or used by him; but he condemns himself and his cause by limiting his denial to the possibility that Colonel Dahlgren could have written the passage about the killing of Jefferson Davis and his Cabinet. 'Stripped of that interpolation,' he says, 'the memoranda and proclamation do not exceed the bounds of legitimate warfare.' Qui s'excuse s'accuse. The defence is a damning confession. The man who can deliberately approve of the design to reduce a populous city to ashes, and turn its thousands and tens of thousands, escaping from their burning habitations, into the hills and fields for shelter, without food or a roof-tree, may be well suspected of a willingness to the assassination if it had been executed. He professes to have been in Dahlgren's confidence, and, quoting from memory of these papers, only protests as not genuine against that one passage. It might be spared, without lessening the common horror for the crime which was meditated. There is no doubt whatever that the whole atrocious scheme was in his thoughts as he laid it down in his papers, and none that, had he succeeded in carrying out the plan, it would have found defenders and eulogists and rewards, as merited punishment for rebellion, and a grand achievement for the reestablishment of the authority of 'the most beneficent Government on the face of the earth.'

In Richmond there is the profound conviction that this paper fully represents the designs of the raiding party. They see in it the natural sequence of acts first tolerated, then encouraged elsewhere, and now reduced to a system of warfare which treats the inhabitants of the Southern Confederacy as detestable inferiors, whom it is a virtue to exterminate if they will not consent to their own subjugation, and own the North as their masters, to whose grace only they are to owe the right to live and to have anything.

The excitement was at first almost ungovernable. There was a popular cry for the summary hanging of the prisoners brought in, who were not entitled to the rights of prisoners of war captured in battle, but murderers, thieves, and outlaws. The President, whose self-possession never deserts him, has resisted this clamour, doubled the guards to protect the prisoners from violence, but has separated them from the ordinary prisoners of war, and reserves their case for graver and more mature deliberation upon the duties which the Government owes to itself and its people in such an emergency.

The Confederates have been long-enduring, but there is danger that their patience will be exhausted, and, finding themselves treated as outlaws, determine to return life for life, and either compel the Federal authorities to return to the usages of civilisation and humanity, or make the war unrelentingly and universally unsparing, as the only means left them for self-defence. The thought is full of horror, but the South may fearlessly challenge the judgment of the world that not upon her lies the responsibility of the crime.

The Presidential campaign in the North has assumed a new shape since I wrote last. After all the violent denunciations of Mr. Lincoln, made by the friends of Secretary Chase in his interest as a competitor for the Presidential nomination, the Secretary has addressed a letter to his friends in the Ohio Legislature, authorising them to withdraw his name; this was done immediately after he received the intelligence that a majority in the Ohio Legislature had declared a preference for Mr. Lincoln, as a candidate is nothing without the support of the majority of his party in his own State. This movement of Mr. Chase is taken variously, as in favour of Mr. Lincoln, and as designed to supplant him by another. His letter contains no recommendation of the support of Mr. Lincoln, only an exhortation to harmony, which may in the progress of events be turned into a plea for setting Mr. Lincoln aside. This is made more plausible by the circumstance that, notwithstanding the letter of Mr. Chase, the partisans who have been supporting him continue to assail Mr. Lincoln, as not fit to be nominated or re-elected. But these are fallacious calculations, and will, I think, disappear in the course of the canvass. So also will General Fremont, who is presented by a large body of supporters as the embodiment of the Federal opinions, on which Mr. Lincoln is strangely supposed not to be trustworthy. He looms up just now into great importance, as a possible point of union, in the Convention, for the adversaries of Mr. Lincoln, or out of it to defend him if nominated. But Mr. Lincoln is supposed to have it in his own power to overtide this obstruction. He may satisfy Fremont himself by a great military appointment, of which he has a great ambition, and he may easily take away the political grounds of opposition in that quarter by professing a degree of Radicalism which will not suffer in comparison with that of Fremont. He has already begun by certain acts looking that way.

Mr. Lincoln's strategy in his Presidential campaigns has been much more successful than his military management of the war. If he plays his game, for the future, with the audacity and skill of the past, there is nothing which can prevent his re-election, and Chase and Fremont will be among the most prominent, and doubtless, hereafter, the best rewarded of his supporters.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: March 6, 1864.

GENERAL SHERMAN AT NEW ORLEANS—AN ADMINISTRATION ACCOUNT OF HIS 'GREAT RAID'—GENERAL BANKS' RUMOURED EXPEDITION—THE 'INAUGURATION'—DEATH OF MRS. BEAUREGARD—DISGRACEFUL PARAGRAPH IN THE FEDERAL OFFICIAL PAPER—THE FUNERAL—PUBLIC SYMPATHY.

The mystery of many days past in this region has been the whereabouts of General Sherman. We have had astounding stories of all sorts about him and his army. He has been everywhere, according to report and rumour; in Meridian, in Middle Mississippi, in Mid-Alabama, and almost in Mobile. He had conquered General Polk, and taken several thousand prisoners. No—General Polk had beaten him, and he had lost the thousands. Rumour was never so rife, or street report so wild. At last, down comes a boat from up-river one evening this week, bringing General Sherman and staff from Vicksburg. The next day a single Administration paper published a flaming account of General Sherman's 'great raid' in Mississippi. It was too extravagant. Sherman had gone out empty-handed into the most barren portion of Mississippi, and had returned with fifteen miles of wagons—say about eleven hundred wagons—richly laden with spoils, and 'eleven hundred mules' (one to each wagon), several hundred contrabands, and his march had made 'the whole Confederacy shake in its shoes.' It is doubtful if this paper credited its own story, which appeared in its evening edition, disappeared next morning, and no farther particulars ever followed. If the editor of that journal did believe his Sherman narrative, he is the only man in the city of New Orleans of so great faith. None of the other journals had the story. It was a pure coinage from beginning to end, and was esteemed as a gigantic joke.

Meanwhile, Sherman stayed here a day or two, and then returned, at least report says so, to Vicksburg. It is probable that he has made an expedition through Wayne and Clarke counties, in Mississippi, found the country too poor to feed his army; his foraging parties suffered more or less by skirmishes and captures, and he returned with no spoil whatever. We shall know by-and-by.

General Banks has been some time preparing for an expedition to Shreveport and the Red River country in this State. Twelve or fifteen thousand men for this march have been concentrated at Franklin on the Teche, and it is said that Banks goes to the front early next week. It is surmised that Sherman came here for a consultation as to this movement, and that, while Banks moves down Red River from Shreveport (when he gets there), Sherman will send down a force from Vicksburg to move up the river, the two forces to do a general 'gobbling' business along the banks. This will be a repetition of the campaign of last year. It is reported that the object of the expedition is the procurement of cotton, and there are those who believe that a positive arrangement has been made, by which the cotton is to be exchanged for provisions—that is, that the cotton is not to be destroyed, but left in the way of the advancing armies, and provisions and other articles much needed in the Confederacy are to find their way into the opened country. It may be that it is intended also to extend the Federal lines, so as to show something more than one-fourth of the territory of Louisiana for the government of the new State officers. Although the inauguration has taken place, there is no legislature, and the Convention which is to revise the State constitution so as to seemingly authorise the extraordinary election, has not yet assembled. Thus do politics, plans for the return of delegates from this 'restored' State to the Republican convention for the nomination of the next President, and schemes for the collection of cotton, go hand in hand with the efforts to 'suppress the rebellion.'

The 'Inauguration,' the 4th inst., was almost as extraordinary as the election of the officers who were inaugurated. There was much of the theatrical about it—a huge amphitheatre of seats in Lafayette Square; five thousand singing children from the public schools (and one Administration paper has published a case or two of the stories current that children who refused to go and sing for the new governor were turned out of the schools); a band of three hundred performers; a cannon accompaniment to 'Hail, Columbia;' at night an illumination of the buildings on the Square; a ball at the Opera-house, and much public and private jollification. The official accounts are quite as extensive as the celebration itself. They give among other things lists of 'old' citizens present—such men as Eugene Rousseau and James D. Denegre, who have published cards to say that they did not participate, and J. B. Planché, who has been dead three years, and Alfred Hennen, who has not been in the city since last spring. I wonder if there can be any humbug in these things.

And if this was a bonâ-fide 'State election,' it is singular that the governor-elect should announce the course of action he should pursue upon questions which (I quote his words) 'may be expected to demand attention upon the reestablishment of civil government and the assembling of a legislature.' The legislature is yet to be elected, and, indeed, it is necessary to cover a considerable portion of the State with the Federal arms before such a legislature can be elected. It is true enough, as General Banks said in his 'Address to the people' on Inauguration-day, that States 'to be permanent must be founded in the habits and the customs of the people,' and that 'like a statute, they cannot be brought into existence by an edict, or decree, or constitution.'

Another 'free' State election will shortly occur in Florida.

The new 'Governor,' as well as all who voted for him, took the amnesty, or iron-clad oath prescribed by the powers at Washington. In taking the oath the individual swears to 'abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President, made during the existing rebellion, having reference to slaves.' Well, the first of these proclamations emancipating slaves declares in so many words that slavery shall exist in this city, and in some of the parishes of this State. Let us see if these men keep to their oath, and uphold slavery in the 'excepted' districts, as the President's proclamation decrees.

The operations of the new 'free' State Government will afford an opportunity for comment by-and-by.

Wednesday evening, March 2, Marguerite Caroline Deslonde, the wife of General Beauregard, died at her residence in Esplanade Street in this city. The following morning the obituary notice appeared, under the usual head, in one or more of the daily papers; and in the evening the Era, which calls itself at the head of its columns, 'The Official Paper for the publication of Military Orders, the Official Paper of the State Department, for the publication of the Laws of Congress, and the Official Gazette of New Orleans,' printed the following article:—

'Death of Mrs. Beauregard.—The morning papers announce the death of the wife of G. T. Beauregard. She died at her residence on Esplanade Street, on the evening of the 2nd inst. This woman has, we learn, been in poor health for the past two or three years, and has required, what has been denied her, the care and attention of the man who gave her his word at the altar to cherish and protect her. He also swore at one time to support the constitution of the United States. He does not hold his oaths in very high estimation, as we find him not only plotting for the destruction of his country, but deserting his invalid wife for years together, and leaving her dependent upon others for those acts of kindness and support that should be given by a husband. We know very little of the life or character of the deceased, further than that she was an invalid, neglected by her sworn protector, and left by him under the powerful protection of the flag whose glory he is devoting his puny energies to sully. But when he is called to his final account, he will have the mortification of knowing that the lustre of the stars and stripes is all the brighter, and his betrayed country the more powerful, for the treason of himself and co-conspirators.'

It was difficult to procure a copy of the Era half an hour after the paper was in the streets. Nor was the article republished with the other matter from the evening edition the following morning. The Picayune the next morning published the following article:—

'Marguerite Caroline Deslonde, Wife of Gen. G. T. Beauregard.—Our obituary column yesterday recorded the death of a lady in this city—so well and widely known, and so tenderly regarded by so many warm and affectionate hearts, that in ordinary times more than a mere announcement of her death would have been made in our columns. Belonging to one of the best Creole families in Louisiana, closely connected with those who have held honourable positions in their country and abroad, known and esteemed by a large and loving circle of friends at the South, at the North, and in Europe, yet to none of these was she so warmly, so devotedly endeared, as she was to her husband who was absent, and to her relatives and friends who, night and day during the years of her illness, have watched by her bedside, have anticipated every possible want, and soothed her sickness with an unwearying devotion commensurate with and comparable with their love alone. When the immediate predecessor of the present Commanding General was in this department, he personally tendered to her an escort and every facility if and whenever she should wish to join her husband. She was too weak, too ill to be removed. The devotion of this lady to her husband, her love for him, was such that she would not allow her family to communicate to him her critical position. Her sorrows and her sufferings have been respected, even by strangers, to the day of her death, and her entrance into the land where there is always peace.

'Not long ago we read in a prominent Northern journal the remark that "war never fails to demoralise and brutalise not only those directly engaged in its operations, but also the entire community for whose account it is carried on." It is a sad thought—sad that we should so harden that we regard with indifference almost the griefs of hearts broken after battles; but sadder still when a quiet, home death-scene is made the subject of heartless comment—where politics banish pity, and where malignity follows mourners even to the tomb.'

And early in the morning of the 'Inauguration' day the body of Mrs. Beauregard was removed from her house to the boat Nebraska, to be conveyed to the family tomb in St. John's Parish. Annexed is a brief account of the funeral, from the Evening Picayune, March 4:—

'Mrs. Beauregard's Funeral.—The body of Marguerite Caroline Deslonde, wife of General G. T. Beauregard, was removed this morning from her late residence, 128 Esplanade Street, to the boat Nebraska, for conveyance to the Parish of St. John the Baptist. A larger throng was never assembled at any private funeral in this city. As early as eight o'clock the street in the vicinity of the house was crowded with people—a very large number of whom were ladies—who came from every part of the city. The house was filled and the adjacent streets were thronged. The Archbishop of the diocese and several priests were in attendance to perform the funeral rites, and the coffin was profusely decorated with beautiful wreaths of flowers. After the prayers, the body was taken to the boat which lay at the foot of Esplanade Street, and the coffin was followed by a procession that fairly filled the street from the levee to Rampart Street. Mr. Theod. Guyol, Mr. Maspero, Mr. Jules Toledano, and Lieutenant Lefort, of the French war-steamer Catinat, were among the pall-bearers, with others whose names we did not learn this morning. Several thousand persons were present. Our limits this evening prevent a more extended account of the funeral.

'It is rare indeed that so large a funeral throng is assembled where all is so orderly, and where not a single incident occurs to detract from the solemnity of the scene. The arrangements this morning were perfect and complete, and the thousands who attended the funeral testified by their presence their sincere respect for the memory of the deceased, and their sorrowing sympathy for her surviving friends.'

There is much more to be said about this funeral procession. The best, the most respectable, the real citizens of New Orleans were there. The French Consul and the Spanish Consul were among the mourners. The French gunboat Catinat made the usual demonstration of respect when the coffin was carried on board the Nebraska. And the vast concourse that assembled to honour the memory of Mrs. Beauregard, in its sincerity and in the expression of its real feelings, was a marked contrast with the throng then gathering at Lafayette Square. As the Era is understood to be the organ of General Banks, it has been suggested that he ordered the suppression of the infamous article that appeared in that journal. It appeared in the 'local' column, and the reporter who is understood to have had the conduct of that department of the paper, has to-day issued the following card, in circular form, and it has been widely distributed throughout the city:—

'To the Public.—It is due to myself, it is due to my friends, it is due to General Beauregard, it is due to refined feeling and gentlemanly courtesy, it is due to the purity of journalism, it is due to the profession of arms, it is due to everything in the mind of man that is generous and noble, that I should say that I am not the author (neither did I know anything in regard to it) of the disgraceful, ungentlemanly, ignoble, inhuman, barbarous, dastardly, unmanly, and cowardly paragraph in regard to the death of Mrs. General Beauregard, that appeared in the 'local' columns of the Era on Thursday evening, March 3, 1864.

'Albert P. Bennet.'

You may well imagine the indignation manifested almost universally among the Federal officers, as well as by the people, at the conduct of the Era in publishing the article. The Times, which is a Federal Administration paper, strongly condemns it in an editorial to-day; and so great was the demand for copies, that it promises to reproduce the article to-morrow.

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris: March 29.

The event which has furnished the subject of conversation in every drawing-room, café, and railway-carriage in France for the last few days is a criminal trial which has just terminated at Aix. Every one in England must have read by this time the evidence against M. Armand, accused of attempting the assassination of his servant, his acquittal by the jury, and his subsequent condemnation by the court, without the intervention of the jury, to 20,000 francs damages for accidental wounding. A sentence in such flagrant contradiction with the judgment of the jury which had just pronounced his acquittal, has taken the greater part of French society aback, and to minds unacquainted with the administration of French law, seems a scandalous mockery of justice. But on inquiry I find that all persons learned in the law agree in recognising the right of the court to make this strange application of an article in the civil code, although it is generally thought that in Cassation the judgment will be reversed. The French jury, unlike the English which decides only on the question of fact, acts as the real judge in criminal trials, and applies rather than dictates the law. Thus a series of questions is addressed to them which their verdict answers affirmatively or negatively. In this case they acquitted M. Armand of culpable intention, but their verdict did not declare that he had not inflicted a blow on his servant's head; the court, therefore, accepting the verdict as discharging him from the criminal intention, marked its sense of his guilt by the infliction of the fine. This is not a parallel case to the condemnation of the Duc de Caderousse in costs for the death of Mr. Dillon in a duel, for the finding in this case was equivalent to accidental death, and the costs were awarded for the awkwardness which caused it. Here the jury of Aix, by whatever proofs it arrived at its decision, was evidently at variance with the opinion of the court, but its verdict has been received with general satisfaction in France. Not so in Montpellier, M. Armand's native place, where serious disturbances have followed his acquittal, and the prefect has been obliged to issue a proclamation to enforce the law. In this contradictory state of feeling it is difficult to form any opinion on the merits of the case, for the medical evidence was contradictory, given for the most part by men who had not seen the supposed victim till long after his recovery; and on the other hand the animus displayed against the accused by the public prosecutor and judges carries no conviction to those who have seen that as a general rule the bench joins in running down the legal game. The jury in their deliberations may have thought that the eight months of preventive prison to which M. Armand had been subjected was punishment enough, and may have acquitted him on this consideration. A few years ago a young man was tried for theft, breach of confidence, forgery, and uttering of forged documents. As clerk to a banker he had robbed him of securities worth 300,000 francs; some he had negotiated after forging the necessary signatures, others prepared for sale were found in his possession. He was, however, of a good family, a prepossessing appearance, and exhibited all the externals of deep penitence. The jury were determined not to send him to the galleys, and although the different articles of accusation were fully proved, they found him guilty only of a breach of trust, with extenuating circumstances, which limited his punishment to one year of simple prison. I have heard of another case where the aggravating circumstance of a crime was the tender age of the victim. To the question, 'Was the victim at this date less than fifteen years old?' they answered in the teeth of the registry of births, 'No.'

The Conference finds this week a greater number of backers than seemed probable a few days ago. But if France, in accordance with the avowed desire of the Government to contribute in every way to the maintenance or restoration of peace, has agreed to the English proposals, it does not at all follow that any great hope of a successful result is felt here. To judge from trifles, the irritation against the English Government is as great as ever. The Charivari continues its attacks on old Lady England's stuffed lion and buttoned trident, and Lord Palmerston is attacked by name. One of these caricatures represents a Prussian officer on his charger quietly smoking his cigar. A huge umbrella and a hand belonging to an unseen figure are in front of him, the hand holding in leash a vixenish terrier, on whose hat surmounting the human head (Palmerston's) is written the motto, 'He barks, but don't bite.' Such personal caricatures are seldom allowed here.

The managers of the late elections seem rather afraid of the red phantom they have raised, and their organs have been proving to their readers that they only put forward two members of the provisional government of '48 for want of better men. The Presse announces that a Senatus consultus will prohibit the publication of any remarks whatever on the debates in the Senate or Chamber henceforward. This and the closing of the literary readings or lectures in the Salle Barthélemy, given in aid of the wounded Poles, are supposed to be decisions taken in consequence of the elections, but this we may be allowed to call a rather forced interpretation at least of the measure affecting the newspapers which has been long spoken of and is not yet become a fact.

The last news from the scenes of war in America has recalled attention to the transatlantic struggle; and while the heroic determination of the South to defend their territory, as the volunteers defended France in '92, calls forth the admiration of the journals which represent the various categories of official persons, the Opinion Nationale, which may be called the Moniteur of the United States Legation, becomes querulous and threatening. It publishes in last night's number the correspondence between MM. Drouyn de Lhuys and Dayton on the subject of four vessels which are in course of construction at Nantes, it is supposed on account of the Confederate Government. The writer of the article, evidently dictated by the United States Legation, does not state where the despatches, three in number, which he prints, are taken from, nor where others to which he refers are to be found. They may be contained in some American blue-book which I have not heard of; if not, whatever the value of documents whose authenticity seems from the context to be denied by their supposed authors, the publication of despatches from two French ministers can hardly be otherwise than very offensive. Jonathan was never famed for his observance of the courtesies of international life, but this seems a breach of the proprieties which even the difficulties he is floundering in will hardly excuse.

I find the Indépendance Belge bearing witness to the sympathies felt in official circles here for the Confederate cause, sympathies which it does not by any means share. In a recent letter from Paris it is said: 'I need not remind you that the sympathies of the semi-official world here have always been favourable to the cause of the South. In this sphere the favourable news lately received has caused general satisfaction and is implicitly relied upon. But —' and he goes on to prove that no confidence should be placed in them; the telegrams, more than confirming the news to which he refers, appearing in the next number of the paper. There are some writers who have a real talent for predicting bad news when good is on the eve of arriving. The Opinion never publishes a prediction of the approaching triumph of the North, or the utter prostration of the South, that the next day does not bring information which seems expressly intended to upset the writer's arguments.

The Opinion Nationale devotes an article to the new Emperor of Mexico. It begins by praising the spirit of adventurous chivalry which lead him to exchange the splendid ease of his position of an Austrian Archduke for the labours of government. The good impression he has everywhere left behind him, and even in Italy, proves that he is no vulgar character.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Manchester: March 30, 1864.

The following observations upon the spread of Southern sympathy in the cotton districts are from a gentleman who has just returned from a tour through some of the chief manufacturing towns in the north of England:—

'Some twelve months ago the Northern party, by means of its unscrupulous agents, and with the assistance of its not too nice ally (the Union and Emancipation Society), opened a seemingly successful campaign, for the purpose of convincing Lancashire that the Federal cause was the cause of right and justice, and, therefore, worthy of the best sympathies of a liberty-loving population. No measures were left unadopted, no artifices were left unresorted to—even including the theatrical but unappreciated display of beneficence in distributing American flour to our starving operatives—that were calculated to mislead the masses, and to win an appearance of favour for the policy of President Lincoln. The Rev. Chaplain of the George Griswold laboured in the same field with President Davis's negro ex-coachman, and the glorious cause of "universal emancipation" bade fair to prosper among us. Scarcely a town or village but was invaded by one or other of these missionaries from Washington; and whenever an opportunity offered for indulging in the higher flights of declamatory arrogance, a George Thompson or a Dr. Massie was seldom too far off to embrace it. So matters continued for a time, and men, whose duty and interest it was to have checked this state of things, quietly stood by and left it to the press. At length, however, a few working men were found to resist the illogical reasoning of the advocates of the North, and this step was speedily followed by the formation of a nucleus around which has gathered the present Southern Independence Association, whose members now are not only amazingly numerous, but include, I believe, some of the most eminent men in the United Kingdom. The very formation of a Southern Association struck terror into the Northern camp, for it was only too clear that their misrepresentations would speedily meet with a further refutation. The first great overthrow of the Union and Emancipation Society was witnessed in June last, in the Free Trade Hall, when a single placard cautioning the public against the false pretensions of the dissenting ministers was sufficient to neutralise the efforts of that body, and to spoil the grand resolutions which were intended to have been passed at the meeting. So signal was the failure that no attempt has since been made to beguile our people of their sympathies in behalf of President Lincoln's exterminating policy. Happily, wherever the minions of the North have gone, the friends of the South have followed and refuted their misrepresentations, until, as Mr. Hibbart told us at Oldham, the men of Lancashire are well acquainted with the American question. Except in some out-of-the-way locality, the Union and Emancipation Society cannot now muster even a limited audience. Its sometime chiefs of debate have taken wing across the Atlantic; and only one or two speculating speakers are left in possession of the Northern platform, and these, apparently, as much for the love of pence as for the sake of advocating the abolition of slavery. Neither of these remaining champions as yet has shown any wish to face the discussion of the true issues between North and South. It may be said without exaggeration that the Southern Independence Association has served as an excellent medium for eliciting and gathering as it were into a focus the Southern feeling in Lancashire and the adjoining counties. During a visit I recently paid to Saddleworth, a thriving manufacturing town some twelve miles east of Manchester, I was struck at finding that, almost without an exception, the whole body of merchants and manufacturers were in favour of the South. Many of them detailed the losses they had sustained through Northern roguery, and all of them asserted that the protectionist tariffs of the North had completely driven them out of the American market. It would be impossible to find a greater amount of practical intelligence upon American matters in any part of England than in Saddleworth, or a more Southern feeling than exists among its spinners and manufacturers. If any Northerner doubts the effect of the American tariff in causing the disruption of the Union and in driving our woollen manufactures out of the United States, let him take a tour in Lancashire and converse with our people on the spot. Our men of business and their operatives know well that the success of the North would not mean peace or prosperity for Great Britain, but that the independence of the South would mean a return to good profits and high wages.'

Sherman's Miscalculation.—A letter from Mobile, dated 27th February, by the steamer Denbigh, which recently ran the blockade at that port, contains the following:—

'I send you some papers containing the news. The Federal invasion of Mississippi resulted disastrously to Sherman's plan. He expected Polk to fall back upon Mobile; but the latter's retreat to Demopolis saved Alabama. Much property was destroyed along the route, particularly at Enterprise. The usual barbarities were practised, and but few escaped without the destruction of dwellings and carrying off of slaves. Fleming (the superintendent of the Mobile and Ohio Railroad) says the road will be all right again in three or four weeks.'

Defeat of General Sherman.—General Polk's Address to his Army.—General Orders—No. 22.—Headquarters, Demopolis, Ala., Feb. 26, 1864.—The Lieutenant-General commanding offers his congratulations to the army on the successful termination of the campaign just closed. The cheerfulness with which the troops have borne the fatigues and inconveniences of the march, and their ready acquiescence in the orders directing their movements, have entitled them to the highest commendation. To the firmness and good conduct of the men, and the skill and judgment of their officers in checking the enemy's march, the Commanding General is indebted for securing the public stores and depriving the enemy of the use of the railroads and other facilities for foraging and subsistence. The concentration of our cavalry on his column of cavalry from West Tennessee formed the turning point of the campaign. That concentration broke down the only means of subsisting his infantry. His column was defeated and routed, and his whole force compelled to make a hasty retreat. Never did a grand campaign, inaugurated with such pretensions, terminate more ingloriously. With a force three times that which was opposed to its advance they have been defeated and forced to leave the field with a loss of men, small arms and artillery. Both their columns are retreating before the squadrons of our pursuing cavalry. The Lieutenant General commanding offers his grateful thanks to the whole army, and trusts that this opening campaign of the new year may be an earnest of the successes which await us in the future.—By command of Thos. M. Jack, A.A.G. Lieutenant General Polk.

The Next Campaign.—Undoubtedly we shall have a severe and trying campaign. With all the obstacles which Lincoln has met in replenishing his army, we shall certainly have a very strong force to contend with. We must not flatter ourselves with other expectations. This campaign is the crisis of the war. We have been favoured with cheering signs in the last few weeks—signs in every quarter of the horizon—that the campaign and the victory will be ours, if we do our duty. But not otherwise! Let every man, therefore, stand to his work and to his post! Let our soldiers resolve to finish this year that war for whose whole duration they have just enlisted so nobly! Let every man who is wanted to swell our ranks, hasten to take his place. Let the producer drive the spade, and hurry the plough, and hold it his duty, as he loves his country and fears his God, to make every bushel and every pound of food and provender of which his soil and his labour are capable. We have a great work to do, and this is the year in which it must be done. Lincoln's hordes are pressing us on every hand. They come with sword and fire, with robbery and confiscation. We must withstand them, and drive them back, and we must disappoint those schemes of starvation of which an honourable foe would burn with shame to be even suspected. We must do all this, or we are ruined for ever—ruined as a people were never ruined before. We are sufficient for the great work, if we put forth united, energetic efforts. God has recently given many tokens of his favour, to steer and to rouse us to a glorious exhibition of public virtue and manliness. Let us accept them in this light, and not pervert them into snares for our injury, by sinking into false security. 'The Philistines be upon thee, Samson'—it is no panic alarm to declare this. But thank Heaven, our Samson's locks are not short. Let him but arouse himself, and put forth that full vigour of which we now enjoy the pleasing signs and promise, and all will be well.—Richmond Sentinel, Feb. 29.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

The state of the money market is just now exceptional. The revenue payments are absorbing large sums, and consequently the influx of currency into the Bank is proportionate. The pressure, though temporarily severe, will not be continuous, because the April dividends will shortly be in course of distribution. It is quite certain, however, that no immediate reduction in the rate can be anticipated, since we have yet to see the effect of the 4th of the month, and the readjustment of advances recently made by the Bank. In the present state of things we may look for full terms without any substantial stringency, though from time to time we expect to see occasional apprehension respecting a rise in the Bank minimum. As companies still come out they will assist to absorb capital, and in the case of the credit and financial institutions, they are already trenching upon the ground hitherto occupied exclusively by bankers and the discount companies. At the Stock Exchange there has been a much better enquiry for short loans through the full employment of resources in other quarters. Five and a half and six per cent. are the rates charged for loans from day to day.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The bullion and specie transactions this week have not been of so favourable a character as for some time past; but still there is nothing to create alarm, although it may for a time have the effect of delaying the anticipated reduction in the rate of discount. There has not been any gold sent into the Bank this week, but the withdrawals have amounted to 126,000*l.* for transmission abroad. The arrivals of specie, on the other hand, have been to a fair extent, having reached 930,852*l.*, of which 798,000*l.* is from the West Indies and Pacific, 72,612*l.* from Australia, and 60,240*l.* from New York. The Ellora, which left on Monday for the East, took out 411,000*l.*, of which 307,000*l.* was in silver for Bombay, and 83,000*l.* in gold. 21,000*l.* in gold has been sent to Alexandria. The silver market has shown increased activity; that brought by the previous West India mail was sold at $61\frac{1}{2}d.$ per oz., but since then further telegrams have been received from India, which has caused more firmness, and the price has advanced to $61\frac{3}{4}d.$ The Mexican dollars have not yet been disposed of, and the nominal price is as previously quoted.

BANK MEETING.

At a special meeting of the shareholders in the Ionian Bank, power was given to increase the capital by 150,000*l.*, in 6,000 shares of 25*l.* each; half to be allotted pro rata to the shareholders at par, and the other half to the public at a premium.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

Business in the English Stock Market—indeed, in all monetary circles—has been exceedingly limited this week, in consequence of the intervention of the Easter holidays. On Friday, of course, all places of public business were closed, and on Monday there was another holiday on the Stock Exchange, and during the remainder of the week there has been very little doing. Although there is no quotable alteration in prices, the market for the English Funded Securities is not quite so firm, Consols closing at $91\frac{3}{8}$ to $91\frac{1}{2}$ for money, and $91\frac{1}{2}$ to $91\frac{5}{8}$ for the account. Exchequer Bills are unchanged at 8*s.* to 3*s.* dis. In the Foreign Stock Market business has also been dull, with very little variation in prices. The chief transactions have been in Mexican, which have exhibited some fluctuations, according as the reports with regard to the New Loan have been read favourably or otherwise. The meeting of the existing bondholders, which was to have taken place to-day, is postponed till Monday next, by which time it is hoped something definite may be announced on the subject of the loan. The latest rumours were—on the one hand, that the proposed terms will be satisfactory to the bondholders, and on the other, that the negotiations for the loan are likely to prove abortive. The stock closed this evening at $44\frac{1}{2}$ to 45, which is precisely the same as on this day week. There has not been much doing in Greek Securities, and the quotation remains steady at $23\frac{1}{2}$ to 24. Spanish Passives are $35\frac{3}{4}$ to 36, being an improvement of $\frac{3}{8}$ per cent., and the Certificates are $13\frac{1}{8}$ to $13\frac{3}{8}$, being $\frac{1}{4}$ better. Turkish descriptions are unchanged, the stock of 1854 being 93 to 94, and that of 1862 at $71\frac{1}{4}$ to $71\frac{3}{4}$.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market for this security has been fairly active during the last few days, and the price is again rising—we quote to-day 54 and 55, with a firm appearance.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The transactions in American Government and Railway Securities have been unusually limited, and prices continue to show weakness. The consecutive accounts of the successes of the Confederate army prevent the dealers from operating at present to any extent in this description of stocks. The only dealings recorded are the following:—Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York section, at 82, 81, 80, and $80\frac{1}{2}$; ditto, Pennsylvania section, $81\frac{3}{4}$, 82, $82\frac{1}{2}$, and 82; Erie, $100 shares, all paid, $68\frac{1}{2}$, $67\frac{1}{2}$, 69, and $69\frac{1}{2}$; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 17; ditto, all paid, 73; Panama Railway, second mortgage, $102\frac{3}{4}$; Pennsylvania Railway bonds, 6 per cent., second mortgage, $87\frac{3}{4}$ and 88.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Business in the British Railway Share Market has been dull, but nevertheless a fair amount of transactions have been recorded, and on the whole prices show an improvement, though in a number of instances there has been a falling off. To-day the chief business has been with regard to the half-monthly settlement. As compared with this day week there has been an improvement of 3 per cent. in North London; of 2 per cent. in Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, and Vale of Neath; of 1 per cent. in Great Northern; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in South-Eastern; and of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Metropolitan. On the reverse side there has been a decline of 1 per cent. in Edinburgh and Glasgow; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire; of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Great Eastern, London, Chatham, and Dover; and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in North Eastern (Berwick) and ditto (York). Foreign railway shares have not been much enquired for, and prices, if anything, are slightly weaker; but a better business has been done in Colonial shares, though values do not exhibit much change.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A prospectus has been issued by the Financial Corporation, inviting subscriptions for shares in the European Central Railway Company, the capital being fixed at 1,400,000*l.*, with a first issue of 700,000*l.* in 17,500 shares of 40*l.* or 100*f.* each; the remaining 700,000*l.* to be raised subsequently in shares, bonds, or obligations, as may be considered advisable. The route is described as the first connecting link between the North and South of Europe, and as affording the shortest and most convenient connection between England, China, and Australia. The route is to run from Chiasso to Biasca, in the canton of Tessin, Switzerland, with the design of extending the line to Lucerne by the Alpine Pass of the St. Gothard, or to Coire by the Pass of the Luckmaniers, thus forming a junction with the system of railways of Central Europe.—The prospectus has been issued of the West Worthing Investment Company (limited), with a capital of 250,000*l.*, of which 150,000*l.* is to be first subscribed, in shares of 25*l.* The object of the undertaking is to supply an admitted deficiency of houses of a superior class at Worthing, by a purchase of 100 acres of land, with a sea frontage of nearly one mile, and to adapt it to building purposes, the Directors being also empowered to sell houses built upon the estate to shareholders, receiving in payment, in whole or in part, the shares of the Company at par.—The prospectus of the North-Western Bank of Liverpool (limited) has just been circulated. The capital asked for is 2,000,000*l.* in 100,000 shares of 20*l.* each. The first issue will be for 50,000 shares only. The deposit on application is to be 1*l.* per share, and on allotment 1*l.* 10*s.* The object of the undertaking is to carry on and extend the old-established business of Messrs. Moss & Co., who will completely identify their interests with those of the new bank, and they give their aid in the conduct of its affairs, 20,000 shares at par being retained by Messrs. Moss, of which 16,000 will be included in the first issue, and 4,000 are to be allotted at a future period.—The Port Augusta and Northern Railway Company of South Australia have issued a prospectus, asking for a capital of 300,000*l*. in 60,000 shares of 5*l*. each, for the purpose of constructing a line under the powers of an act of the legislature of the colony, granting 128,000 acres of land for 100 miles of railway. The route is to be from Port Augusta into the mineral and pastoral districts north of the said port.—The prospectus has been issued this evening of the National Financial Company (Limited). The first capital is to be 500,000*l*. in 10,000 shares of 50*l*. each. Deposit on application 1*l*. per share, and on allotment 4*l*. As the operations of the Company increase, further issues of shares will be made, which in the first instance will be offered to the then existing shareholders, on such terms as the Directors may deem advisable. The operations of the Company will be of the usual character of such undertakings, and the Directors have already promises of a large amount of support; and a provisional agreement has been entered into for acquiring a valuable railway concession with a Government guarantee. Negotiations are also pending for securing business arising from several undertakings, which will materially contribute to the success of the Company.—The Metropolitan Music Hall Company is another undertaking of which the prospectus has been issued this evening. The proposed capital is 30,000*l*. in 6,000 shares of 5*l*. each. The Company, it appears, have purchased the well-known premises of Mr. Turnham in the Edgeware Road, consisting of the White Lion public-house; the music hall attached, bowling alleys and billiard rooms, with shop adjoining; and it is calculated that the rental from the bowling alleys, billiard rooms, and shop will yield a sum sufficient to pay the rent and taxes on the whole premises.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKETS.

In these departments business has been interrupted by the holidays, which commenced on Thursday last, and did not terminate until last evening. Transactions have consequently been of unusually small amount, and prices have, in many cases, remained little better than nominal. Meanwhile deliveries are progressing satisfactorily, and, with continuously light imports, stocks are still reducing. The cotton market during the last day or two has shown increasing dulness, and prices are tending in buyers' favour, but cannot be quoted lower. The corn trade remains in the same state of inactivity as noticed for some time past, ample home supplies throughout the provinces diverting the trade from importing markets. American provisions continue to find a steady, quiet sale. Butters are, perhaps, a shade weaker in price, owing to a decline in Friesland and other fine marks of foreign. The best American cheese sells with moderate freedom at 58*s*. to 60*s*. per cwt., and bacon is firm at 38*s*. to 46*s*., according to quality. In American lard there is very little doing. Petroleum offers at 1*s*. 10*d*. to 1*s*. 10½*d*. per gallon for American refined, and 1*s*. 3*d*. to 1*s*. 4*d*. for spirit. Crude is quoted 15*l*. 10*s*. per tun. Linseed oil after advancing to 38*s*. is again purchasable at 37*s*. 6*d*. to 37*s*. 9*d*. Rape oil is firmer at 40*s*. per cwt. for brown, and 42*s*. for pale. Sperm remains at 71*l*. to 75*l*. per tun. In tallow scarcely any variation has occurred, but higher quotations from St. Petersburg have caused rather a stronger market. Dye stuffs in general are at this moment inactive, and at the continental sales to-day only a very small proportion was disposed of, whilst prices were barely maintained. The few transactions in metals have not altered previous quotations except for spelter, which has receded to 21*l*. 12*s*. 6*d*. to 21*l*. 15*s*. per ton.

LIVERPOOL, Wednesday, March 30.—The great buoyancy exhibited in our cotton market last week has entirely subsided; the demand for all descriptions is again limited, and nearly the whole of the late advance in prices has been lost. The sales this week have amounted to only 21,000 bales, of which 4,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 454,200 bales, and to the same period in 1863 they were 105,700 bales. The imports this year have been 408,608 bales, and to the corresponding period last year 285,360 bales. There have been exported this year 70,095 bales; last year the numbers were 70,095 bales, and in 1863, 75,699 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 312,500 bales, and last year they were 208,500 bales. On speculation this year the quantity taken has been 68,190 bales; the same in 1863, 113,560 bales. The comparative stocks at the present time are 307,210 bales, and at the same period last year 393,630 bales. The exports of cotton from China from the 1st January to the 11th February, the dates embraced by the present mail, are: For Liverpool, from Hong Kong, the Juanpore, with 4,252 bales; the Koh-i-Noor, with 7,958 bales; the Dolfijie, with 2,676 bales; the Cornelia Hendrika, with 3,456 bales; the Devonshire, with 9,368 bales; the Bella, with 4,274 bales; and the Norwood, with 4,000 bales. From Shanghai there had sailed for Liverpool the Spirit of the Thames, with 5,840 bales; the Veloz, with 4,072 bales; the Ralston, with 3,841 bales; the Alice Tainter, with 4,343 bales; the Queensbury, with 4,368 bales; the Thomas Roydon, with 5,892 bales; the Isabella Hircus, with 3,480 bales; and the Constantine, with 4,642 bales. For London from Shanghai there is the Strathallan, with 4,123 bales; the Lansdowne, with 4,577 bales; the Oliver Cromwell, with 3,300 bales; the Oithona, with 5,479 bales; the Wagoola, with 4,232 bales; the T. Dryden, with 3,185 bales; the Annie Archbell, with 4,500 bales; and the Alchymist, with 1,662 bales. From Yokohoma the Vampyre had sailed with 300 bales, and from Kanagawa the Forerunner with 4,728 bales, and the Alexandra with 4,538 bales. The latest quotations this afternoon were: Middling Orleans, 26¼*d*. to 26½*d*.; Mobile, 26*d*. to 26¼*d*.; Uplands, 25¾*d*. to 26*d*.; Fair Egyptian, 26*d*. to 26¼*d*.; and Surats, 10*d*. to 23¼*d*.

The markets at Manchester have been exceedingly dull during the week, business having been for some days entirely put a stop to by the Easter holidays. The improvement in prices noticed last week has been entirely put a stop to, the market having been seriously affected by the large arrivals of cotton at Liverpool. Within the last day or two there has been a slight increase in transactions in shipping yarns, at the full prices of last week, a quantity of yarns having been sold for delivery in May. Home-trade yarns are very quiet, with a small amount of business doing, but without much alteration in values. The cloth market is in a very depressed state; but the Indian telegrams and letters to hand report on the whole a more favourable state of things in that market, and have caused a little more cheerfulness. There has been a little enquiry for fabrics for India, and a small business in this has taken place. The demand, however, was not general, and business could only be transacted where sellers were willing to accept the lowest quotations. There are but few orders in the market, and what little disposition there is to do business is chiefly on speculative accounts.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

TWO Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General Jackson, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. Foley, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for 1,000*l.*, while 500*l.* may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for 1,500*l.* a complete Statue of 'Stonewall' Jackson, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for 'General Jackson's Statue,' at Messrs. Coutts & Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

THE Australasian left gold rising. The passage of the 'Gold Bill' by Congress checked only for a moment, if at all, its upward tendency. The elevation of General Grant to the supreme military dictatorship has not kept it down. Never, since the war began, has the Northern press given such signs of discouragement, and almost of panic. Some throw the blame on President Lincoln. He 'has checked the forward career of a great people determined to put down a wicked rebellion'—wicked in contradistinction to other and good rebellions. 'He has brought the war to a standstill.' 'He has drained almost to exhaustion the resources of a rich and populous country, and the spirit of a brave and proud people.' The Tribune speaks of the Republic as in the crisis of a desperate struggle for existence. The National Intelligencer mourns over the national folly and delusions. The Herald says: 'We must bring the rebellion to the dust this coming summer, or the discontent of the people of the loyal States may ripen into scenes of violence, discord, and anarchy, and our Presidential election of November next may be the end of the chapter.' A Fremont paper declares that, as the first condition of success, 'Abraham Lincoln must be beaten at all hazards totally, overwhelmingly beaten.' And the Army and Navy Journal, a respectable military organ, takes perhaps a more gloomy and ferocious view of the situation than any of its frightened contemporaries. It speaks of 'the critical and perilous aspect of the times,' and says: 'This double conflict upon which the country is about to enter may well induce serious thought, if not grave apprehension. This division of forces and of energies is weakness. It must diminish the power which the nation requires for the one great essential work—for the defence of its menaced life. Until the rebellion is crushed this nation is in peril—in imminent and perpetual peril. While the rebels can marshal hundreds of thousands of men against us—while in ten States they spurn the authority of the Government and defy its power—we can neither afford to indulge in idle repose, nor to waste our strength upon side issues. While a desperate foe, with drawn knife, is struggling to get at our jugular, let us neither rest nor trifle until his head is crushed.'

This is strange language for people to use who have so long believed that a nation could be 'crushed' in ninety days, but who seem to be making the discovery that crushing is a game that two can play at.

THE Confederate papers received through the blockade and by late arrivals from New York are full of interesting news. Yankee deserters are wandering through Florida. These poor fellows were assured that they would meet with no opposition, and were promised farms. Some had written to their families to join them. In the battle at Ocean Pond, the negro troops which were placed in front, and forced on by the Yankee troops behind them, had scarcely two companies left to a regiment. One account says only 150 were left of two regiments. The retreating Federals threw away 130,000 cartridges. The work of repairing the railroads destroyed by General Sherman was going on rapidly. Mississippi, by the defeat of Sherman, is almost cleared of her invaders, who scarcely hold the area of one county. The very boasts of the amount of property destroyed or stolen in a march along a narrow belt of this great State are evidences of its wealth and resources. More than 300 of those engaged in Kilpatrick's raid are in the prisons of Richmond. The lead mines of Virginia have furnished 10,000,000 ounce balls the past year, and this year the amount will be doubled. Kentucky is in a ferment; it is more than 50,000 recruits in arrears to the Federal Government; it refuses to allow the conscription of negroes, and Confederate guerilla bands are organising on the backs of the Ohio. General Hood has left Richmond for his command in Tennessee. Marshall Kane of Baltimore, after a long imprisonment, arrived at Richmond, via Canada and the Bahamas, and has been appointed a colonel in the Confederate service. General the Prince Polignac is distinguishing himself as a Confederate cavalry officer beyond the Mississippi, by dashing attacks and successful raids. General Dick Taylor, a popular officer in the same department, and now engaged in opposing General Banks, is the son of General Zachary Taylor, the hero of Buena Vista, and afterwards President of the United States. President Davis, his son-in-law, and General Bragg both served under 'old Rough-and-ready' in that famous battle. The appointment of Generals Buckner and Breckenridge in East Tennessee and South-western Virginia is believed to indicate an invasion of Kentucky, which would relieve all Tennessee not commanded by the rivers. Brigadier-General Mahone has been made a Major-General and Military Superintendent of all the Southern railways. Confederate guerillas stopped a freight train on the 16th ult. near Nashville. There is a Confederate ironclad on the Red River, and three rams building. All the damage done to Fort Powell, Mobile, by 1,000 shot and shell, was repaired in a few hours. It is believed that the attacking squadron did not get off so easily.

THE statistics of blockade-running at Wilmington show that only one out of twenty has been captured; and such is the nature of the coast, with its numerous channels, that the entire navy of the Federal States could not make the blockade of this single port effective.

THE course of the Federal Government in the conduct of the war has seldom been more forcibly and truthfully described than by one of its advocates, the Louisville Journal, which says:—

> The Republican party, with Mr. Lincoln at its head, has repudiated alike the Crittenden Resolutions, the Chicago platform, and the Constitution of the Union. It has made a clean sweep of all its solemn engagements to the people. It has forsworn itself and betrayed the nation. In order to get into power, the Republican party pledged itself to maintain inviolate the constitutional rights of the States, and, in order to collect a mighty army, it renewed the pledge; but now that it has got into power, and has collected a mighty army, it tears its pledge to shreds, and tramples the constitutional rights of the States in the dust.

IT may aid those who wish to 'keep the run' of the Federal Anaconda, if we point out the position of the numerous joints into which the monster is divided. With the aid of a good map, his coils may be traced as they wind around the Confederacy. Beginning at the Southern point of Florida, there are:—1. The garrisons of Key West and Tortugas; 2. The remnants of General Seymour's force at Jacksonville; 3. General Gilmore's troops on the coast of Georgia and South Carolina; 4. The garrisons of Beaufort, Newbern, &c., in North Carolina; 5. General Butler's force at Norfolk; 6. The army of the Potomac on the Rapidan; 7. The garrisons of Washington and Baltimore; 8. The troops of North-western Virginia; 9. The army of Ohio at Nashville; 10. The army of Chattanooga; 11. The troops at Memphis; 12. The troops at Vicksburg; 13. The garrison at New Orleans; 14. The troops in Texas; 15. The troops in Missouri; 16. The troops in New Mexico. Thus is the monster coiled around some 3,000 miles of frontier, but everywhere either acting upon the defensive or too weak to make a forward movement, and at scarcely a single point in all this vast territory able to hold a position out of the range of gunboats.

THE Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives at Washington is expected to report a series of resolutions reaffirming the Monroe doctrine, and denouncing the establishment of an Imperial Government in Mexico as fraught with evil to the Federal Government. The partisans of General Fremont having adopted the Monroe doctrine as a chief plank in their platform, the friends of Mr. Lincoln may find it necessary to pass some resolutions.

ONE of the brilliant hand-to-hand fights, by which the advancing Federals were lately driven back on Memphis, was the battle of Okolona, in North-eastern Mississippi, February 22. The Mobile Register says the Confederate General Forrest with a force of 2,000 attacked the enemy, estimated at 6,000, fought all day, drove him from position to position, at night repulsed three sabre charges, and completely routed him, with a heavy loss in killed, wounded, and prisoners, and his [illegible] said to have [illegible] horses [illegible] Colonel [illegible] Confederate [illegible] prisoners.

THE [illegible] upon the [illegible] an entire [illegible] kettles and [illegible] raid through [illegible] he claims to have burnt [illegible] corn, and stolen [illegible] several millions. General [illegible] GRANT [illegible] that, in a [illegible] trict of North Carolina, [illegible] of pork, 80 barrels of lard, 75 [illegible] bushels of corn, 5,000 [illegible] salt, and [illegible] Orleans the peaceful inhabitants [illegible] furniture, pianofortes, plate, and jewellery. In Mississippi every man [illegible] plundered of horses, mules, and negroes [illegible] Kilpatrick's raid, near Richmond, [illegible] open and scattered, and [illegible] little children; but the climax of Yankee [illegible] the comparison be not an injustice to the Yankees [illegible] probably described in the following extract [illegible] from a lady of Meridian, giving an account of the conduct of General Sherman's troops:—

> 'My two milch cows were killed, and every one in the town, and for eight or ten miles around, [illegible] horses. There is not a fence in Meridian. I have not one rail left. I do not think you have any idea how bad the Yankees are. I thought I knew, but I did not know the half. They took old Mrs. ——'s teeth, all her spoons and knives, and destroyed all provisions and everything they could not use.' Having destroyed the mills, killed or driven off the cattle, burnt the corn and provisions, and taken the ladies' knives and spoons, it was as well to take her teeth: she evidently had no use for them.

THE great war cauldron cannot bubble long without throwing the negro to the surface as a [illegible]. The Federal Government, while recognising the slave of the loyal States as property, claims the right of [illegible] them for the war, with compensation to [illegible] The Governor of Kentucky denies any such right, and threatens to resist its exercise. [illegible] Federal army, a Kentuckian [illegible] Abolitionism, and the effort to pervert the war from its legitimate purpose—the restoration of the Union—and make it a war for the negro. Abolition members of Congress demand that the wives and children of negro conscripts should be free. Compensation for these would cost the Government $8,000,000. The Boston Courier estimates the cost of the war so far at £[illegible] of sterling silver, which would be twice the weight of every negro set free. Another reckons that each freed negro has cost the lives of three white men, while more than half the negroes have died of starvation and neglect. A correspondent of the New York Tribune says, the negro women and children brought to Vicksburg by General Sherman were almost starved and half naked, and presented such a picture of want and misery as could not be imagined. The poor contraband who failed to guide Colonel Dahlgren into Richmond was hanged without mercy. The negro soldiers taken prisoners by the Confederates were not shot or sold, but placed in cells with their white comrades. Meantime, we have the customs of Dahomey cropping out in Hayti, where eight negroes and negresses have been shot in the public square of Port au Prince for stealing, killing, cooking, and eating children, at a religious festival held only fifteen miles from the capital. The same New York papers which tell us this news are having a lively discussion on the theory of 'miscegenation.'

THE holders of Federal bonds are beginning to ask, with some anxiety, where the gold is to come from to pay the interest. By the end of this year the amount required will be $86,000,000. The only gold revenue is the duties on imports, and these may not amount to half the sum required. Instead of being able to lower the premium on gold by throwing a surplus upon the market, the Government is much more likely to be obliged to buy gold to pay its interest.

The spirit of the South, stern, heroic, and devoted, has never been more apparent than at the commencement of the fourth year of the war, after all its toils, privations, and sufferings. Not only the Southern but Northern journals are filled with evidences of this unconquerable spirit. Thus a correspondent of the New York World tells us, as the result of his observations, that a self-sacrificing spirit pervades all classes. It actuates the rich and the poor:—

The hundreds of women who have sent their husbands and sons to the battle-field; the hundreds of widows who have parted with their last boy, their only support; the hundreds of citizens who have given their last dollar; the hundreds of ladies who have given up their last jewels; and the hundreds of ministers who have shouldered the musket during the last month in defence of the sacred soil, are as many evidences in support of my assertion. There is a captain of a regiment, Mr. Chatard, sending five hundred dollars to a Sister of Charity for the relief of the sick and wounded; there is an Alabama brigade re-enlisting with the oath that they will live on bread alone, and go barefooted, rather than leave the flag under which they have fought during the last three years; Howell Cobb, proposing to sell the Government thirty thousand pounds of bacon and forty thousand bushels of corn at its own price; Wade Hampton, the wealthiest citizen of South Carolina, sending an order for all his slaves, his money, and his estates to Jeff. Davis. Add to this the farmers pouring their crops into the Government granaries, the planters turning their cotton and rice to its credit, the people cheerfully giving up eight hundred millions of dollars of their hard-wrought earnings to be converted into bonds bearing a low interest, and consenting to be burdened with a new issue half as large, and you will have a faint idea of the spirit of devotedness and self-sacrifice which now animates the South. This is not a fanciful but a real picture, rather below than above truth.

Of course, a Government supported by so numerous acts of personal abnegation, by so general a sacrifice of individual will to the interest of the commonwealth, by so many continuous demonstrations of devotion and unbounded enthusiasm, must be strong indeed. It must be strong, not only on account of its own political skill, but by reason of the strength which unfaltering majorities and the support of an immense army, often victorious and never annihilated, must impart to it; strong in the public spirit which pervades all Southern communities and which is revealed to us in the unmistakable accent of their public prints; strong in the readiness with which its armies are filled up; strong in the devotedness of its adherents, flying to arms unrewarded, unfed, and unclad; strong, in fine, by that strength which no word can describe, and which great revolutionary crises alone can produce.

Those who can remember the terms in which the Northern press characterised each successive leader chosen to put down the rebellion, restore the Union, or conquer, subjugate, confiscate, and exterminate the Confederate States—how Scott, M'Clellan, Pope, Burnside, Hooker, and Meade were heroes of the hour, and predestined victors—will not be surprised at finding General Grant 'the coming man,' 'the man on horseback,' the military dictator of a new campaign. The New York Herald long since nominated him for the Presidency: now it declares him the Government. He comes to Washington, says his organ, in the greatest crisis of his country's history. If he has the intellectual power and force, the moral courage to be a Cæsar, a Napoleon, a Cromwell, all will be well. He is the Government, and wields the power of the nation. But the Herald is not very sanguine. It says:—

Two hundred thousand men have been called for, it is to be supposed at his suggestion. Let them be given. We must not stint in men or money now; for this is to be the final trial. If, with General Grant at the head and the struggle as it now is, we cannot put the rebellion down in the coming summer, we can never put it down. Never again, if we fail now, shall we be in so good a position to strike the decisive blow. Before another summer a Presidential election and an unparalleled political strife will tear the country to pieces with intestine quarrels. Let the country understand this, and rally now in earnest to support Grant for a final attempt.

Not a very encouraging prospect!

There are indications that the ferocious spirit towards the South which the North has fostered, may soon be turned upon itself, as it was, for a warning, in the draft riots of New York. The Democratic, or Peace party, will not always endure with quiet submission the outrages to which it is subjected. The whole Democratic party is a party of peace. War Democrat, in this contest, is a contradiction in terms; and when a Democrat professes to be 'in favour of a vigorous prosecution of the war,' the Republicans do him the justice to believe him an arrant hypocrite. No Democrat of the school of Jefferson and Madison can be in favour of this war. And the time cannot be distant when there will be something more than passive acquiescence or passive resistance. The mobbing of editors and destruction of printing-offices, the outrages of soldiers upon railway passengers, and the war that is growing up in every village on the men and issues of the coming Presidential contest, will surely lead to reprisals and conflicts. The Democrats of the West are counselled by their ablest newspapers to organise and arm for retaliation, which even Mr. Vallandigham advises as the only remedy.

The tone of the Northern press is anything but encouraging. The deficiency under the various calls for recruits amounts to 315,000. A few States have filled and even exceeded their quotas, but others, and notably the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio, are largely in arrears. As the period for nominating candidates for the Presidency approaches, the attacks on the Government grow more virulent, and this feeling increases the danger of a draft. Mr. Lincoln is accused of having produced all the calamities of the war by ignorant or interested interference. Even the New York Times admits that 'the huge proportions and rapid increase of the public debt' are contributing 'most powerfully to create and spread despondency as to the result of the war;' while the Herald predicts that the failure of General Grant by the treachery of the Lincoln Administration will cause confusion and anarchy of the worst description—the currency destroyed, public confidence paralysed, civil war at the North, and the hanging of the Radical leaders.

The steamer which left New York on the 23rd brought little but rumours of expected movements. General Lee, largely reinforced, was reported as moving towards the Shenandoah Valley, with the purpose of flanking and attacking the army of the Potomac, or getting in the rear of Washington, or invading Pennsylvania. General Longstreet's forces, twenty thousand strong, and effectively mounted, were reported to be concentrated at Bull's Gap, either for an invasion of Kentucky, or to join General Lee. The Federals were expecting an attack on Norfolk, by land forces and ironclads from Richmond. General Johnston was reported in strong force, estimated at 38,000, confronting the Federal lines near Chattanooga. General Forrest was expected to operate with a large force of mounted infantry, so effective in the battle of Okolona, on the railways in West Tennessee. The only Federal movement reported was the expedition up the Red River, where there was supposed to be much cotton. The river is defended, however, by strong Confederate works and thirty gunboats. General Price has resumed the command of the Confederate forces in Arkansas. The telegraph was at work in Mississippi, and the railway damage being rapidly repaired. The Southern papers are filled with exultations over the failure of Federal plans and expeditions. Among these failures was that of the negro colony to Hayti, which had returned after great sufferings and the loss of about one-fourth of its numbers. The ship Saxon and cargo has been restored to the owners, and it is reported that Lieutenant Donoghue is to be tried by court-martial for shooting Mr. Grey.

Gold, at New York on March 23, was at 65 per cent. premium.

ENGLAND.

The following communication appeared in conspicuous type in the Times newspaper of Wednesday last. Our readers will at once perceive that it derives inspiration from the highest quarter.

THE COURT.

An erroneous idea seems generally to prevail, and has latterly found frequent expression in the newspapers, that the Queen is about to resume the place in society which she occupied before her great affliction; that is, that she is about again to hold levees and drawing-rooms in person, and to appear as before at Court balls, concerts, &c. This idea cannot be too explicitly contradicted.

The Queen heartily appreciates the desire of her subjects to see her, and whatever she can do to gratify them in this loyal and affectionate wish she will do. Whenever any real object is to be attained by her appearing on public occasions, any national interest to be promoted, or anything to be encouraged which is for the good of her people, Her Majesty will not shrink, as she has not shrunk, from any personal sacrifice or exertion, however painful.

But there are other and higher duties than those of mere representation which are now thrown upon the Queen, alone and unassisted—duties which she cannot neglect without injury to the public service, which weigh unceasingly upon her, overwhelming her with work and anxiety.

The Queen has laboured conscientiously to discharge these duties till her health and strength, already shaken by the utter and ever-abiding desolation which has taken the place of her former happiness, have been seriously impaired.

To call upon her to undergo, in addition, the fatigue of those mere State ceremonies which can be equally well performed by other members of her family is to ask her to run the risk of entirely disabling herself for the discharge of those other duties which cannot be neglected without serious injury to the public interests.

The Queen will, however, do what she can—in the manner least trying to her health, strength, and spirits—to meet the loyal wishes of her subjects, to afford that support and countenance to society, and to give that encouragement to trade which is desired of her.

More the Queen cannot do; and more the kindness and good feeling of her people will surely not exact from her.

His Grace the Duke of Newcastle has been compelled by ill-health to resign the seals of the Colonial Office. Mr. Cardwell, who, at the first construction of the Ministry, was Secretary for Ireland, and subsequently became Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, has succeeded the Duke as Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Earl of Clarendon has been appointed Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. His Lord-ship held the same office in 1840, and has also been for five years Viceroy of Ireland, and for five years Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. From our Parliamentary intelligence it will be seen that Mr. Stansfeld has retired from the post of Junior Lord of the Admiralty.

M. Joseph Mazzini has again come forward on behalf of Mr. Stansfeld. He declares that never was any money handed over or sent by him to Mr. Stansfeld for the purpose of helping Greco, Tibaldi, Donati, or any other, in an attempt against the Emperor's life; that never had Mr. Stansfeld the slightest contact with Greco, Tibaldi, Donati, or any other known to Mazzini, implicating him possibly, directly or indirectly, to the knowledge of Mazzini, in any political schemes of theirs. He says that Mr. Stansfeld has been to him a friend of eighteen years' standing, and has deeply sympathised in his aspirations for Italian unity; that Mr. Stansfeld has in his own name and in that of Mazzini contributed money to subscriptions for Italian exiles. Italians too came to Mr. Stansfeld for help and advice. But all this had nothing to do with any connection of Mr. Stansfeld with unlawful designs.

The Conservative party in this country is evidently girding itself up for a great struggle, in confident anticipation of a great triumph. The first signal has been given in one of the strongholds of Conservatism, the county of Devon. In Exeter, on Wednesday, March 30, the leaders of the party in the West of England met at a public banquet. After the customary toasts, that of 'Lord Derby and the House of Lords' was proposed, and Earl Devon responded thereto. His speech consisted chiefly of a splendid eulogy of Lord Derby. He said that 'behind and almost within the present Government there were men whose views he could not but disapprove—men whose antagonism was not obscurely shown to all the institutions in Church and State which his friends had learned to prize—men whose object had been, and that shown in no doubtful way, to set class against class, and to imperil the existence of all those institutions under which this country had flourished.' The next toast was that of 'Mr. Disraeli and the House of Commons,' and to this Sir Stafford Northcote replied. He referred to the position of the party five years ago, when expelled from power by the Parliament summoned under its own auspices, and to the gloomy prospects then before them. Men then thought that the day of the party had gone by. But Mr. Disraeli was a man who did not know when he was beaten; he took courage and rallied his forces, and now they might look back to bygone events and say that he had met his reward. The difference in the position of the party could not be measured by numbers alone; it had gained most in tone and spirit. The present Government had lost character and the confidence of the country. They had come in on a cry of Reform, and now they desired only to 'rest and be thankful.' They had no Church policy; with every opportunity, they had never attempted to settle the questions that so pressed for a solution. As to their 'foreign policy,' on the success of which they had so plumed themselves, why their patent invention, the universal medicine of England's moral influence, had been puffed and vaunted, and the only result was that the name of England was at this moment a byword and a reproach among foreign nations. They had allowed questions which admitted of a pacific settlement to issue in war, and they had used bold and threatening language without any intention of following it up. The day on which the Government must appeal to the people on the hustings was not far off. It could not be longer off than next year; it was probable that it might even be this year. If then the result of the general elections should coincide with those of the particular elections, the Conservative party would be placed in a position such as it had not occupied for eighteen years past. There were great questions pressing for a decision which could only be set at rest by a powerful Conservative Government.

The great banking-house of Messrs. Jones Loyd & Co. has transferred its business to the London & Westminster Bank. The fact became public in the City on Friday last. On Saturday, the 16th of this month, the private bank will transact business for the last time, and the new arrangement will come into force on Monday, the 18th. The premises of Messrs. Jones Loyd will at once be added to those of the Westminster Bank. Messrs. Lewis Loyd and William Jones Loyd will retire from business, and Mr. Henry Newman will join the Board of Directors of the Westminster Bank. The negotiations were conducted, on behalf of the latter institution, by Messrs. Dobree, Catley, and Alderman Salomons. The measure is entirely approved by Lord Overstone.

The Great Eastern steamship has been taken up by Messrs. Glass, Elliott, & Co., the contractors for the Atlantic cable, for the purpose of laying it between England and America. On completion of the work, the proprietors of the ship are to receive 50,000*l.* in paid-up shares of the Atlantic Telegraph Company. It is not intended to make any attempt to lay the cable till next year.

The contest between the Armstrong and Whitworth guns commenced on Monday last at Shoeburyness. Most of the members of the Select Ordnance Committee were present. Of Armstrong guns there were three twelve-pounder breech-loaders, and three muzzle-loading shunt guns on the ground. Three seventy-pounder breech-loaders and a like number of seventy-pounder muzzle-loaders are on their way from Woolwich. Mr. Whitworth has three twelve-pounder muzzle-loaders and three seventy-pounder muzzle-loaders. It is expected that 3,000 rounds will be fired from each gun, and that afterwards the guns will be tested with gradually-increasing charges of powder. The experiments will extend over a period of two or three months.

General Garibaldi landed at Southampton on Sunday last from on board the Ripon, one of the Peninsular and Oriental steamers. He was accompanied by his sons Menotti and Ricciotti Garibaldi, Signors Bosco and Lugeso, his secretaries, Colonel Chambers, and an Italian surgeon. The General was received by the Duke of Sutherland, Mr. Seely, M.P., and a deputation from the Italians resident in England. The mayor of Southampton welcomed him with an invitation to his house in East Gate Park, which was cordially accepted. On the Monday morning Garibaldi rose at daybreak, drove out, and paid visits. At 10 o'clock the members of the corporation arrived at the house of Mr. Brinton, and an hour later the cortège started for the Old Town Hall. The streets were densely crowded with people, every window was occupied, and even the housetops were covered. The shouting and cheering was terrific as Garibaldi, in the uniform of the Italian Legion, was conveyed in triumph along the route to the Hall. The building was crammed to suffocation by an enthusiastic multitude. The mayor was seated in the chair, with Garibaldi on his right hand. The proceedings opened with a complimentary speech from his worship. Then the town clerk read the address of the corporation. The General, in returning thanks, said that, 'without the help of the English nation it would have been impossible to complete the deeds which were done in Southern Italy. What the English did and said, was worthy the eternal gratitude of the Italian people.'

Thereupon, there were renewed bursts of applause, cheers for Garibaldi's son, and cheers for United Italy. Then everyone rushed to shake hands with the General, who at length made his way through the crowd, was conveyed to the pier and embarked on board the Sapphire. The vessel steamed away for Cowes, amid the thunder of cannon, and the shouts of the people. Garibaldi stood on the deck waving his cap in reply.

The General will remain the guest of Mr. Seely till Saturday, on which day he will come to London. There he will remain for a week, as the guest of the Duke of Sutherland, at Stafford House.

At a meeting held at Driffield last week under the presidency of Lord Hotham, M.P., it was resolved to erect a memorial to the late Sir Tatton Sykes. A large number of the noblemen and landed gentry of Yorkshire were present, and pledged themselves to further the attempt to record the respect and regard of the county for the noble qualities of that fine English gentleman. The idea most approved by the meeting, was to erect an obelisk on the highest point of the Wolds.

Cases of breach of promise of marriage are not edifying, but are, undoubtedly, matter of considerable amusement. Certainly, the action tried last week at Liverpool, by the name of Rowlinson v. Gordon, successfully animated the bar and bench, convulsed the susceptible public, and created a fund of delight to the readers of the daily journals. The plaintiff, Miss Eliza Blanche Rowlinson, was the daughter of a Mr. Rowlinson, a retired indigo broker, residing at Liverpool; and the defendant was Mr. William Alexander Grant Gordon, of Hunlow, in China. The plaintiff was twenty-four years old, and the defendant was but one year older. They had been known to each other about the year 1858, but had never met since that date. One day, in the month of June, 1861, the young lady's father received a letter from Mr. Gordon asking his consent to a marriage between Miss Rowlinson and himself. He stated his income at 1,100*l.* a-year, with good prospects; and after a full account of himself, his connexions, and his ideas on things in general, requested Mr. Rowlinson to hand an enclosed document to the young lady. That document was a proposal couched in terms of most ardent affection. The young man was accepted at once both by father and daughter, and the latter wrote an answer which was excellent in the profuseness of its affection, which confessed a preconceived love for her admirer, expressed a desire for an immediate flight to him, and was in every way sufficient evidence that his love was not unrequited. A long correspondence of a most endearing nature ensued, winding up with a note of the 12th May, 1862, from the lover, which contained the words, 'Only fancy, six months more and we shall be married, I hope.' Eight days later, however, a change came over the scene of enchantment, and Mr. Gordon wrote to postpone the match on the ground of the want of parental consent. Subsequent letters were brief and cold, and the last announced that all hope was at an end, for the youth had discovered that there never could be that 'congeniality of feeling between them which ought to exist between man and wife.' Certainly Mr. Gordon was a very clever man to discover that remarkable fact from a correspondence; but surprise will be diminished when it is known that in her first letter to him the lady called him 'her pet' and her 'darling boy,' explained that 'she was a very naughty child,' and stated that 'she knew nothing about money, but that 1,000*l.* a-year seemed to her an enormous quantity.' Nothing could exceed the pathos of the learned counsel for the plaintiff or the dry sarcasm of his opponent. The jury, however, was clearly not romantic, and thought that 750*l.* would sufficiently atone for the injuries endured by the disappointed lady.

On Tuesday last Thomas King, John Carmel Heenan, Thomas Sayers, John Tyler, Jerry Noon, John Macdonald, James Mace, and Robert Travers were tried at the Sussex Quarter Sessions held at the Shire Hall, Lewes, on the charge of having riotously assembled, and of having assaulted and beaten Thomas King and John Carmel Heenan. Mr. Roupell and Mr. Willoughby prosecuted. King, Mace, Calvin, and Tyler were defended by Serjeant Tindal Atkinson and Mr. E. Besley, while Mr. Sleigh and Mr. Gates represented Heenan, Sayers, and Macdonald. Serjeant Atkinson and Mr. Sleigh said that their clients would plead 'Guilty,' with the exception of Mace, against whom there was no evidence. The Chairman thought that it would be sufficient to call upon the defendants to enter into their own recognizances in the sum of 100*l.* each to appear and receive judgment when called upon. The defendants entered into the required sureties and left the court.

Calcutta.—The last mail from Calcutta brings intelligence of a piece of legislation which deserves a passing notice. The new Penal Code had abolished the punishment of whipping, and the effects of that enactment were painfully apparent in the overcrowded state of the gaols, the frightful diseases thereby generated, and the enormous cost entailed. The rate of mortality in the prisons increased to 20 per cent., at least 10,000 offenders were committed in one year for crimes formerly punishable by flogging, and two lacs of rupees represented the additional burden thrown on the State. Under these circumstances, a Bill has been passed to restore the permissive use of the lash. Sir Charles Trevelyan opposed the Bill, which was supported by Sir C. Napier, Mr. Beadon, and Mr. Maine.

Cape of Good Hope.—The Cape mail brings intelligence that the Ariel had sailed on the 25th January for the Zambesi, and would bring down Dr. Livingstone and his party, whose mission was about to be closed. Bishop Mozer was to remain behind to complete the arrangement.

THE CONTINENT.

The visit paid by the King of Denmark to his troops was of happy augury to them, being followed so closely by the successful affair of March 28. Further particulars have been received concerning that engagement: but, coming almost entirely from German sources, they are rather palliations of the defeat, and conjectures as to the reason of it, than historical narratives. The most probable account of the matter is that the Prussians were endeavouring to take up a more advanced position, when they were met by the Danes and forced to retire to their former lines. The gallant conduct and high service of the turret-ship Rolf Krake, in braving the fire of batteries, such as it was supposed must inevitably annihilate her, has received the admiration of Europe and the respectful attention of the enemy. The Prussians have thought it necessary to erect earthworks on their sea flank, as a protection from such another assault from the Danish navy. The loss of the Allies in this affair is reckoned at 172 killed, wounded, and missing; about 60 Danes were taken prisoners. It is worthy of remark, that the regiment which, at its own request, held the post of honour and of peril on the Danish side, was raised in Slesvig.

The whole of the siege train intended to be used against the fortifications of Düppel is now on the spot; and the first parallel of a regular siege has been opened. The good practice made by the rifled artillery is a matter of great boast in the German army; they talk of the destructive effect of a few shots fired at Fort No. 6 by a piece of 24 at the distance of 1,300 paces, or about two miles. The Prussian shells are so constructed as to explode immediately on striking and penetrating an object, while the Danes still use the old time-fuse, and are said to display great skill in the proper adjustment of it. It appears, however, that the game of long-bowls, however gratifying to artillerists, is not sufficiently decisive for the Austro-Prussian aspirations; and a flank movement is now talked of, in which the Allies are to cross over to Alsen on Austrian pontoons, and attack the left of the Danish position.

The operations against Fredericia are conducted with the utmost regularity: the second parallel was opened secundum artem by the Austrians on the 27th ult. A remarkable canard has gone the round of the daily journals, relating that the Austrian army had withdrawn with precipitancy from the siege of Fredericia, and retreated southward. The cause assigned for this hurried movement was the discovery of an extensive conspiracy among the Hungarian and Italian troops to throw off their allegiance and side with the Danes against their common oppressor. So widespread was this rumour that it was thought worthy of an express telegraphic contradiction from Count Rechberg, the Austrian Foreign Secretary. Another report, traceable to Danish sources, states that an engagement has taken place between 6,000 Danes and a body of Prussian troops near Veile, in which the former were victorious.

The anxiety felt by the Germans with regard to the Danish fleet is greater than they choose to confess. We learn that reinforcements are to be sent as speedily as possible to the North Sea squadron, which, by the way, has not yet appeared on the scene of its action: and Prussian engineers have undertaken a regular system of defensive works for the protection of Hamburg.

By the last despatches from the theatre of war we learn that the Prussians have kept up a terrific bombardment of Sonderburg; no notice was given of the intended bombardment, and consequently the massacre of non-combatants has been terrible. Eighty-nine women and children have fallen victims. The cannonade commenced at 3 P.M. on the 2nd inst., and continued for forty-eight hours without intermission. A great part of the town has been destroyed.

The question of the blockade is beginning to attract the attention of the Northern Powers. A notification from the Prussian Cabinet, which we noticed last week, has declared the blockade of the Baltic ports non-existent: we have this week another notice utterly at variance with the former, emanating from the Danish authorities, and forwarded by them through the English Government to the neutral Consuls at Swinemunde. It purports to issue from the admiral in command of the blockading squadron, and declares that on and after the 4th inst. all ships breaking the blockade of Swinemunde, Stralsund, &c., will be liable to capture. To this the Gazette de la Baltique raises several technical objections, and amongst other things urges that the document is geographically false, being dated from the Bay of Stettin, a name unknown in any map of the Baltic. However that may be, it appears that the officers in command of the blockading squadron mean to make good their word, as they have already turned back a ship on its way to Swinemunde. The absence of blockade on which the Prussian notification was founded must then be explained by supposing that the Danes were unwilling to begin the annoying and wearisome task of blockading one moment before it was absolutely necessary.

The Powers who signed the treaty of 1852 have agreed to meet in conference on the Danish question. The German Diet was also requested to attend by representative. Two questions of course arose: first, should they accede to the request? secondly, whom should they send? We may conclude that the first has been answered in the affirmative, considering the awful amount of diplomacy which is being employed on the solution of the second question. The first idea which struck the Prussian Government was that there were no persons so 'fit and proper to represent' Germany as themselves; they therefore suggested that the Prussian envoy should also speak in behalf of the Confederation. The inconvenience of such an arrangement was acutely felt by Austria, who proposed in turn a more equitable and equitable plan—namely, that the minor German States should choose an envoy to represent them all. To this plan Prussia has agreed. Three names are before the public as candidates for the post: a Herr von Pfordten, Foreign Minister of Bavaria, Herr von Beust, Foreign Minister of Saxony, and Herr von Platen, Foreign Minister of Hanover. The two former are pretty well known in Europe, the latter distinguished by the peculiar favour of Austria, but is nevertheless one of the ablest diplomatists, Bismarck-Schönhausen and Rechberg not excepted. The Austrian interest by very much at heart. This is to account for the peculiar disposition shown by the Cabinet of Vienna. Denmark and the Duchies of Germany will delay their decision until they know some of the views to be maintained by the Austro-Prussian party in the Conference. They are not anxious to see the integrity of the Danish monarchy, if any reliance may be placed on the propositions attributed to Russia, suggesting that the present King should be succeeded, to the same extent of territory as his predecessor, that the Duke of Augustenburg should be declared next agnate to the heir-presumptive to the throne, and appointed Viceroy of the Duchies during his life. But there is still a strong opposition to any proposal tending to leave Christian IX. even suzerain of the Duchies: the party, headed by the Duke of Saxe-Coburg, have caught eagerly at the French suggestion of an appeal to universal suffrage, and are, of course, careless of the difficulties in which Austria and Prussia would be placed by an appeal to nationalities. The able envoy presented by Denmark to the Conference, to appeal to the voice of the people, seems to wish nothing else to be present, or to go back to first principles.

Among the remarkable features of the situation in Prussia we may cite the harmony with which the King refuses to take counsel with or be hampered by any of the sacrosancta burgensia, however high may be their merit. He has even refused to create in the army the rank of lieut.-generals-major, for which they have already a precedent in their corps of pensioners. The only exception to this rule, announced by authority, occurs in the artillery and engineers, services which are apparently too degrading, be it said, too useful, for the contact of ennobled hands.

The following edicts have been issued in Poland for the more speedy suppression of the rebellion:—First, an order applicable principally to the districts infested with bands of guerillas. According to it, every proprietor shall render to the military authorities an exact account of the number and nature of the horses in his stables: no transfer of horses is to take place without the express permission of the commandant: furthermore, no person shall for the future ride on any horse, unless he is actually engaged in the Government service, and for further security, all saddles are confiscated: lastly, no bells are to be sounded in any place whatever, except in factories, where signals for rest, &c., can only be given by that means, and in the latter case a list of the hours at which the bell shall be rung is to be posted up under the bell-rope. The two first regulations are intended to restrain the general supply of horses to the insurrectionists: the last is to prevent the warning signals given by means of the bells.

Another order given at Warsaw regulates the use of mourning among the people: nobles may wear it for six months: merchants, tradesmen, and others for three months: but the permission is restricted absolutely to the wife and children of the deceased. Funerals are subject to a municipal tax: the number of mourners is made proportionate to the tax paid: if it is under 1 rouble, 10 mourners are allowed: if under 10, 15 mourners: and so on, 5 mourners for every 10 roubles. The National Government has published an ukase in answer to that of the Emperor manumitting the serfs: it declares such a measure superfluous, as it had been anticipated by themselves (the National Government) more than a year ago: no duty should therefore be paid by the peasants on account of it.

A gallant action was fought at the beginning of the last week at Cionzyn on the Prussian frontier by a body of Poles under Haller. Twice they met a fresh force and routed it: the third time their gallant commander, seeing the awful disparity of numbers, led his small force right through the enemy in a bayonet charge: no sooner had the band of insurgents got to the rear of the Russians, than they dispersed in all directions: the pursuers were baffled by the variety of routes taken by their foes, and the latter were enabled to re-assemble in security.

A Circular issued by the Austrian General Graf von Mensdorf-Pouilly, and dated Lemberg, March 16th, orders that all strangers unprovided with proper passports, shall be sent back forcibly to their own country. All Turkish subjects are to be sent viâ Trieste and the Adriatic, that they may not be subjected to the evil influences now dominant in the Principalities, the hot-beds of revolution.

Our readers may remember that a grave letter of remonstrance was addressed towards the beginning of the past month by the Turkish Minister, Fuad Pasha, to Prince Couza: it treated of the three charges made by the Imperial Government of Turkey against their vassal governing the Danubian Principalities, of having violently appropriated the property of the monasteries, of having increased his army beyond the number fixed by the regulations of 1858, and of having made a general distribution of arms among the peasantry. Prince Couza has answered the letter at some length in an able though not very reassuring manner. As to the first charge regarding the spoliation of the monasteries, he briefly states that it was accomplished by the will of the House of Representatives, and was a measure alike popular and politic: as to the second charge, he refers to the regulations of 1858, and points out that by them the number of the troops was restricted to 7,034; that the number raised by his predecessors was 14,500, and that this was the force which he found in existence on his accession; that the Imperial Government had made no objection in former times, and that consequently it was now estopped from doing so; he then says that the recent measures had no other object than the better distribution and armament of his small forces, and respectfully hints that he has other similar measures still in view; as to the last charge, concerning the arming of the peasantry, he declares that he has only distributed from two to eight muskets to every township, the number varying with their size, for their better protection against thieves and wild beasts. The Prince then delicately insists on the virtual independence of the Principalities, subject only to the tribute paid annually to the Sublime Porte, and to the mutual assistance which it owes to and expects from that Power; lastly, while he proposes to strengthen the alliance between himself and his suzerain, he disclaims any desire to make himself more independent. We may fairly look at this document in conjunction with the recent conduct of the Parliament of the Principalities; a vote of want of confidence in the present Government was proposed in that body and negatived by a large majority; it was generally understood that this proposition was instigated by the Prince himself. Now when we remember that M. Cogolintschoanu, the head of the Government, is a deadly foe of the Turkish suzerainty, we may infer that there is more sincerity in the Prince's protestations of fidelity than some folks would allow. The collection of arms in the Principalities is a very sore subject with the Turks, and they do their best to restrain it. A Turkish man-of-war stationed at the Sulina mouths of the Danube, had occasion lately to stop two ships laden with munitions of war, and ordered them to discharge their cargo. One of them, belonging to the Austrian Lloyd, obeyed the order; the other claimed French nationality and refused; the Turk threatened to sink her, but gave twenty-four hours for reflection: the recusant took advantage of the delay to summon French aid, and at the expiration of the time was lying safe between two French gunboats.

Intelligence has arrived of another difficulty for the Turkish Government; the populace of Bagdad have risen in revolt against their governor, Namik Pasha: the intrigues of Persia have probably much to do with the insurrection.

The Turkish fleet has received orders to cruise in the Adriatic: the town of Parga, the scene of so much fighting and diplomacy in the Greek War of Independence, is to be re-colonised by Turks, and to be made into a military port.

The moment for the ultimate cession of the Ionian Islands to the kingdom of Greece is rapidly approaching. The ports are being blown up, and the English troops removed. The inhabitants are already feeling the loss of British capital, and certain improvements in which a quantity of money would have been invested have been countermanded. The 28th inst. has been fixed upon for the handing over of the islands to King George I. His Majesty is to open the first Parliament of the islands in person. A battalion of the Greek army which mutinied lately at Missolonghi has been disbanded.

Great anxiety has been caused in Italy by the reported loss of the frigate, Re Galantuomo. She was spoken on the 17th ult. by the Star of the West about 250 miles north of the Bermudas, and was then in distress. The English ship stayed all night on the spot, but in the morning no signs of the frigate were visible. It is hoped that she made for the Bermudas in the course of the night.

'The theory of the Dagger' has been lately much before the English public. We are sorry to have to report a practical application of it in the country which has unfortunately the infamy of having given birth to it. Signor Murgia, the Sub-Prefect of Mola, a small town south of Bologna, has been cruelly assassinated. Of course the whole power of the police has been brought into action for the discovery of the murderer, and twenty-one arrests have been already made; but it is a horrible thought that this is only the culminating point of some hundred other assassinations which have already been perpetrated in this small town of 11,000 inhabitants.

Contrary to expectation, the Pope was able to appear in St. Peter's on Easter Sunday, and to give his pastoral benediction to the people: in consequence of the badness of the weather the benediction was given inside the Basilica. The operation performed on His Holiness has been apparently successful; yet all that part of Christendom that acknowledges the Papal authority is expecting with anxiety the day when the Conclave will assemble to elect another Pope: all possible measures to secure the tranquillity of the city during the election have been taken in anticipation.

The Spanish Government are about to apply to the Cortes for a vote of nine millions of reals, to be continued for four successive years, and to be applied to the reform of the army in the matter of firelocks and artillery. It is believed that the present Ministry have the intention of recognising the Kingdom of Italy, and that they will also be ready to acknowledge the new Emperor of Mexico, when his acceptance of the crown is officially notified to them.

The French despatches from Mexico are all encouraging. The town of Zacatecas has been successfully occupied; commerce and animation are returning to Vera Cruz; the roads between that city and the capital are at length secure; the Indians in the South are generally declaring for the empire; Vidauri, the Governor of Nueva Leon, has broken with Juarez and Doblado, and captured three guns and three hundred prisoners from the latter general. He is now anxious to make terms with the Imperial authorities.

The Peruvian Government has addressed a long despatch to the States of Chili and Bolivia, setting forth the horrors of war, and imploring them to accept the mediation of Peru for the settlement of their differences. These differences arose first out of a squabble for the possession of a certain lot of guano, discovered by a party of gold-seekers somewhere in the debateable ground about the boundary of the two States.

The Emperor of Brazil has accepted the mediation of Portugal with reference to the long-standing quarrel between that empire and England.

The precaution taken by the counsel for M. Armand in his trial for the attempted murder of Roux is abundantly justified. The town of Montpellier has been in a state of ferment ever since the publication of the verdict; the witnesses for the prosecution have been fêted and honoured in every possible manner, while those for the defence have been mobbed and hooted. Finally a deliberate attack was made upon the dwelling-house of M. Armand, and the mob would have proceeded to the last excesses but for the exertions of the military commandant, the Avocat Impérial, and the Procureur-Général, who personally circulated in the crowd, and implored them to think of the consequences of their actions. M. Armand may congratulate himself that he was not tried in his native city.

Two trials have lately been the subjects of great interest in Paris; in the first Mazzini was accused of being an accomplice in the late conspiracy against the Emperor's life, and condemned by default. In the course of the accusation several documents were read to prove the connection of Mr. Stansfeld with the affair. The whole speech of the Procureur Impérial was as much directed against the Englishman as against the Italian. The second cause which collected the good people of Paris into the law-courts was based on a demand made by the Duc de Grammont-Caderousse to be relieved from the 'conseil judiciaire' or tutorship to which he was subjected by an order of the Court. The Duke pleaded that he is now thirty years of age, that he has become rangé or a respectable member of society, and that his present little indiscretions are unworthy of the notice of the Court. The Court deferred judgment. The duke's name is extremely well known, not to say notorious, in Parisian scandal. Some of our readers may remember a duel that took place between him and a certain Irish editor of a sporting journal, in which the latter was killed. The Duke was condemned to undergo a year's imprisonment, and to pay an annuity for the support of the widow and children of the deceased.

The death of M. Ampère has vacated one of the seats in the French academy; this gentleman had a European reputation for the belles lettres, philosophy and archæology. Among the persons named to succeed him in the honours of the Académie is M. Jules Janin, the famous critic of French literature.

The theatres of Paris have been relieved from the influence of a 'protection' which was considered most injurious by the smaller places of entertainment. It seems, however, that, under the bracing air of Free Trade, the supply will be so enormous that there will be a deficiency of the requisite buildings. Those who are not lucky enough to secure theatres will content themselves with 'cafés-concerts;' these latter will, therefore, find themselves subject to an enormous competition.

A journal may base its claims for popularity on many different grounds. It may be political, literary, religious, or sporting; it may be satirical or humorous; it may tickle the souls of its readers with broad caricatures, or instruct them by graphic illustrations; it has been left to the French press to overwhelm the world with the gigantic size of their sheets. The monster Grand Journal large enough to be read by four people at once—to be folded round the humble stall in the theatre until the occupier can fancy himself in a private box—large enough to roof a house, to paper the side of a room, to cut up into spills that would outlast the year-long sittings of a club-smoking-room such is the journal which the French nation delights to honour. Everywhere may be seen the fluttering of its enormous sheets, as the public crowd round to gloat over the astounding length of its columns. We do not, however, hear that they also read them.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

ENGLAND AND THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, the Marquis of Clanricarde moved for 'a copy of any correspondence that might have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the Confederate States of North America, relating to the removal of British Consuls from those States, or the cessation of the functions of the Consuls or any of them therein; and of the correspondence with the Consuls thereupon; also, for copies of all correspondence with any agents of the Confederate Government in this country up to this date, in continuance of that already before the House.' In submitting this motion His Lordship said, 'on a previous occasion Earl Russell had stated that British subjects were compelled to enter the Confederate armies, and that British Consuls had been driven from the Confederacy, so that there was no redress for British subjects. This was a serious charge to bring against the Confederate Government, and their Lordships had very imperfect means of ascertaining its truth. Putting New Orleans aside, there were four principal consulships—in Richmond, Charleston, Mobile and Savannah—and the Consuls residing at these places were acknowledged by the Confederate Government on the authority of the exequaturs issued to them by a former Government. The Confederate Government 'did not stand on the formality of requiring letters of credence, but at once admitted them to full access, and treated those Consuls as long and as far as possible with friendship and cordiality.' The British Consul at Charleston sent a bag of letters to Lord Lyons by a gentleman, who also took with him other letters which he could do legally. This gentleman was arrested by the Federals; his certificate as a bearer of Government despatches was disregarded, and he was imprisoned. At length the United States Government apologised for the arrest, but withdrew the exequatur from the British Consul at Charleston. [It is usual with the Federal Government, when it apologises to the British Government, to compliment or promote the offender, or to injure or put some slight upon the offended party.] Mr. Magee, the British Consul at Mobile, was requested to afford facilities for the transmission of specie to pay the London creditors of the State of Alabama. It was the modern doctrine that State payments to private creditors ought not to be liable to the incidents of war, and during the Russian war we discharged our obligations. Mr. Magee wrote to the Consul at New Orleans, and suggested that a British ship was lying at that port, and might, with the consent of the Federal commander at the station, take home the money. The Consul at New Orleans communicated with Captain Jones of Her Majesty's ship Vesuvius. That officer thought the transaction legitimate, and told the Federal commander that he wanted to go into Mobile to transact business with the Consul, who had money for him to take back to England. 'The Federal commander was told the money was going to be sent, and it was put on board before his face.' After the money was gone, Mr. Magee received a telegram from Lord Lyons, instructing him not to send it. The Federal Government was offended, and upon their demand Mr. Magee was dismissed. Lord Lyons then sent Mr. Cridland, who occasionally acted as Consul at Richmond, to Mobile. It was reported in the Richmond Whig that he had a commission and exequatur from the United States Government. Mr. Cridland called on Mr. Benjamin, the Confederate Secretary of State, denied that statement, and assured him that he was proceeding to Mobile to look after British interests unofficially, and without any commission or exequatur whatever. Mr. Cridland also procured the insertion of a similar contradiction in the Richmond Whig. Yet Mr. Cridland was introduced to Admiral Buchanan, and produced an official document, signed by Lord Lyons, appointing him British Consul at Mobile. Upon this the Confederate Government forbade Mr. Cridland exercising any of the functions of a consul with the Confederate States. Mr. Moore, the consul at Richmond, was dismissed, not for protecting British interests, but because he used most disrespectful language towards the Confederate Government, and in consequence of misconduct, or what was considered to be misconduct, on his part. When the Consuls were forcibly dismissed, there were only two remaining in the Confederate States. Why were they dismissed? The war began in 1861. In 1862 a stringent law was passed to enable the States to raise militia. The British residents remonstrated, and Earl Russell wrote a despatch, which was communicated to the Confederate Government, 'in which he laid down sound principles about the injustice of ex post facto laws, and the necessity of exempting from their operation foreigners who were residing in the country, unless they had had notice of the intention to enact them.' In 1862 the law was not put in force, but in 1863 it seemed likely to come into operation, and the British residents were alarmed. From the letter of Mr. Benjamin to Mr. Fullarton it appeared that the consular agents of the British Government had been instructed to assume the power of determining whether British soldiers who had enlisted under the Confederates were bound to serve them, or whether they might not advise the men to throw down their arms in the face of the enemy. It was this intolerable attempt at interference that brought about the dismissal of the two remaining Consuls. Under these circumstances Earl Russell was not justified in making a curt declaration to the effect 'that our fellow-subjects in the Confederate States were driven into the ranks of the army and deprived of protection because Consuls were not permitted to reside there.' He (the Marquis of Clanricarde) did not ask for the immediate recognition of the Confederate States, though it might be a question of grave discussion, if that recognition had taken place a year and a half ago, whether 'torrents of blood and hundreds of thousands of lives might not have been spared.' He hoped before long the proper occasion for recognition might arrive, for he was anxious to see peace restored. But before recognition we might have consular relations. We had Consular agents in the Spanish American States before the year 1820, although it was not until the year 1826 that their independence was acknowledged. But, be that as it might, Mr. Benjamin, in commenting on the conduct of some of the Consuls to whom he alluded, instructed Mr. Mason to call the attention of the British Government to the expediency of instituting a renewed examination of the subject as connected with the relations between the two Governments, with the object of placing those relations on a footing more in accordance with accomplished facts. In reply to these representations, the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in a despatch dated August 19, said he was 'willing to acknowledge that the so-styled Confederate States are not bound to recognise an authority derived from Lord Lyons, Her Majesty's Minister at Washington;' adding, 'But it is very desirable that persons authorised by Her Majesty should have the means of representing at Richmond and elsewhere in the Confederate States British subjects who may be in the course of the war grievously wronged by the acts of subordinate officers. This has been done in other similar cases of States not recognised by Her Majesty, and it would be in conformity with the amity professed by the so-styled Confederate States towards Her Majesty and the British nation if arrangements were made for correspondence between agents appointed by Her Majesty's Government to reside in the Confederate States and the authorities of such States.' Now, that was exactly what Mr. Benjamin had previously suggested through

Mr. Mason; and, that being so, why was it, he should like to know, that we were left without proper persons to afford protection to British subjects in that quarter? The Marquis then referred to a report that appeared in the last number of the Index, about the mission of Mr. Crawford, the British Consul at Havannah, and the refusal of the Federal authorities to allow Mr. Crawford to go into the Confederate States. He wished to know if that report was true. The authenticity of the alleged annual report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy was denied. Was that document a forgery? So long as the British Government encouraged the Federals there could be no chance of peace. In Earl Russell's action he saw evident signs of Federal influence. If the Kearsage had belonged to any other Government, her officers would not have been allowed to come into our ports, convicted as they have been of breaking our laws. He hoped that the last report of our Consul at Boston would be produced. It was notorious that Irish emigrants—he might say Irish recruits—were when landed compelled to enter the Federal service. Earl Russell had submitted to too many of these things, and he certainly ought not to have spoken of the Confederate Government in the tone he used when he referred to the dismissal of the British Consuls.

Earl Russell said he would make a few remarks on the various circumstances to which the Marquis of Clanricarde had alluded. With regard to the dismissal of the British Consuls and the compulsory enlistment of British subjects in the Confederate armies, he had spoken from facts as reported to him, and which he thought quite notorious. [The Marquis of Clanricarde did not deny notorious facts. He pointed out that only two Consuls were remaining when the Confederate Government dismissed them, that the Confederate Government was justified in this proceeding, and that it was the fault of the British, not of the Confederate Government, that we had not consular relations with the Confederate States.] He believed that 'it was not fair to make British subjects, not being American citizens, serve in the armies of either belligerent without giving them time to leave the country if they thought fit.' [Does his Lordship not know that it was a year after the war commenced before there was a demand for the service of aliens, and that the demand was not enforced for nearly another year? How many years' notice to quit does he suppose ought to be given?] He thought Mr. Burch's exequatur had been very unfairly withdrawn by the United States' Government. Respecting the dismissal of Mr. Magee, His Lordship said:—

'Permission was obtained from the American Government that British ships of war should be allowed from time to time to go to blockaded ports; but Lord Lyons thought it an abuse of the privilege that specie should be sent to a Confederate port in a British ship-of-war, inasmuch as such specie might afford means of carrying on war against a State friendly to Great Britain. He accordingly stated that opinion, and if he had not done so the American Government might have withdrawn the privilege, and I think there is nothing in the law of nations that would have deprived them of the power to do so. I thought that Lord Lyons was right; and I sent out an order that the Consul who had sent the specie should not be continued in his functions.'

Mr. Cridland was sent to Mobile, not as Consul, but to act as Consul. Respecting the conduct that led to the dismissal of the Consuls, His Lordship said:—

'It was certainly a very unjustifiable act on the part of our consuls, or of any one acting for a British consul, to tell British subjects that they were not to resist their enlistment in the Confederate army, but to desert their colours in the moment of action. I think that very improper advice on the part of a consul; and I do not think there was any instruction given to our consular agents which could justify any of them in giving that advice. I do not find either in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, or in any directions that I gave myself, anything that would justify that course; and if the Secretary of the Confederate States had written to this country to complain of that conduct, I should have thought it right to reprimand and even to dismiss the consul who had acted in so improper a manner. Instead of that, the President of the so-called Confederate Government sent away our consuls, though these are the persons to whom British subjects would naturally have recourse, in order to obtain redress for grievances. The only remedy they would have when the consuls were removed was that suggested by Mr. Benjamin—namely, that soldiers in the field might apply to the tribunals of the country. A man might easily write to his consul to claim redress, but that a man marching about should go to a court of law—that was a thing which could not be done. I therefore thought that was a very harsh and unfriendly proceeding on the part of the Confederate Government. At the same time, it ought to be remembered, likewise, that the Confederate Government had good reason to complain of our consul; and our consul saying that he had been so instructed, the Confederate Government might at first have believed him. Therefore, I did not enter into any complaint or angry remonstrance; but I asked Mr. Mason whether, if consular agents, or persons under any other name, were sent to the Confederate States, intercourse might not be carried on and negotiations opened, by which we might be able to obtain redress where redress ought to be given, or have reasons stated for its refusal.

His Lordship then referred to the mission of Mr. Crawford, and endorsed the statement that appeared in the last number of the Index. He said:—

It was thought necessary to send a letter to Richmond to know whether such persons (Consuls) would be received; and that letter the Federal Government would not allow to be sent. But I think it is quite right of the British Government to endeavour to open communications with the so-called Confederate States, without recognising them, yet, as being States of considerable extent, in which civil war is carried on, and in which there is a considerable number of British subjects, I say there can be nothing wrong in endeavouring to enter into communication with those States. My noble friend has addressed your Lordships on various other subjects. I desired Mr. Crawford, when he arrived at Richmond, to call the attention of the Government to the intercepted correspondence, a correspondence which I believed at the time to be genuine, and which showed that a party in the country had been employed by the Confederate Government to procure means of carrying on war against a State in amity with us.

His Lordship then explicitly admitted that the alleged report of Mr. Mallory is a forgery. He said:—

With regard to the document to which my noble friend alluded, it has been the subject of a great deal of inquiry. It was said to have been published in a New York paper as genuine; but Mr. Seward states that, having made further inquiry, he finds it to have been altogether a forgery. It was supposed to have been issued by the Secretary of the Confederate Navy, but it was, in fact, an invention of some gentleman in New York. Certainly, I should not think of making any complaint on that subject to the so-called Confederate Government.

In conclusion, he said he supposed the Marquis of Clanricarde would not object to the words 'or extracts' after the word 'copies,' nor to the insertion of the words 'so-called' before 'Government of the Confederate States,' or it might seem 'as if the House recognised the Confederate States although Her Majesty did not.'

The Marquis of Clanricarde did not object to these amendments, and the motion was agreed to.

THE KEARSAGE.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Donoughmore said that certain persons, at the last assizes for the county of Cork, had pleaded guilty to an indictment charging them with having violated the Foreign Enlistment Act. Their offence was having enlisted certain subjects of Her Majesty to serve on board the United States' ship-of-war Kearsage. The captain of that vessel stated that the men came on board without his knowledge, and that when he went to Brest he put them on shore, but that, as they were then without the means of subsistence, he conveyed them back to Cork. When the subject was last alluded to, Earl Russell made what certainly appeared to be a very extraordinary statement, for he said he could not see what else the captain could have done. It appeared, however, from the evidence that had been taken, that the men were actually put into the uniform of the United States' navy, by the order of the officers of the ship. He wished to know whether the noble earl had required any explanation from the American Minister with regard to this circumstance.

Earl Russell said that at an early period of the discussion of this matter he had complained to the United States' Minister of the conduct of the officers on board the Kearsage. After what had passed in that House, and in a court of justice in Ireland, he had again called the attention of the United States' Minister to the subject, and had asked him to refer to the newspapers, and to the opinion given by Mr. Justice Keogh. The United States' Minister informed him that, in the month of November last, he had received instructions from his Government that if the Consul had been at all instrumental in violating the Foreign Enlistment Act he should be at once dismissed, and that, with regard to the officer in command of the ship, if the Minister found that he was to blame he was to be reported to the Government, in order that the proper notice might be taken. Mr. Adams did not act upon those instructions, because he did not consider that there was any blame due either to the Consul or the officer in command of the ship in enlisting these persons into the service of the United States. The correspondence was not yet concluded, but when further explanations had been given, the despatches would be laid on the table.

The Earl of Derby said it appeared Mr. Adams did not deny the essential facts of the case—viz., that these men were examined by the surgeon and attested, that their names were borne on the books of the ship, and that they were clothed in the uniform of the United States. It was impossible, therefore, that the officers of the ship should not be cognizant of the men being on board.

The Marquis of Clanricarde said he believed the Kearsage was now repairing at one of our ports. If so, why should not the officers at once come to London, and make such a statement of the real facts as the American Minister would be prepared to vouch for? It was rather too much to extend to them the hospitality of this country in the face of such statements as were made on the trial at Cork. Either these gentlemen had stated the truth or not. If they had told the truth, let them come forward and verify the facts.

THE SAXON.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, in reply to Colonel Sykes, Mr. Layard said the Saxon and her cargo was ordered to be restored to their respective owners, free from all costs, charges, and expenses, 'reserving the questions of salvage and probable cause of capture.' [We should have thought that the cause of capture would have been settled before ordering the restitution of the vessel and cargo.] He understood Lieutenant Donoghue was to be tried, but he did not know under what circumstances.

RESIGNATION OF MR. STANSFELD.

The House of Commons assembled on Monday, after the Easter recess. The Ministerial papers announced in the morning that the Duke of Newcastle had resigned the seals of the Colonial Office, that Mr. Cardwell had succeeded him, and that Lord Clarendon had accepted the position of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, vice Mr. Cardwell. Soon after the House met, the members saw that these were not the only Ministerial changes. Mr. Stansfeld, the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, did not take his seat upon the Treasury benches, but on the second Ministerial bench below the gangway. After some formal business, Mr. Stansfeld rose to offer a personal explanation, there being at the time a very small attendance of the Opposition.

Mr. Stansfeld thanked Lord Palmerston for the confidence and courage that induced him to refuse his resignation when he first tendered it; but he now considered it his duty to resign, because he felt convinced that to continue in office would embarrass the Government he wished to support. He had therefore ceased to be a member of the Government. Moreover, as the attack of the late Procureur-Général had been repeated by his successor, he (Mr. Stansfeld) preferred to meet it as a private member, rather than 'beneath the protecting ægis of the noble Lord.' He did not, on the first occasion, give such an explicit statement as he made subsequently, because he thought the House did not wish it, and because he thought it due to M. Mazzini to let him have the first opportunity of explanation. He repeated what he had already stated, that he knew M. Mazzini 'to be incapable of the kind of low and odious criminality which is laid to his charge.' Respecting his acquaintance with M. Mazzini, Mr. Stansfeld said: 'I have long been personally and intimately associated with him. I have long had a very deep general sympathy with that which has been the object of his life—the unity and independence of Italy.' He had not always agreed with M. Mazzini's practical views, sometimes deeming them less wise than sanguine. As for the charge of the Procureur-Général, he begged to deny it in the strongest general terms that were permitted by the rules of the House: 'I say that every insinuation of that nature is untrue.' Mr. Stansfeld said he never 'heard the name of Greco, or knew of his existence, nor of the names nor the existence of any of his supposed accomplices until he saw them in the newspapers.' He never saw Tibaldi, no matter by what name he may be called who came to him in 1857 to suggest the notion of such a plot. He knew Massarenti well, but his only transactions with him had been to pay for maccaroni and Italian pastes, in which he (Massarenti) dealt. He knew Campanella well. 'He was a gentleman and a scholar, a student, almost a recluse. He was a man utterly incapable of soiling his fingers in dirt of that kind. I pledge my knowledge of that man to the House, and I do him this act of justice to-night, when I say he was one who expressed his utter contempt for plots of this description.' Respecting the alleged extracts from his letters, he could not tell if they were genuine or not, or, if they were genuine, to what they referred. The first extract asserted his friendship for Mazzini, and that he never sought to conceal. The second extract referred to a remittance, and, said the honourable member, 'Upon my honour and upon my conscience, I believe it must have referred either to some mere private transaction, or to the distribution of some probably moderate or trifling sum for a charitable purpose.' He hoped his explanation was satisfactory, and said in conclusion he was ready to answer any questions; and, 'Meanwhile, I leave this subject, and I put myself upon this House, and, I may add, upon my countrymen, with reference to a question in which is involved that which is every man's dearest inheritance—an unblemished character and a fair name.'

Lord Palmerston said Mr. Stansfeld had left him no option but to accept his resignation, and he had no doubt the motives that prompted that peremptory decision were highly honourable. His Lordship said: 'I can only express the great regret which I and my colleagues feel at having lost the official assistance of a man whose great ability, whose untiring industry, whose perfect suitableness for the office he held, and whose unswerving integrity of mind, made him a most valuable member of the Administration, and endeared him to all those who had the advantage of his friendship.' Not only were the base proceedings to which reference had been made abhorrent to Mr. Stansfeld, but he was convinced that his honourable friend attached the same value as any man in the House to the welfare and personal safety of the Emperor of the French—'that he is as sensible as we are, that that great Sovereign has, on many grave and important occasions, proved himself to be a true friend and faithful ally of this country; and we all feel that his personal security and his dynastic welfare are not only of the utmost value to the loyal and attached people he governs, but are equally essential to the general interests of Europe.'

PRIVATE SHIPBUILDING YARDS.

On Monday the Navy Estimates were proceeded with, and in the course of the discussion Mr. Lindsay expressed his regret that the Government plant in dockyards was being increased, so that the private yards were discouraged, and would not be available in time of war except for building gunboats. At present Messrs. Laird's docks would in case of war be as valuable as any dock for which the House might be about to vote a large sum of money.

[If it is decided that ships of war may not be built by private firms except for nations that are at peace and do not want them, then the Government does right to provide for increased plant. But setting aside the question of economy and the development of skill in design, it is impossible to gainsay the justice of Mr. Lindsay's conclusion that 'it is a dangerous thing to throw overboard the private yards.]

ARMOUR-PLATED NAVIES OF ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

Mr. Corry quoted from the correspondence of the Times a statement that the French armour-plated navy built and building consisted of 43 vessels and 24,000 horse-power, while that of England was 25 vessels and 23,000 horse-power. Lord C. Paget said that, according to the information of the Government, on February 8 the French had 28 armour-plated vessels and 5 small iron gunboats built and building.

DENMARK.

On Monday, in reply to Mr. Osborne, Lord Palmerston said all the Powers who signed the Treaty of 1852 had consented to send representatives to the Conference. The German Diet has not answered the invitation. 'The basis proposed for the Conference to start from is an endeavour to restore the peace of Europe. [This observation caused considerable merriment.] An armistice has not been agreed upon.'

POSTAL DELIVERIES IN THE PROVINCES.

On Monday Mr. Long moved for a Select Committee on the Post Office, with an especial view to the improvement of existing arrangements for the transmission of mails in provincial districts. The honourable member recited many instances in which carts were used though there were railway facilities. In Sussex there were two towns nine miles from each other, and it took as long to send a letter between these places and receive an answer as it did to write and get an answer from Paris—four days. He suggested letter-boxes at all the railway stations, and that there should be mails sent by every train to all places along the line. He also thought there ought to be free deliveries of letters in rural districts, and a cheaper rate of charge for the transmission of newspapers.

In reply to Mr. Long and other members, Mr. Gladstone said he could not agree with the principle laid down by Mr. Baillie, that the revenue derived from the Post Office ought to be used only for extending postal facilities. The Post Office yielded a net revenue of 1,500,000*l.*, and if that were taken away, it would have to be supplied by increased taxation. He denied the justice of the doctrine that profits derived from populous places were to be employed to give facilities in thinly-populated places. That would be taxing one part of the country for the benefit of another. It was the custom of the House to leave executive matters to the Executive, and it would be better to see first what remedies were proposed by the Government, and if they were not deemed sufficient, it would be proper to appeal to the House to appoint a committee.

Mr. Long's motion was negatived without a division.

Confederate Official Documents.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES.

(Concluded from last week.)

The administration of the Department, in all its extensive operations, has been greatly impeded by the deficiency of transportation, especially on the railroads. Shut off from the sea, and with command of very few of its rivers, the Confederacy is dependent almost wholly on the railroads for communication and transportation. The roads were not constructed with reference to such extensive needs, and even in time of peace, with all facilities of supplies and repairs, would have been inadequate to such duties. How much less in time of war, with every drawback of deficient labour, insufficient stock, defective machinery, and scant supplies, and with exposure often to seizures or spoliations by the enemy, could they be expected to meet such unprecedented requirements! It must be matter of surprise and gratification that they have sustained themselves so well, and have afforded to the Government and the people the measure of accommodation they have. It is but a just tribute to them to say, that in the main they have been managed in a patriotic spirit, and have rarely failed to meet the requirements of the Government with alacrity and zeal. It has not been necessary during the year to exercise the large discretionary powers of control vested by Congress in the Executive over the railroads, for if repugnancy existed to the just demands of the Government, the known possession of such powers has sufficed to exact compliance. But while the dispositions of the railroad companies have been good, their means have been gradually becoming less. The Government has already given to many some aid, but will have hereafter to render fuller and more constant assistance. Some of the minor roads will have to be sacrificed to keep up the tracks of the leading lines. Iron will have to be provided and rolled for machinery, and the construction and repair of locomotives and rolling stock. Skilled mechanics, to some extent, will have to be furnished from the army, and for some of the more delicate machinery needed by them, importations from abroad may have to be attempted. With these aids it is hoped they may not only be maintained, but improved in their means of transportation. The lowest point of depression has probably been passed. For the first year or more, under the delusive expectation of the early termination of the war, the companies relied almost wholly on their existing stock, and made few efforts at supply or reparation. They scarcely husbanded their resources, which, under the exhausting demands made on them, became greatly diminished. Of late, with more experience, a wiser prescience guides their management, and, besides practising economy of means, they are sedulously engaged in endeavouring to increase their stock, and to provide for the contingencies of future service or loss. In their best estate, they will not be able to furnish adequate facilities of transportation for both the Government and the people. From considerations of public utility and supreme duty, as well as from their dependence on the aid of the Government, they should be required by law, as nearly all have engaged by contract, to give preference, in all cases, to Government freight, so as to command all their means of transport when necessary. Beyond that, it is the fixed rule of the Department to make no exaction on them, and to attempt no regulation of their surplus means of transportation, or to award no special privileges to any in their use, but leave such free to the discretion and management of their officers. On this subject misconception has often prevailed, and the charge of favouritism has been alleged against the Department, but on no point has inflexibility been more steadfastly maintained, and all special privileges denied.

It will have been noted that, in nearly all the branches of supply, we are not yet exempt from dependence, to a greater or less extent, on foreign importations. These can only be obtained by the command of sterling funds or exchanges on foreign countries, and be introduced by evasion of the existing blockade. Without credit in foreign countries, so established as to enable the Government to borrow without great sacrifice, if at all, and with the difference of exchange appreciating daily to a ruinous rate, it became early apparent to me that recourse must be had to our great staple products, which in the markets of the world were readily exchangeable for coin. They had only to be placed abroad, and the same means which exported them would serve for the necessary importations. The business of evading the blockade had previously been in private hands alone, and, while precarious, had been, under skilful charge, a source of enormous profits. So excessive had become the rates of freight and exchange, that on calculation it was found that the mere charge, independent of the cost of the cargo, for the freightage of a steamer of 300 tons from the West India Islands to one of our ports, was to the Government upwards of $2,000,000 in its currency. Under these circumstances, the Department did not hesitate to inaugurate the plain policy of evading the blockade with steamers purchased and run by its officers. The limited means at the command of the Department abroad, which could be spared from the necessity of procuring immediate supplies, were employed in purchasing several steamers. These, under competent officers, were at once engaged in exporting cotton and importing supplies. The number which the means of the Department could command were far too few to meet its requirements, and contracts were made with capitalists to provide and engage in the trade, other steamers, in which the Department took an interest, to be paid for in cotton, either to be delivered here or to be exported in them. In this way, while more vessels were induced to venture in the business of evading the blockade, a controlling influence was secured over the importations made in them for private account. This constituted an important consideration for the public good, as, under the temptations merely of private interest, it had been found that, to a great extent, articles of mere luxury or noxious use, as liquors, from the superior profits they afforded, rather than goods of real utility to the people, were introduced by the steamers of private traders. The steamers owned by the Department, four in number, were, for a long time, run between Wilmington and the islands with signal success, and almost the regularity of packets. The profits by the outward and the saving by the inward trips to the Department were very great, as at each trip, according to the current rates, the value of the vessel was fully reimbursed. It is a moderate calculation to estimate the gain thus effected for the Department at upwards of $20,000,000 in currency. Still the quantity of cotton which could be carried out by the steamers, owned or held in part by the Department, by no means supplied the sterling which was required abroad for the wants of the Government, and the experiments made had only served to demonstrate what resources for establishing credit and commanding funds abroad could be afforded by larger exportations of our staple products, cotton and tobacco. About the same time, too, the closing of the port of Charleston by the successful operations of the enemy on Morris Island, caused apprehensions that the business of evading the blockade would soon become more difficult and precarious. This made it more important to place abroad, as rapidly as possible, a stock of cotton, which would afford means of commanding large supplies while they could be introduced. The Department, therefore, in conjunction with the Hon. Secretary of the Navy, who fully appreciated this mode of supplying the demands of his Department for sterling, proposed, and succeeded in effecting, arrangements with the companies and merchants engaged in evading the blockade on private account, by which, on fair terms of freight, payable partly in cotton here and partly in drafts on the cotton taken out by them, they undertook on every voyage to take out, some a third, and some one-half of their cargoes of cotton for the Government, and likewise placed at the command of the Government a fair proportion of their capacities for freight on the return trip, for the importation of its supplies. The Department was aided in effecting this arrangement, not only by the patriotic feelings of the private owners, but also by the facilities it was enabled to afford them in commanding cargoes of cotton without unnecessary delays, through the preference in transportation given by the railroads to cotton ordered by the Government. Hence, in view of the importance of continuing these arrangements with private merchants, it has become more than ever essential that the priority of transportation on the railroads should be maintained to the Government; for, under present laws, by that preference alone can these arrangements for the exportation of cotton be continued.

These arrangements were made in good time, for, as anticipated, the blockade of Wilmington, the port of the Confederacy best adapted for evading the blockade, has been of late more stringent. All the blockading ships of the enemy have been transferred from Charleston, and within the last two months a considerable number of steamers, among them those belonging to the Department, have been captured, or destroyed to prevent their falling into the hands of the enemy. While the risk is now certainly increased, still, with the additional steamers which the contracts with the Government or the temptations of private gain have brought into the trade, it is believed the blockade may be evaded, so far as to add greatly to our resources abroad from the exportation of our staple, and to bring in the supplies needed by the Government. Measures meantime, are being taken to increase the facilities of entrance into the port, by the use of moveable batteries of Whitworth guns, of long range, along the coast, and to endanger the safety of the blockading vessels.

So long as our staples can be exported, and supplies introduced, with reasonable exemption from capture, there cannot be a question of the policy of pursuing the venture; and when all the advantages to our credit abroad, and to our means of resistance within the Confederacy, are estimated, it may be well questioned whether the whole trade should not be subjected by law to equitable regulation, so as to secure to the Government a fair proportion of the profits resulting from all shipments. As the trade could not be carried on at all except to fortified cities, and through the special protection afforded by the armaments of the Government, the benefits derived by the Government would be only a reasonable return. The regulation of the trade, both to secure a participation in the profits to the Government, and to require the introduction mainly of articles of use or necessity, instead of luxuries and noxious liquors, it is believed, is demanded by the general sentiment of the country, and would be readily acquiesced in by the sense of justice and patriotic feelings of the merchants engaged in the trade.

The business of export and import for the Department became so large and important that it was found necessary to devote officers of the Department and special agents at Wilmington to its management. It has grown almost a separate branch of administration in the Department, and to be nearly assimilated to a separate bureau. While thus it has been conducted with success, some serious practical inconveniences have resulted from not having a separate officer or bureau established by law, and specially charged with the whole business. All the bureaus, depending in some measure on foreign supplies, have been interested in the operations thus conducted, and all have had to contribute out of their appropriations, according to their interest, in providing means for the purchase of ships and cargoes; and as, under the interruptions of the blockade, the exact proportions in which cargoes are furnished are not known for a long time, and when the vessels are lost can never be precisely ascertained, great difficulties exist in settling and apportioning the credits and charges to each. This is apt to create dissatisfaction, as well as irregularities in the accounts of each bureau. It would manifestly be simpler and more satisfactory that the business should be made a separate one, under the control of a competent head, that appropriations should be made directly for its operations, all sales and purchases abroad be made under his instructions, and that, providing means abroad, he should be only called on by the bureaus for their appropriate supplies. When it is considered to what extent cotton and other staples have to be purchased and forwarded in the Confederacy, arrangements for procuring and running ships, or contracting with the owners of vessels in the trade to be negotiated, shipments and sales in foreign countries to be effected, and purchases and importations made from abroad, it will be readily seen that the business requires an able head, and will constitute by no means the least important branch of administration pertaining to the Department.

A proper officer, as well as judicious regulations, are likewise desirable for the conduct of the trade in cotton and supplies between Texas and Mexico. The law leaves the trade entirely free, but as the export of cotton affords almost the only means of obtaining supplies for the Trans-Mississippi Department, the generals commanding there have felt themselves under the necessity of prescribing regulations and conditions for the conduct of the trade. This was rendered the more necessary from the limited means of transport which could be commanded, and which, without some restriction, there was danger would be engrossed by private parties, eager to participate in a most lucrative trade, or to remove beyond the contingencies of war the funds realised by them from the conversion of their property in the Confederacy. The regulations imposed by military authority were, however, regarded by many, whose pursuit of gain was hindered, as vexatious and illegal, and produced such complaint and dissatisfaction that they were abrogated by the Department. The necessities of that command now more than ever require the control of this trade and its direction to the supply of funds and stores for its military needs. The trade should either be carried on directly by competent officers of the Department, or conducted on conditions or by permits that would secure to the Government as its results necessary credits and supplies from abroad.

In other points, likewise, comprehensive legislation will be required for the proper administration of the military affairs in the Trans-Mississippi Department, since, by the interruption of command over the Mississippi river by the enemy, facilities of communication with the more eastern States and the seat of Government are greatly diminished. In anticipation of such contingency, as already stated, arrangements, months prior to our reverses in Mississippi, had been initiated by this Department to make, as far as practicable, the Trans-Mississippi Department self-sustaining, and capable of separate administration. Foundries, manufactories of arms, powder-mills and workshops, as well as exportations for mines and nitrous earths, had been instituted, and while some have been already in successful operation, others were in progress of early completion. To conduct and further complete these various branches of military administration, it is desirable that separate offices, under competent heads, should be established. Indeed, so far is this Department isolated and severed from direct communication with the Department here, that it is deemed judicious, some extraordinary powers of military administration should be intrusted to the general commanding, and that office assimilated to the bureau of the Department here, under his immediate supervision, yet reporting as opportunities offer to the heads of the corresponding bureaus here, so as to preserve harmony and conformity of action, should be constituted by law. A separate office should certainly be established there for the conscript service, and either the conscripts be directed to be appropriated entirely to the organisations west of the Mississippi river, or some ratio of apportionment, as well as mode of sending recruits to the organisations on this side, be prescribed. It may be necessary, too, to give some unusual power of recommending and assigning officers to service, subject to the future approval and action of the Executive. By these means it is believed that serious embarrassments and inconveniences from the isolation of that Department will be remedied.

It is gratifying to know that the severance of the States west of the Mississippi from those of the east, has caused no abatement in their devotion to the Confederacy, their confidence in its cause, or in their spirit or resolution to achieve a common independence. Entire harmony and cooperation prevail between the Confederate and State authorities there, and in the valour of their soldiers, the ability of their generals, the patriotism and hardy, resolute character of their people, the wide expanse and impracticable nature of their territories, and the great, though only partially developed, resources of their country, all find an assured augury of ultimate triumph.

It is gratifying to be able to state that our relations with the Indians, under the protection of this Government, continue to be of a satisfactory character. Though there have been some instances of disturbances among individuals, as was to be expected under the machinations of our enemies and the withdrawal of our troops from the coterminous territory under military operations in adjoining States, yet Mr. Scott, our Indian agent, who has just returned from a visit to and a sojourn among them of some months, gives assurance that they continue unshaken in their loyalty to the Government, and in their devotion to our cause and sacred rights. His report, accompanying this, will furnish details of interest.

The estimates for the expenditures of this Department, for the six months from January 1 to June 30, 1864, are herewith transmitted. The amount is large, but, at the existing rate of prices, certainly not greater than is required to maintain the armies of the Confederacy in a state of efficiency. Indeed, if there be a continuance of the constantly accelerating advance in the cost of all supplies that has attended the inflation of the past year, these estimates will scarce prove adequate to the wants of the Department. Should, however, there be a reduction of the currency to the actual needs of the country, and its maintenance on a stable basis, these estimates may be largely reduced. Such policy is the only mode of correcting this, as the many other resulting evils of our redundant currency.

Since the foregoing was written, the shifting fortune of war has brought reverse to our army in Northern Georgia, near the theatre of its late great triumph. While a large portion of our forces were engaged in improving their victory by the expulsion of the enemy from East Tennessee, and on the eve, as appeared, of entire success, the enemy accumulated large reinforcements within their beleaguered lines at Chattanooga. With overwhelming numbers they assailed our army in position before them, and, though meeting bloody repulses on either wing, carried the position when weakened in the centre. This unexpected reverse seems to have caused something of panic in a portion of our troops dreading to be cut off, and led to a hasty retreat of the whole army with considerable loss both in men and materiel. The enemy pressed their advantage with alacrity, and were pursuing with exultation and confidence, when they were encountered by one of our unshaken divisions and driven back, with fearful loss, in confusion and dismay. This more than checked their advance, for it compelled the rapid retreat of their whole army, with all the attendant indications of dreaded pursuit, behind the lines of Chicamauga, where they have since remained. Meantime, deep interest concentrates on the events occurring in East Tennessee, where it is yet uncertain whether our disasters in front of Chattanooga may not have compelled the sudden retreat of our forces, when on the eve of consummating their work, by the capture of Knoxville with General Burnside and his army.

Movements of the enemy on the Rappahannock have again proven the invincible army of Northern Virginia, under its consummate commander, the sure bulwark of the capital. Emboldened by some partial success, the results to us of incaution or over-confidence, the Federal army crossed the Rapidan in full force, and with every indication of making, by battle, an open way to Richmond. General Lee was prompt to offer them the coveted opportunity, but while they ventured to confront, they dared not encounter the veterans before whom they had so often recoiled in defeat and humiliation. After their vaunting manifestation, they have ignominiously slunk off under cover of night, and again sought an inglorious shelter in their lines beyond the river.

A fair review of the varied events of the year should cause no abatement of confidence in the ultimate triumph of our cause. Our very reverses, as already stated, will only demonstrate to our enemies the futility of their aims and the vanity of their hopes. A brave people, commanding a territory of such extent and resources, never have been, and while true to themselves and their liberties never can be, subjugated. Those reverses, however, admonish our people, as they would avoid the desolating ravages and costly bloodshed of protracted war, to unite their wills and concentrate their energies and resources to the grand aim of expelling the invader. We have only to will and to dare as one man, and our work is sure of accomplishment. Every motive and incentive that can fire the soul or nerve the arm of man is urgent upon us. All that is dear to humanity—property, honour, wives, children, and homes—nay, the very lives of the present and the hopes of future generations—for us are staked on success. The malignant intents of the foe would exterminate or debase us, through the insolent lordship of our slaves, to the mastery of his brutal despotism. No alternative exists but stern defiance and unflinching resistance. Our only, as our certain safety, is in victory. Every impediment should be cast aside. The insatiate spirit of greed must be exorcised, distrust and despondency be displaced by the confidence of invincible resolve and the might of a firm faith. Our means without stint, and our men without favour or affection, must be rendered to the cause. Each man should rise to the height of a supreme duty, counting all cost as gain, and exulting in every sacrifice that shall free us for ever from loathsome association with a despicable people, and establish the Confederacy of our choice on the basis of approved strength, in permanent fruition of peace, prosperity, and independence.

Respectfully submitted,
JAMES A. SEDDON,
Secretary of War.

THE DAHLGREN PAPERS.

We subjoin copies of the papers found in the pockets of Colonel Dahlgren, of which we gave a summary, and on which we commented in a previous number:—

ADDRESS TO THE OFFICERS AND MEN.

The following address to the officers and men of the command was written on a sheet of paper, having, in printed letters, on the upper corner, 'Head-quarters, Third Division, Cavalry Corps, 1864:'—

'Officers and Men,—You have been selected from brigades and regiments as a picked command to attempt a desperate undertaking—an undertaking which, if successful, will write your names on the hearts of your countrymen in letters that can never be erased, and which will cause the prayers of your fellow-soldiers, now confined in loathsome prisons, to follow you and yours wherever you may go. We hope to release the prisoners from Belle Isle first, and, having seen them fairly started, we will cross the James River into Richmond, destroy the bridges after us, and, exhorting the released prisoners to destroy and burn the hateful city, will not allow the rebel leader Davis and his traitorous crew to escape. The prisoners must render great assistance, as you cannot leave your ranks too far or become too much scattered, or you will be lost. Do not allow any personal gain to lead you off, which would only bring you to an ignominious death at the hands of citizens. Keep well together and obey orders strictly, and all will be well; but on no account scatter too far, for in union there is strength. With strict obedience to orders and fearlessness in their execution, you will be sure to succeed. We will join the main force on the other side of the city, or perhaps meet them inside. Many of you may fall; but if there is any man here not willing to sacrifice his life in such a great and glorious undertaking, or who does not feel capable of meeting the enemy in such a desperate fight as will follow, let him step out, and he may go hence to the arms of his sweetheart, and read of the braves who swept through the city of Richmond. We want no man who cannot feel sure of success in such a holy cause. We will have a desperate fight; but stand up to it when it does come, and all will be well. Ask the blessing of the Almighty, and do not fear the enemy.

'U. Dahlgren, Colonel Commanding.'

SPECIAL ORDERS AND INSTRUCTIONS.

The following special orders were written on a similar sheet of paper and on detached slips, the whole disclosing the diabolical plans of the leaders of the expedition:—

'Guides and pioneers, with oakum, turpentine, and torpedoes, signal officer, quartermasters, commissaries, scouts, and pickets, and men in rebel uniforms—these will remain on the north bank and move down with the force on the south bank, not get ahead of them, and if the communication can be kept up without giving an alarm it must be done; but everything depends upon a surprise, and no one must be allowed to pass ahead of the column. Information must be gathered in regard to the crossings of the river, so that, should we be repulsed on the south side, we will know where to recross at the nearest point.

'All mills must be burned and the canal destroyed, and also everything which can be used by the rebels must be destroyed, including the boats on the river. Should a ferry-boat be seized which can be worked, have it moved down. Keep the force on the south side posted of any important movement of the enemy, and in case of danger some of the scouts must swim the river and bring us information. As we approach the city the party must take great care that they do not get ahead of the other party on the south side, and must conceal themselves and watch our movements. We will try and secure the bridge to the city, one mile below Belle Isle, and release the prisoners at the same time. If we do not succeed they must then dash down, and we will try to carry the bridge by storm. When necessary the men must be filed through the woods and along the river bank. The bridge once secured and the prisoners loose and over the river, the bridges will be burnt and the city destroyed.

'The men must be kept together and well in hand, and once in the city it must be destroyed, and Jeff. Davis and his Cabinet killed. Pioneers will go along with combustible material.

'Everything on the canal and elsewhere of service to the rebels must be destroyed.

'As General Custer may follow me, be careful not to give a false alarm. The signal officer must be prepared to communicate at night by rockets, and in other things pertaining to his department. The quartermasters and commissaries must be on the look-out for their departments, and see that there are no delays on their account. The engineer officer will follow and survey the road as we pass over it, &c. The pioneers must be prepared to construct a bridge or destroy one. They must have plenty of oakum and turpentine for burning, which will be soaked and rolled into balls, and be given to the men to burn when we get into the city. Torpedoes will only be used by the pioneers for burning the main bridges, &c. They must be prepared to destroy the railroads.

'Men will branch off to the right with a few pioneers, and destroy the bridges and railroads south of Richmond, and then join us at the city. They must be well prepared with torpedoes, &c.

'The line of Falling Creek is probably the best to march along, or, as they approach the city, Good's Creek, so that no reinforcements can come upon any cars.

'No one must be allowed to pass ahead for fear of communicating news.

'Rejoin the command with all haste, and if cut off, cross the river above Richmond and rejoin us. Men will stop at Bellona Arsenal and totally destroy it, and everything else but hospitals; then follow on and rejoin the command at Richmond with all haste, and, if cut off, cross the river and rejoin us. As General Custer may follow me, be careful and not give a false alarm.'

THE FORGED CONFEDERATE REPORT.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—A few months ago a pamphlet, emanating, as is believed upon undoubted authority, from the Government of the United States, which purported to be a report made by the Secretary of the Navy to the Congress of the Confederate States, was circulated throughout England. The time chosen for the dissemination of this document was almost simultaneous with the attempt made by the British Government to create a public opinion adverse to the Confederate States in the matter of the steam rams in process of construction by the Messrs. Lloyd. Lord Lyons forwarded a copy of the paper to the British Government; the United States' Minister in London made a formal communication thereof to Earl Russell, while the Federal sympathisers took every opportunity to give it a general circulation. In the debates in Parliament, certain members of the Government appealed to the disclosures contained in this reputed report of a Confederate official as a full justification of the extreme measures which had been resorted to to prevent the sailing of the rams in question. So great was the indignation of Lord Russell, that, in addition to other extreme measures, he determined to address a direct remonstrance to the Confederate Government predicated upon the assumption that the report was genuine. In fact, grave intimations were thrown out that it might be necessary to adopt harsher measures than mere paper protests against a Government which thus avowed its purpose to violate the municipal laws of the British empire. It is fair to presume that there were many well-informed persons who doubted or wholly disbelieved the genuineness of the document, yet there is just as little reason to doubt that the great mass of the public trusted the revelations which were supported with so much zeal, and in such high quarters. The reputed report of the Confederate Secretary accomplished the work which its authors intended. The British Government was justified in its extreme harshness of act and speech in reference to the Confederates; and, it being impossible any longer to keep up the delusion, a formal contradiction being daily expected to arrive from Richmond, Lord Russell on Tuesday announced in his place in Parliament that Mr. Seward, having made further inquiries, declares that he finds the reputed report 'altogether a forgery.' Earl Russell, in making the announcement, made no comments upon the criminal conduct of the United States in palming off upon him as genuine this disgraceful cheat, but rather sought to shield the Washington Government from blame by fixing the responsibility of the forgery upon a nameless 'gentleman of New York.' He does announce, however, in view of all the facts, that he does 'not think of making any complaint on that subject to the so-called Confederate Government.' How can we sufficiency commend the magnanimity of our Minister of Foreign Affairs, who, in consideration of the extenuating circumstances that the sole authority upon which his accusation against the Confederate States rested, was an admitted forgery, consents to forego his meditated act of hostility! He has no word or reproach for those who practised upon his ready credulity by the most unworthy means, while he utters no syllable of apology to those whom he has wronged. The poison has done its work. Opinions which were confirmed and established by a belief in the genuineness of the publication may not now be disturbed by the admission of the forgery, and the Federals may congratulate themselves that they have, upon the whole, lost nothing in the esteem and regard of the British Government for the practice of a deception and the utterance of a forgery which the enlightened judgment of the world must decide was the deliberate act of the United States' Government, notwithstanding the intimation of Lord Russell that the guilty party was an unknown gentleman of New York.

Spectator.

The Alexandra Case.—The House of Lords gave judgment yesterday in the case of the Alexandra. There were six law lords who took part in the judgment. Of these, four were against the Crown, and two in its favour. The Lord Chancellor headed the majority, and moved that the appeal be dismissed with costs. Lords Chelmsford, Kingsdown, and St. Leonards took the same view. The minority was composed of Lord Cranworth and Lord Wensleydale. We shall give a summary of the judgment in our next number.

The Progress of Despotism.—The attempt to deprive our brethren of the South of their right of self-government will result in the confiscation of our own. The civil liberty which so exalted us among the nations is already well nigh stifled to death beneath the pall of a gloomy despotism. Time after time we have acquiesced in the assumption of illegal power by the Administration upon the insufficient ever-ready plea of military necessity. Impunity emboldens the despotic Executive to further usurpations. Submission soon becomes habitual; even protest is omitted; the authority irregularly assumed is not voluntarily demitted; and ere the war is ended, if it continues much longer, the citizens of the United States will find themselves as completely deprived of all the rights of freemen as would be the citizens of the Confederate States after military subjugation.—New York Daily News.

Why Grant was made a Lieutenant-General.—The reason why Mr. Lincoln has given up the personal conduct of the war, is given by the New York World:—

'The rebels have had a long breathing-spell, and most industriously have they improved it. Their military strength has never been so great as it is at this moment. While the Administration, for electioneering purposes, has been amusing the country with the idea that the rebellion was tottering to its downfall, the South has been quietly putting forth all its energies in strengthening its armies and recruiting its shattered strength. The consequence is, that after this eight months' remissness on our side and of energy on theirs, we are about to enter upon an unequal contest in the spring campaigns. Our numerous reconnaissances—the new euphemism for defeats—have disclosed the alertness and vigour of the rebels in every part of the Confederacy. There is great danger that the military tide will set in a different direction this year from what it did last, and the Administration is so apprehensive that it dares not face the consequences. To shirk the responsibility of possible disasters in the spring campaigns, it has invested General Grant with the supreme command, to make him a scapegoat for the sins of the Administration.'

To the Soldiers of Virginia.—The General Assembly of Virginia has issued an address to the soldiers of that State, which we should be glad to publish entire, as another evidence of the unconquerable spirit of the South, but we have room only for the following extract:—'Men of Virginia! you are soldiers of a renowned commonwealth, whose fame you have illustrated and borne aloft on every battle-field. We need not unfold to you the muniments of your right to self-government. We are assured that you fully comprehend the necessity of a successful assertion of that right, and that you will never lay down your arms until you have secured it. Born to an inheritance of freedom, you cannot hesitate to choose between slavery or death. Submission to an enemy who has exhausted every infamy is not endurable even in thought, but were we base enough to desire peace upon any terms less than the unqualified recognition of our independence, self-interest alone would teach us the folly of relying upon the forbearance of a nation, who have shown in every step of the war that their faith is perfidy, and their only policy is rapine, plunder, and oppression. The whole history of our former association with the Northern States admonishes us that in a common government they will never fail to employ their power to take away our property. Their present malice springs chiefly from baffled cupidity. But for this master passion of their nature, an honourable and speedy peace would be easy. The war has fully developed all the purposes, and you now know the fate that awaits you in the event of subjugation. Your liberties will utterly perish. Your State organisation will be blotted out. All your property of every description will be confiscated; for all of us have participated in the revolution. Your lands will be divided out among the banditti from the North and from Europe, who have invaded our State. A free negro population will be established in your midst, who will be your social equals and military governors. Negro guards will, at their pleasure, give you passes and safe conducts, or arrest you, to be tried and punished by negro commandants and magistrates. And to these, yourselves, your wives and children will be menial labourers and slaves, except those of you whom the malice of your enemies shall reserve for the dungeon or the gallows. Such is the doom denounced for the people of the South by the wicked race now warring upon us. But we know it can never be executed. An army of veterans have resolved that their country shall not be enslaved; and while their purpose stands, the enemy's designs will continue to be baffled. Among you there is one spirit—that of eager and resolute determination. The temper of the army has reached the people at home, and inspired them with a fresh courage and a more assured confidence. Everywhere we see multiplied evidences of energy and enthusiasm. In all the States we find the resolution to endure every extremity rather than submit, and with this spirit our people are invincible.'

Lincoln's Blunders.—President Lincoln is the responsible author of the Kilpatrick raid. We are prepared to assert that it was planned by Mr. Lincoln, Mr. Kellogg, of the Military Committee of the House, and General Kilpatrick. The latter is a gallant and brave officer; but the dashing qualities which he exhibits in the saddle are not those of sound judgment and prudence in council; Mr. Kellogg, to say the least of it, is not known to the world as a Carnot or a Wellington; and as for Mr. Lincoln, he is the same man who, just before the crisis of the peninsular campaign, which he had crippled at the outset, sent Blenker's force to Fremont, sent half of McDowell's forces flying across the country towards the Shenandoah, and withheld the rest from effective co-operation with the main army of the Potomac; he is the same man who, after Grant's successes, apologised to him for the almost accomplished blunders of his attempted interference in the western campaigns; he is the same country lawyer who writes to trained and able soldiers about "my plan of campaign," the same military meddler and blunderer everywhere and always. To his Florida massacre, where fifteen hundred men were lost, the country must add the Kilpatrick raid, in which the cavalry of the army of the Potomac were uselessly knocked up, and five hundred men lost.—New York World.

Settlement of the Pampero Case.—We understand that the case of the Pampero will not now go to jury trial, an arrangement having been made for its settlement. We believe that by the arrangement the owners have consented to a verdict being entered for the Crown, forfeiting the vessel on some one count of the information, to be selected by the owners; they making such explanatory statement on the subject as they may think desirable. It is provided, on the other hand, that the owners are to retain and trade with the vessel, but are not to sell it for two years except with the consent of the Crown; and that alterations are to be made in the structure of the vessel. We understand that the builders are no parties to the compromise, which provides for settling their claim and having it withdrawn from the proceedings.—Scotsman.

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a re-ponsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through Henry Hotze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 30s.; payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. Hopkins, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

The Index may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. Hutton, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.
At Manchester, F. A. Hasleham, Esq. Manchester Southern Club Office, Market Street.
At Paris, to Messrs. Pfeiffer & Muller, 52 Rue du Château d'Eu, Paris.
At Turin, to Sr. Filippo Manetta, 4 Borgo Nuovo.
At St. Thomas (West Indies), to C. W. White, Esq.

Mr. J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, begs to acknowledge the receipt of the following additional Contributions:—

Messrs. W. R. & Co.	£5	0	0
Mrs. G. W. Oliver (collected)	50	0	0

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 7, 1864.

The Foreign Office and the Confederate Government.

The Confederate Government is amply avenged for all the slights and indignities it has suffered at the hands of Her Majesty's Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. A document, purporting to emanate from one of the chief officers of a friendly foreign Government, is eagerly accepted as genuine, not only without any evidence whatever, but in spite of a distinct public denial. It is quoted in the despatches of the Foreign Office, and by members of Her Majesty's Government from their seats in Parliament; it is officially declared to afford good ground for remonstrances to the Government from which it is assumed to have emanated, and steps are actually taken to carry the threat into execution. Of course we refer to the 'Report' of Hon. S. R. Mallory, Secretary of the Navy of the Confederate States, which Earl Russell on Tuesday night declared, upon the authority of Mr. Seward, to be a forgery, committed by 'a gentleman in New York.'

We have no desire to exult in the mortification and ridicule which is the deserved punishment of a diplomatic blunder literally without precedent, and of an unprovoked affront to a country temporarily unable to resent it. We do not in the least doubt that Earl Russell was misled, partly through his personal antipathy to the Confederates, partly through the temptation of finding so opportune a vindication of his conduct in regard to the rams. We are even willing to accord him the credit of having acted, though too late, as becomes a man in his high position, by taking the earliest occasion to confess his error, and by doing it with a better grace than we had expected of him. As for Mr. Seward, it is impossible to acquit him so easily. There is certainly something suspicious in the manner in which this spurious paper, which first saw the light in an obscure New York daily, the Sun, was foisted upon the Foreign Office, simultaneously through the channel of the British Legation in Washington, and that of the American Legation in London. It is also a passing strange coincidence that this forgery should have appeared, and should have imposed on Mr. Seward, at the most convenient moment, and should have been detected only when an official disclaimer from Richmond may be expected by any steamer, and has only been delayed by the Federal refusal to allow the Petrel to enter Charleston harbour with official communications from the British to the Confederate Government. The ostensible author of the forgery has been traced; who the real originators or accomplices after the fact are, history may never definitely know; but certain it is that the fraud has recoiled with fearful effect upon those for whose benefit it was intended, and by whom it was encouraged.

The incident may be productive of really beneficial results if Earl Russell is not above learning the lesson it so obviously teaches. The absurd fiction that Mr. Adams represents near the Foreign Office the eleven States whom for three years his Government has strained every effort to overcome by arms, cannot be otherwise than productive of mischief. In a war of such fearful magnitude, in which not the interests of Great Britain alone, but those of humanity and of civilisation, are so deeply concerned, the statesman who obstinately persists in receiving his facts and impressions from one side exclusively, must necessarily, and perhaps unconsciously, fall into grave error and commit much injustice. A great portion of the odium and the ridicule which Earl Russell has attracted upon himself in his American policy has probably no other cause than this first and fatal fault. We trust that the willingness and even anxiety which he expressed on Tuesday night to enter into some form of communication with the Confederate Government is an evidence of his beginning to see this himself, and that it may lead to the recognition, not of the Confederate States—for of him we do not expect that—but of his duty, as head of the foreign affairs of the greatest empire in the world, to inform himself accurately and impartially of the events of a struggle in which hundreds of thousands of lives have already been sacrificed, and the happiness of millions is permanently at stake.

In regard to the late abortive attempt to communicate with Richmond, defeated by the refusal of the Federals to allow a British ship of war to pass through the blockade, Earl Russell added nothing to the information which we gave our readers last week, almost in the same words, on that subject. We may now again anticipate the noble Earl's Parliamentary disclosures by stating that a second attempt has since been made and equally failed—this time through the refusal of the Confederate authorities to treat on official subjects with a person known to them only as a private resident, and who accompanied his communications with no credentials of any kind whatever. The gentleman selected for this second overture of relations with Richmond is Mr. Cridland, referred to in the speeches of both the Marquis of Clanricarde and Earl Russell on Tuesday.

The Invader on the Defensive.

After three years of a war of invasion it is curious to notice the respective positions of the belligerent Powers in America at the commencement of a new campaign. One would have expected, after so prolonged a contest, begun in such wild confidence, and conducted with such an enormous superiority of force on the side of the invader, that the relations of the combatants would by this time have been very clearly defined, and that we should now at least be witnessing the last desperate struggle of the weaker party, cooped up within an ever-narrowing circle of triumphant foes, its great armies scattered, its chief towns occupied, its leaders flying, its envoys suppliants at the courts of foreign Powers. A nation of seven millions of people, without a navy, isolated and virtually cut off from communication with the rest of the world, might have reached this extremity without disgrace to its manhood, considering the fearful odds against which it contended. But, as it is, the South faces the coming conflict more hopefully than ever. With a coast line nearly 3,000 miles in length, only one of her great seaports has fallen into the enemy's hands; her capital is practically in less peril than Washington; her leaders are still defiant and confident; her envoys self-reliant and even sanguine; her great armies have still the prestige of victory to urge them on; and singly her cruisers roam the seas, the terror of Northern shipping, destined one day, perhaps, to inflict a heavier blow on the pride of the Yankees than has yet befallen their forces in the field. And at this moment it would be difficult, glancing only at the attitude of the armies, to understand their distinctive roles. The news brought by the last mail would assuredly lead to the inference that it is the North which is on its defence; the South which is the assailant. Ordinarily, when an invader betakes himself to defensive positions—when his armies are reduced to a standstill, or the bold advance is converted into a dead halt—the object of his movement is supposed to be defeated. That is precisely the state of affairs on the American continent. The whole North is in anxious suspense, awaiting the initiative of the Confederate commanders. It is not at Richmond, but at Washington, that panic prevails. The telegrams tell us that 'an early attack by Lee is apprehended on the army of the Potomac;' that Longstreet is mounting his forces for a raid with 20,000 men into Kentucky; that Johnston is advancing upon Chattanooga; that Norfolk is threatened with a combined sea and land attack; and that even the fleets of the Federals off Charleston and Mobile are uneasy about the movements of ironclads and torpedos, reported to be ready for a dash, at a favourable moment, upon the blockading squadrons. True, at some remote point, where no great amount of resistance is expected, the North keeps up a semblance of invasion. On the Red River there is a terrible force of gunboats and niggers concentrated to clear Western Louisiana. But substantially all the fighting has to be forced by the Confederates. It seems to depend on them whether the tactics of Meade are to be repeated; whether the army of the Potomac is to march, and countermarch, and bivouac peaceably between the Rappahannock and the Potomac; whether Butler is to confine his labours to the streets and churches of Norfolk, or to show, what he has never yet exhibited, the qualities of a soldier; whether there is to be a real struggle in the field, or only a Presidential campaign.

Meantime the popularity of the war in the Northern States may be tolerably well estimated by the figures of the Provost-Marshal of Washington. The total deficiency of troops under the several calls of President Lincoln is 311,722. Only one State, that of Illinois, doubtless full of faith in President Lincoln, has returned its quota. New York shows a deficiency of, in round numbers, 60,000; Pennsylvania is minus 74,127. And in spite of these warning figures, Mr. Lincoln, acting upon the advice of General Grant, calls for 200,000 more. No wonder that even the warmest advocates of the war are growing despondent, and that those doubt now who never feared before. The last Candide is the Rev. Mr. Beecher. He has arrived at the conviction that slavery is not dead, and that President Lincoln's proclamation cannot kill it. He has even asserted that the people of the South fight better in a bad cause than the Northerners in a good one. If this is not throwing up the game, it is something very like it. To confess the failure of the proclamation, which was supposed to give a principle to the war of invasion, to throw a cloak over the real pretexts for which the war is waged, and to cover the multitude of enormities committed against civilisation and humanity by the Turchins and M'Neils and their barbarous hordes, is an admission that we could hardly have looked for from so eminent an Abolitionist authority. If Mr. Beecher turns faint-hearted, as so many better men have done, when gazing into the remote future, for the issue of the bloody contest, what can be expected of those thousands of moderate politicians who have from the first regarded the war policy of the Administration with aversion and disgust? At no time since the outbreak of the war has the policy of the North swayed so undecidedly between a resentful pride and a consciousness of the hopelessness of the task which is to be accomplished. At no time has the South been so resolutely one-minded in its scorn of Northern pretensions and defiance of Northern strength.

A few days may bring us very important news. But, we repeat, it is not from the North that we are to expect the assault. It is from the veterans of Lee's army, thoroughly rested, their numbers raised to a greater strength than ever by the well-drilled recruits of the autumn and winter; from Morgan's cavalry, and Longstreet's mounted force, threatening a State already more than half inclined to throw the decisive weight of its sword into the Southern scale; from Johnston and Hardee and Lee and Forrest, who, secure from all chance of attack, are free to act along the dangerously weak lines of the Federals in Eastern Tennessee. There may be no more gigantic raids into western territory; no occupation of Pennsylvanian farms and Ohio railroads by Confederate armies; the contracted lines of the Southern defences will be firmly held, and when the opportunity offers a decisive blow will be struck. The Southern generals have already proved that they are alive to one great military truth—that a judicious offensive is in nine times out of ten the surest defence of an assailed position. They have the generals to lead and the men to follow; we know that they were never more confident than at this moment of immediate success and ultimate triumph.

The Confederate Financial Legislation.

The first Congress of the Confederate States, which succeeded the provisional Government a little over two years ago, expired by Constitutional limitation on 18th February last. No legislative body in ancient or modern times has had to grapple with problems more momentous, or confront difficulties more appalling. No body of representatives of the people, directly accountable to the constituencies by whose will they hold their seats, ever acquitted itself of such a task with equal boldness and stern resolution. A series of acts, forming together a consistent and harmonious system of stupendous dimensions, concludes the labours of the Confederate Legislature, and prepares the Confederate people, after nearly three years of exhaustive warfare, for still another, a greater, and it is to be hoped a decisive, effort for Constitutional liberty and national independence. One series of laws places the whole adult male population in the field, including even the two extreme periods of the military age as a corps of reserve. Another series of laws, by giving to the Government the monopoly of foreign commerce, devotes the entire wealth and productive resources of the country absolutely to the common defence. But the most astounding, and in its conception and execution altogether unprecedented, scheme of legislation is that which applies a heroic remedy to the evils of the currency, and provides for the withdrawal, by a system of funding at 4 per cent., and by taxation, of $600,000,000 (about 125,000,000*l.* sterling) of the circulating medium within eight months, at least one-half of this amount by direct taxation.

What must impress the philosophic student of contemporaneous history even more than the unprecedented magnitude of these measures, is the cool deliberation with which they have been devised. There is a stoicism in the voluntary self-application of the caustic and the amputating knife to the morbid parts of the body politic, which belongs rather to the best days of Rome than to the highly artificial civilisation of our age. For be it remembered that these acts are not the desperate expedients of absolute power or of military dictatorship. Were they so, they must inevitably fail, as no country on earth, even the most habitually and blindly obedient to its rulers, would submit to such sacrifices at the bidding of individual will. On the contrary, these laws have been, so to speak, forced upon a reluctant executive by popular clamour, speaking through a multitudinous and noisy press, and at last assuming its present shape in the hands of the direct representatives of the people. Between Congress and the Administration there did not always exist a perfectly cordial feeling, only because Mr. Davis and his advisers were on principle averse to extreme or unusual measures, and thus exposed themselves, with an influential section of public opinion, to the charge of not being sufficiently vigorous in the prosecution of the war, or energetic in the selection of the means. Thus it has happened that several of the most important of the laws now under consideration were introduced and mainly supported by avowed opponents of the Administration; and if the President has in the end given them a cordial approval, it is because he had become convinced that the almost unanimous voice of the people had anticipated his approval. Even now doubts are expressed by those who mistake his scrupulous hesitation for lack of vigour, that in the administration of these laws he may soften and relax their severity, and thus impair their usefulness. Such doubts are founded in an utter misconception of the character of the man into whose hands Providence has entrusted such momentous destinies.

In these laws, as in every other fact which this war has brought to light, it is instructive to notice the contrast between the two nations whom the Powers of Europe still affect to consider as one and indivisible. While the North, heedless of the future, seeks only to prolong the intoxication of the present, dashes on recklessly, blindly, madly, neither knowing nor caring whither, the South, undaunted, gauges the depths of her present sufferings, and girds her loins to meet the worst that the future can have in store. With not a hostile foot on its own soil, the North has flung herself, in the very wantonness of folly, at the feet of a vulgar and idiotic tyranny; an invasion of one million of armed men has not forced the South to abandon a single safeguard of individual liberty; but every other sacrifice save that she has made, and the only complaint of her population is, that the leaders are too parsimonious of blood and treasure. To the feverish excitement of the North the South opposes a calm self-possession which is never tempted by a seductive delusion, which husbands every resource, and profits by every substantial advantage. The North, rich, arrogant, apparently prosperous, has not yet had the courage to tax herself in earnest; the South, poor, depleted, blockaded, finds in the patriotism of her people the strength to tax herself to the extent of two-thirds of her entire circulating medium.

It is to this financial legislation that we desire especially to direct attention. In periods of patriotic exaltation, blood is more readily poured forth than treasure, perhaps because the one is generally given by a class different from that which can give the other. In all wars, even popular wars, men are more easily found than money, which has, therefore, become proverbially accepted as the sinews of war. In the Confederate States the one is as cheap as the other when paid as the price of independence. It is possible that other nations may have done as much in offering up the flower of their youth on the field of battle; the financial heroism of the Confederacy is, we believe, without a parallel.

In a report of the Special Committee on Finance of the Confederate Senate, Hons. R. M. T. Hunter, and Thomas J. Semmes, composing the Committee, give a plain-spoken account of the financial errors heretofore committed, and their consequences.

The first attempt of the Government (they say) to convert its credit into a currency, and thus borrow, to a certain extent, without interest, was made at the second session of Congress in Montgomery, Alabama. By the Act of May 6th, 1861, provision was made for a loan of $50,000,000 on bonds bearing eight per cent. interest, and for the issue of twenty millions of treasury notes, without interest, payable after the war, and receivable in payment of public dues. These notes were fundable at the pleasure of the holder in eight per cent. bonds, which were reconvertible into like notes whenever he might desire to do so. Upon the theory of this system of finance, the currency was to be self-regulating in regard to an undue expansion or contraction by adjusting itself to the level of a bond paying eight per cent. interest in specie. If such a bond was worth par or nearly par in specie, then the currency could not fall much below that value by expansion, or rise much above it by contraction. For in the one case the surplus would be funded by the operation of individual interest, and in the other the equilibrium would be restored by a reconversion of a portion of the bonds into notes. But to sustain such a scheme of currency, the payment of the interest upon the bond in specie was indispensable. When, therefore, it became obvious that this could not be done, and that war on a great scale was to be maintained chiefly by the use of public credit, it ought to have been understood that the self-regulating feature of this system was lost, and that the necessity had arisen to place the finances upon a different foundation.

The result of the initial error in finance was that the prices of all commodities increased fourfold; but gold, the ostensible standard of values, became worth five times as much as it was at the outbreak of the war. This double and apparently anomalous phenomenon the Committee keep distinctly in view, never confounding the value of gold with that of necessaries of life. 'When trade is open to the world, the value of specie is nearly equal in all places between which there is a free exchange of commodities; but when a country is closely blockaded, and cannot export its products freely in exchange for specie, that article may become of greater value there on account of its scarcity than it bears to the rest of the world.' They are not, therefore, frightened by the abnormal quotations of gold, and, measuring the value of the Confederate paper currency solely by its purchasing power, they find that its depreciation is very nearly proportionate to its redundancy. They assert, as a fundamental principle, that, whenever the circulating medium is fully equal in amount to the business wants of the community, every additional issue operates as an indirect tax upon the holders of the currency. Every time the currency is doubled, the public is taxed 50 per cent. on the amount of currency previously held, because after every such duplication the same nominal sum will purchase only half the quantity of commodities. As such a tax is unavoidable when the necessities of the Government vastly exceed its ordinary resources, they call upon the public to submit to it in a form which, being least disguised, is most onerous to the individual, but least exhaustive to the community. 'If we tax the notes by diminishing their amount we appreciate their value, but if we tax them indirectly by new issues we depreciate the value of the note.' It is generally difficult to make the great body of tax-payers accept such a principle in practice, and to see its operation in the light of the public good; but in the Confederacy this difficulty appears not to have existed. The tax law now in operation embodies the essential recommendations of the Committee. For its provisions in detail we refer the reader to another page. It is sufficient here to point out that it provides for the rapid funding at low interest of the entire volume of the currency, to be replaced by a new currency of fixed and invariable volume. In default of funding at an early date, the larger denominations of Treasury notes are smitten with a tax which, at one blow, reduces their amount by one-third, to be deducted from their face on their being presented for payment, and if the funding is further delayed, the accelerating operation of the tax gradually extinguishes the note altogether. The smaller denominations of notes are exempted from this tax, probably for the reason that they may be held in amounts insufficient for funding, and that they form the only money of the poor, but it is calculated that they will be exchanged, at rates provided in the law, for the new and more valuable issues.

We cannot better conclude our brief reference to this remarkable scheme of taxation than in the words of the Committee whose report we have already quoted:—

> The sense of justice and public opinion which have already smoothed down many difficulties in the way of our circulation, will probably prescribe the true standard by which contracts will be settled. Indeed, it may be a question for the courts to decide whether, in the absence of an express stipulation to the contrary, the values contemplated in the contract are not to be measured in the actual values of the Treasury notes at the time when it was made, as estimated in the currency in which the debts are to be paid. It has been apprehended by some that so large a tax upon the note will be regarded as repudiation, and seriously injure our credit in public opinion. But if it be true that the proposed scheme leaves the note as valuable in the hands of the holder after its operation as before—that, in any aspect of the case, it gives him more than he gave for the note—and that, viewed as a tax alone, the imposition is equal and just, then there is no man of fair mind who would discredit a government for such legislation. It cannot be denied but that the world is often carried away by appearances. The plausible is sometimes the worst enemy of the true. But in this case our people at least are deeply interested in ascertaining the truth, and there is not much fear but that in the end they will find it. They will sustain any scheme of finance which they believe to be just, and which promises the means to carry on the war for some time to come. Of course no scheme can operate successfully in the face of serious military reverses, or if the industrial system is too much impoverished in the effort to place men in the field. But the first we do not apprehend, and the latter we must guard against. For the rest, it is to be said that it is the people's government, the people's war, and the people's credit.

Ministerial Changes.

Says Lord Palmerston to Earl Russell (vide Punch, of April 2), 'My dear Johnny, the Easter vacation is a great institution, so—rest and be thankful!' Never before had a British Cabinet so much reason to be thankful for the brief Easter recess. Daily, we might almost write hourly, the Government was assailed, and always with more or less effect. When the House divided, the Ministerial supporters were shocked at the smallness of the majorities; nor were they less horrified at seeing the Civil Lord of the Admiralty worried and mangled by such a very small creature as Cox—Wat Tyler Cox—of Finsbury, and at seeing Mr. Gladstone dragged through the mire by an honourable nobody who rejoices in the name of Sheridan, and by a peculiar freak of fortune represents the select constituency of Dudley. Messrs. Cox and Sheridan were quite unconsciously playing the rôle of political hangmen. So long as we punish murder with death, the office of Jack Ketch is necessary, but it will never be esteemed an ennobling employment; and in like manner did the Parliamentary heroes of the Lent Session perform a necessary but nasty office.

The Opposition were perfectly aware of the charge brought against Mr. Stansfeld by the Procureur-Général, but it was not pleasant to have to attack a very young, and, officially, a comparatively insignificant member of the Government. It was, therefore, a relief when Mr. Cox, who certainly is not thin-skinned, and who has not any political reputation to jeopardise, brought the matter before the House; and if Mr. Stansfeld had been discreet, and, instead of defending M. Mazzini, had frankly stated his position, and avowed his intention of doing nothing, so long as he held office, to compromise the Government with our ally, we are confident that the Opposition would not have given him any further trouble. Then, with Mr. Gladstone, it was desirable that some check should be applied to too sweeping denunciations of a rotten system of business, and it was a comfort to the Opposition that Mr. Sheridan put himself forward, and in his case also a discreet explanation would have prevented the damaging discussions that ensued. However, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Civil Lord of the Admiralty were indiscreet; and Messrs. Cox and Sheridan, doubtless to their surprise and delight, were, for a few weeks, dragged out of befitting Parliamentary obscurity, and were able to hurt the Ministry, already reeling from the sharp criticisms on its foreign policy. Towards Easter the county members leave London, or it is not improbable that the Government might have been defeated on a question that would have involved a resignation or the announcement of a dissolution after due provision had been made for the requirements of the public service. But the Easter vacation came, and came unusually early, and the Government rested awhile from their Parliamentary toils, and could prepare for the ensuing campaign.

The resignation of the Duke of Newcastle is, no doubt, the result of ill-health, but the moment chosen for it indicates that the Government think they need all the help they can obtain. The illness of the Duke is not of recent date, and we are happy to say that, so far from getting worse, his health has lately improved. But as he is not able to attend the House of Lords, and as sharp debates are expected, it was necessary to replace him by some one who could help the Government at the crisis. The recess has been used amongst other things in filling up the vacancy advantageously, and the arrangements being completed on Saturday—on the eve of the meeting of Parliament—the Duke sends in his resignation. The Ministerial organs have not cause for excessive exultation, though it is true that the Government is rather stronger than it was before the changes that have just been announced—stronger, that is, only for the conduct of business, for the new member of the Government has no following that is not already in the Ministerial camp.

It is no compliment to Mr. Cardwell to express an opinion that he is capable of discharging the duties of Colonial Minister to the satisfaction of the country. It is supposed that anybody who is poor and a scion of one of the governing families can administer the affairs of a colony, and that anybody who has to be handsomely provided for in the Cabinet can be properly intrusted with the seals of the Colonial Office. And there is considerable truth in this assumption. The business of the British Colonial Minister is to help the Governors of British colonies to do nothing, the routine duties prescribed and permitted by colonial Legislatures excepted. It is much to be regretted that Earl Russell was not Colonial Secretary, for then he could have written any number of despatches without doing any harm. So far, then, as the Colonial Office is concerned, there is nothing to regret in the recent changes, and Mr. Cardwell, though not a great debater, will be of service to his party, in occupying a more dignified position. It is also a matter of congratulation that another department of the Government is represented by its chief in the House of Commons.

The acceptance of office by Lord Clarendon is more important. His Lordship was for five years Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and five years Foreign Secretary, and some surprise has been expressed that he should accept the insignificant post of Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. We do not share this surprise, or think that the proceeding results solely from an intense desire to hold office. In politics, as in love, it is often necessary to stoop to conquer. Lord Clarendon may naturally regard himself, as others regard him, as the heir-apparent to the Liberal Premiership, and he confers a much greater obligation on his party by taking a minor office at a critical moment than he could by accepting one of the chief offices. Lord Palmerston owes much of his popularity to the cheerful alacrity with which he discharged the duties of Home Secretary after holding higher appointments. Self-sacrifice is the virtue most esteemed by party men, and is, indeed, the strength and vitality of party organisation. Of course, if Lord Clarendon had wished it, he could have had the Colonial Secretaryship, but the Chancellorship of the Duchy of Lancaster is a safer and even more dignified place for one who expects to be First Minister of the Crown. But, whatever the motive, the enrolment of Lord Clarendon in the Ministerial ranks will be a boon to our Foreign Secretary, who will now have able and well-informed aid in defending the proceedings of the Government. It will also do the Government good abroad. Lord Clarendon is much respected for knowledge of foreign affairs and for firmness of purpose.

The resignation of Mr. Stansfeld is an unquestionable gain to the Government, by depriving the Opposition of a ground of attack; but it is not the less a confession of weakness on the part of Lord Palmerston. If it was proper for Mr. Stansfeld to resign, why did he not do so before Easter? Lord Palmerston declared that he regretted the loss of Mr. Stansfeld's services, and that his faith in his late colleague's good conduct was unshaken. Then why accept the resignation? The reason is sufficiently clear. The Government was warned that its existence was menaced, and that it could only fight through the session by throwing overboard every incumbrance. If Lord Palmerston had not been conscious of his weakness, he would not have yielded the point. Indeed, no attempt was made to conceal the reason of the resignation, but, on the contrary, Mr. Stansfeld said 'he could not continue to be a cause of embarrassment to a Government which he desired to support.' A more ungracious and untenable excuse cannot be conceived. It is an intimation to the Emperor of the French that it is not from any good-will to him that a Minister of the Crown resigns office because his name has unfortunately been mixed up with plots of assassination. And the excuse is untenable as well as discourteous. We fully and entirely acquit Mr. Stansfeld of having at any time been privy to, or of having consciously aided, any assassination plot. The charge is preposterous; and if it were not, the denial of a man of Mr. Stansfeld's integrity is conclusive. But we cannot acquit him of gross indiscretion, and we hold that it was his duty to resign, and Lord Palmerston's to accept his resignation. Mr. Stansfeld, however, declares himself blameless, and Lord Palmerston avows the same opinion. This being so, Mr. Stansfeld ought not to have resigned, and Lord Palmerston ought not to have accepted his resignation. A frank confession of error would have been better policy. Now the country, if it give credit to the statements of the honourable gentleman and the noble Lord, must believe that Mr. Stansfeld resigns because the Government is too weak to repel an unjust accusation, and that Lord Palmerston sacrifices an innocent colleague and a useful public servant rather than incur the risk of losing office.

Altogether, the recent Ministerial changes will not permanently strengthen the Government. They will enable it to make a better fight and to arrest a damaging discussion, but they do not increase its force or diminish the force of the Opposition. In one respect they will tend to weaken the Government. Mr. Stansfeld's promotion did not conciliate the Radicals so much as his loss of office will irritate them.

Legal Aspect of the Chesapeake Case.

The Hon. J. P. Holcombe, of Virginia, has been despatched by the Confederate Government as a Special Commissioner to Halifax, Nova Scotia, to represent and defend the interests of the Confederacy, as a recognised belligerent Power, in the judicial proceedings that have arisen, or may hereafter arise, in the case of the Chesapeake. It is understood that the Confederate Government claims that the captors of that vessel acted under its authority, and that, unless the facts connected with the capture should hereafter appear very different from those known at Richmond, or as yet developed by judicial enquiry, the Confederate Government maintains and vindicates the act of the captors, and assumes all the responsibility properly attaching to it. We are not advised whether Mr. Holcombe arrived in time to present his claim before the recent decisions of the colonial Courts, but at all events these decisions do not by any means end the matter. By the law of nations, the assumption of responsibility by the Government of the captors relieves them from all the consequences of their act, and entitles them to immediate and unconditional liberation from all restraint upon their persons. But even if this result had been already anticipated by the action of the colonial authorities, the ownership of the vessel will probably give rise to very difficult and interesting questions of law. It will scarcely be contended that the Confederate Government cannot become a party to this litigation on account of not being diplomatically recognised by the British Government. Its rights as a belligerent Power are not dependent upon its political relations with neutrals, and are as distinctly recognised and as ample as if those relations were as completely satisfactory as they are the reverse. It is therefore not inopportune, especially while a very analogous case is about to receive judicial investigation at Liverpool, to invite attention to the many and important points of law involved in the capture of the Chesapeake, her condemnation, and the trial of her captors by a British colonial Court. Before doing so it will be necessary to glance briefly at the facts of the case.

John Clibbon Braine and Henry A. Parr, two citizens of the Confederate States, enlisted in its military service, and who had been previously prisoners of war in the hands of the Federals, formed a plan with Captain Parker, bearing a letter of marque from the Confederate States Government, to make prize of a merchant steamer of the United States, and take her into a Confederate port. The stratagem devised was that they should proceed, disguised, to New York, and, with a party of men under their orders, make pretence of a desire to go as passengers from New York to Portland, in the State of Maine, and, if successful in deceiving the enemy, to rise upon the captain and crew of the steamer when at sea, seize the vessel, and, after taking in sufficient coal, to make the port of Wilmington, running the hazard of passing through the enemy's blockading fleet. They went to New York, and purchased there the necessary arms and equipments for their contemplated enterprise; thus armed and equipped, they succeeded in obtaining passage, without detection (for themselves and a body of men, twelve in number, whom they had engaged to serve under them), on board the United States merchant steamer Chesapeake, which left New York on Saturday, December 5, 1863, bound for Portland in Maine; when on the high seas, early in the morning of Monday, December 7, they surprised those in command of the Chesapeake, and captured her after a struggle of a few minutes' duration, without further bloodshed than the killing of one and the wounding of two of her officers. The captors announced themselves as in the service of the Confederate States, and informed the prisoners that they were prisoners of the Confederate States. The captors, who had thus obtained possession of the prize in strict accordance with the instructions usually given to the private armed vessels of the Confederacy, took the Chesapeake into the Bay of Fundy; and when near the port of St. John, New Brunswick, the officers, passengers, and crew of the Chesapeake (except two engineers and three firemen) were released and placed on board of a pilot-boat which had been procured for that purpose. The steamer then proceeded to the southern coast of Nova Scotia to receive the fuel and supplies necessary to enable her to prosecute her voyage to the Confederate States. She arrived in Sambro' Harbour, Nova Scotia, where she was lying in possession of her captors, and receiving coal from a British vessel in the harbour, when the United States gunboat Ella and Annie entered the British port, and her commander, with that habitual contempt of the territorial sovereignty of Great Britain and of her neutral rights which characterises his nation, recaptured the prize steamer, arrested one of the crew and two engineers who had been employed to aid in running her to Wilmington, committed acts of violence on the coal schooner, and then left the British port with the Chesapeake in possession, bound for the United States. The captain of the Ella and Annie, it appears, was met at sea by a superior officer of the Federal navy, and was ordered by him to return to Nova Scotia, and to restore the Chesapeake to the jurisdiction of Great Britain, from which it had been wrongfully abducted. The Ella and Annie accordingly took the Chesapeake to the port of Halifax, where she was delivered up to the British authorities. The prisoners were kept concealed by the Federal officers, and their existence denied; but upon the peremptory demand of the Governor accompanied by a demonstration of military preparation, which indicated that the demand could not be evaded with impunity, the prisoners were delivered up. The official agents of the United States then commenced a series of attempts to obtain possession of the persons of those engaged in the enterprise, on the absurd pretence that they were pirates and murderers who had committed crimes within the jurisdiction of the United States, and who ought, therefore, to be delivered up to the Federal authorities under the Extradition Treaty of 1842 between the United States and Great Britain.

On these facts arise grave questions of international law, involving the reciprocal rights and duties of the belligerents, not only as between themselves, but between each belligerent and Great Britain as a neutral Power. The principles of the law of nations touching this case are among the clearest of those recognised by the publicists of the two Governments (Federal and English), and sanctioned by the decisions of their Courts; and the following positions will, doubtless, be insisted on as the basis of the claims put forward by the Confederate Government.

1. Braine and Parr, as citizens of the Confederate States, had the right, during the pending war, even without a commission from their Government, to capture and make prize of the public and private vessels of the United States, wherever and whenever found (except when within the protection of neutral jurisdiction); and vessels and cargoes belonging to the enemies of the Confederate States, when thus captured by Confederate citizens, may be lawfully condemned to the Confederate Government as prize of war, or, as they are technically called, 'Droits of Admiralty.'

Lawrence's Wheaton's Law of Nations, ed. 1863, p. 627, p. 189, Lawrence's note. 3 Phil. International Law, 50, 486-9, 562. Case of McLeod: see Phil. 50.

2. Citizens of the Confederate States engaged in any enterprise, plot, or stratagem for the capture of vessels of the enemy, can by no possibility be classed as pirates or murderers, without a perversion of the meaning of words whose signification is well established. Whether, under certain aggravated circumstances—not existing in the present case—such persons would forfeit their claim to be treated as prisoners of war, if they fell into the hands of their enemies, is foreign to this discussion; the sole question here being whether a neutral Power can lawfully deliver up the citizens of one belligerent in order that they may be made to answer as criminals for acts of hostility committed in the name of their Government against an enemy on the high seas. (See authorities last cited.)

3. The steamer Chesapeake, while lying within the jurisdiction of a neutral Power, in the hands of her captors, was beyond the reach of recapture. The tortious seizure of the vessel and cargo by the armed cruiser of the United States was absolutely illegal and void, and imposed on the British Government the duty of demanding the restoration of the vessel to the possession of the captors. The voluntary rendition of the vessel and cargo to the neutral authorities confers no right to retain them, but imposes the duty of restoring them to the captors.

3 Phil. 227-8. Lawrence's Wheaton, ed. 1863, p. 715, and notes by Lawrence.

4. The Courts of Admiralty of the neutral Power have no jurisdiction to determine whether the Chesapeake was or was not good prize of war. The jurisdiction over that subject is exclusively vested in the Courts of Admiralty of the Confederate States. The proceedings, therefore, before the British Vice-Admiralty are 'coram non judice,' and cannot affect the rights of the Confederate Government in the premises.

3 Phil. 228–468. The Flow Oyer, 1 Rob. Adm. 135. Lawrence's Wheaton, 670.

5. The Admiralty Courts of the Confederate States are vested with jurisdiction to determine whether the Chesapeake and her cargo are prize of war. The proceedings instituted in the Admiralty Court in Richmond are justified by the law of nations, which permits the adjudication of prize causes, when the prize is within neutral jurisdiction, with the same validity as if within the jurisdiction of the captor.

Lawrence's Wheaton, 670. 3 Phil. 482.

6. The present case is not affected by the fact that the British Government has prohibited the armed ships and privateers of both belligerents 'from carrying prizes made by them into the ports, harbours, roadsteads, or waters of the United Kingdom, or of any of HER MAJESTY'S colonies or possessions abroad' —first, because the case is not within the terms of the prohibition; secondly, because the Chesapeake was carried into a British port, not in disregard of the QUEEN'S prohibition, but under the stress of necessity, temporarily, and for the sole purpose of procuring the fuel without which she could not proceed to a Confederate port; and thirdly, because, even if an infraction of the rule established by the British Government had occurred, this fact might justify that Government in compelling the immediate departure of the prize vessel from its ports, but could not vest in it the right of withholding the prize from the possession of the captors, or assuming jurisdiction to dispose of it.

7. Nor would the case be altered if it should appear that the parties engaged in the capture of the Chesapeake took their departure from the neutral jurisdiction with the intent of making the capture. The Courts of the neutral Power have an exceptional jurisdiction in cases of prizes brought within its territory, if the capture was made within its territorial limits, or by armed expeditions fitted out within its limits. In the present case the expedition was fitted out, and all the arms and equipments of the captors were procured and prepared, in the port of New York, within the territory of the enemy.

The Estrella, 4 Wheaton, 298. The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheaton, 283. Wheaton's Law of Nations, 671. 3 Phil. 477–9.

8. The fact that the Confederate Government is not recognised by that of the neutral Power as an independent Government, does not affect the question now involved. The recognition of the Confederate States as a belligerent entitles them to the exercise of all the rights and powers of an independent belligerent nation as against both the enemy and the neutral. (See authorities just cited.)

9. The British Government is bound to reimburse to the Confederate Government the value of the Chesapeake and cargo.

THE BAHAMAS.

THE following correspondence between the Duke of Newcastle and Governor Bayley will repay a careful perusal:—

Downing Street, April 11, 1863.

SIR,—I have just received your despatch, No. 18, of 8th March last, enclosing a copy of the speech which you addressed to the Bahama Legislature on the 2nd of that month.

I am obliged to inform you that I can by no means approve that part of your speech in which you allude to the practice of despatching vessels from Nassau to the blockaded ports of the Confederate States.

It is perfectly true that the British Government is not bound to interfere in order to repress or even to discountenance this practice, just as the British Government is not bound to interfere with operations carried on by British subjects in violation of the revenue laws of a foreign country.

But it is undoubted that a belligerent has a right to blockade the port of his enemy—that a breach of blockade is an invasion of that right—and that the power whose belligerent rights are thus violated may reasonably complain that Her Majesty's representative speaking publicly in his official capacity should refer to proceedings thus injurious to its interests in a tone of encouragement or protection.

I have no doubt the language which you used was very acceptable to the inhabitants of the colony, who are naturally anxious to make the most of what are apparently the advantages of their present position relatively to the seat of war. But I think you failed to observe that, in using it, you were laying yourself open to a charge of unfriendly conduct towards a neighbouring power, and were impairing the position of the Government which you serve.—I have, &c.

(Signed) NEWCASTLE.

Governor Bayley, C.B., to His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, K.G.

Government House, Nassau, Bahamas, May 5, 1863.

MY LORD DUKE,—1. I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your Grace's despatch, No. 354, of the 11th of April.

2. The communication of your Grace's strictures on some parts of the speech delivered by me at the opening of the Legislative Session, while it has naturally caused me great concern, has induced me to reperuse the censured paragraphs, in conjunction with the comments upon it contained in your Grace's despatch.

3. I can assure your Grace that nothing could give me greater pain than the conviction that I had, in my official capacity, justly laid myself open to the charge of unfriendly conduct to a neighbouring power, or had by any act of mine impaired the position of the Government which I serve.

4. I have accordingly devoted some time to the reconsideration of the paragraphs of my speech which provoked your Grace's criticism, with a view to their retractation or palliation on some future opportunity.

5. But I trust that your Grace will bear with me when I avow my inability to discover in what respects I have laid myself open to the strictures contained in your Grace's despatch.

6. Your Grace remarks that 'a belligerent has a right to blockade the ports of his enemy.' I would respectfully ask in what way I have gainsaid this proposition. If your Grace will have the goodness to look at the speech again, I think it will appear that I have distinctly admitted this right, and that I have spoken of our right of trading with the blockaded ports as one conflicting with and limited by the exercise of this right of blockade. Again, I would deferentially submit that I have said nothing to controvert the other proposition; viz., that a breach of blockade is an invasion of the blockading right. But I would at the same time avow my belief that the right of blockade is dependent on and co-equal with its power of maintaining itself. It is a right which exists so long as those who claim it have the power to enforce it, and no longer. It is a right which is necessarily subject to attempts of defeat and evasion, during the whole period of its assertion. A blockade which cannot be maintained by force virtually ceases to be a blockade. And whether it can maintain itself or not, can only be ascertained by the success or failure of those who seek to regain for the purposes of commerce a general liberty restricted and qualified for the temporary purposes of war. Indeed, your Grace will not fail to observe that throughout those paragraphs of my speech which relate to the blockade I have studiously regarded the right of neutral commerce as conflicting with and modified by the privilege of hostile blockade. In this respect I have followed the doctrine of the principal authorities on international law, including Chancellor Kent as quoted by Her Majesty's Solicitor-General in the House of Commons, in the debate of February 20, 1862. This great jurist says: 'It was contended on the part of the French nation in 1796, that neutral Governments were bound to restrain their subjects from selling or exporting articles contraband of war to the belligerent powers. But it was successfully shown on the part of the United States, that neutrals may lawfully sell at home to a belligerent purchaser, or carry, themselves, to the belligerent powers, contraband articles, subject to the right of seizure in transitu. This right has since been explicitly declared by the judicial authorities of this country. The right of the neutral to transport, and of the hostile power to seize, are conflicting rights, and neither party can charge the other with a criminal act.'

7. Now the illegality of these commercial operations is, I take it, purely conventional. It is entirely the creation of law. It does not emanate from the conscience of mankind. It involves no consciousness of moral guilt. It is a 'malum prohibitum,' not a malum in se. Yet for months past the journals and mob orators of the Northern States had been hurling the heaviest denunciations at our colonists, as if they had committed some flagrant enormity in doing or attempting to do the very same things which their accusers had always done, not only without self-reproach, but even with extreme self-complacency.

8. I hope your Grace does not consider that under such circumstances it was more improper for me to remind the colonists that illegality differed from criminality than it was to admonish them that a certain risk accompanied the illegality. For, while the people of the Northern States denounced them as deserving the punishment due to actual crime, they themselves claimed complete immunity and full protection in the prosecution of that which they considered a neutral and innocent trade.

9. I think that, on a second perusal of my speech, your Grace will perceive that I clearly explained to them that the enterprises in which they had embarked exposed them to risk and dangers from which it was not the duty of the Imperial Government to protect them.

10. I should be extremely sorry to think that any words uttered by me on this occasion had justly wounded the susceptibilities or provoked the indignation of a friendly power; and the longer I dwell on the subject, the less reason does there seem to me for supposing that such an impression can have been made. For your Grace will see that the right which I claimed for the colonists is the right of trading, not only with one, but with either or both of the belligerent States. And two things induce me to believe that no unfavourable impression was made upon just and reasonable men in the Northern States. The first is the opinion expressed by many respectable Northerners staying here during the winter, the general tenor of which may be summed up in the words of one of them: 'You (i. e. the English) have done exactly what we should have done in similar circumstances; you have traded with both parties at the same time.' The second is that the New York Herald, in an article designed to be bitterly severe upon my speech, entirely misquotes and misinterprets it, disconnecting its consecutive paragraphs, and inserting inappropriate glosses. This article of the Herald, to which I refer, is copied into the English paper, the Public Opinion of April 11.

11. On the whole, my Lord Duke, I trust that a later perusal will convince your Grace that in this speech I have stated nothing with regard to the rights of blockade but what has been recognised by the general consent of the most eminent jurists; that with regard to the risks of blockade it would hardly have become me to remain silent at a time when some of the colonists seemed to expect a more ample protection from Her Majesty's Government in prosecuting their traffic with the South; and that as to any encouragement which my words may have given to those who are engaged in it, I could not well have spoken unfavourably of a traffic which, if it has been profitable to Nassau, has been infinitely more profitable to the mother country, and has in no small degree contributed to readjust the equilibrium of commercial speculation, so severely tried and endangered by the depression of the manufacturing interests in the Northern counties.

I have, &c.

(Signed) C. J. BAYLEY, Governor.

Downing Street, June 6, 1863.

SIR,—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your despatch, No. 45, of the 5th ultimo, in answer to the comments made in my despatch of the 11th April on that part of your speech to the Bahama Legislature which relates to the traffic carried on from Nassau with the blockaded ports of the Confederate States.

2. As your explanations now received have not removed my objections to that speech, I think it best to transmit you that whatever opinions you may individually entertain on the points to which you advert, what is expected of you is that you will not without urgent occasion or without authority express opinions affecting the relations of Her Majesty's Government with foreign Governments and countries, and that you will abstain from adopting a tone and sphere of action leading to questions of the right of blockade, which can only be settled by yourself, is, I think, what ordinary forethought should have led you to anticipate.

I have, &c.,

LETTERS FROM RICHMOND.

FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

February 22, 1864.

THE ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS—THE MILITARY BILL—THE TAX BILL—THE CURRENCY BILL: THE PEOPLE APPROVE THIS STRINGENT LEGISLATION—THEIR INDOMITABLE RESOLUTION—THE CLOSING SCENES IN CONGRESS—THE MOVEMENTS OF SHERMAN—THE SIEGE OF CHARLESTON—THE FEDERALS DEFEATED IN AN ATTEMPT TO OCCUPY JOHN'S ISLAND—THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT AND THE YANKEE PRISONERS IN THE SOUTH—THE CASE OF MRS. PATTERSON ALLAN—RICHMOND ITEMS.

THE first Congress of the Confederate States under the permanent Government adjourned on the 18th instant, after having nobly performed its duties to the country in the passage of a series of measures which will undoubtedly fill up our armies, provide ample funds for carrying on the war, and raise the currency from its present state of extreme depression. The Military Bill places the entire male population of the Confederacy, between the ages of 18 and 45, in the field, and creates a reserve force of such as are between 17 and 18, and 45 and 50. The list of exemptions is very small indeed. The Tax Bill imposes a burden of 5 per cent. on all descriptions of property. The Currency Bill calls in all the outstanding Treasury notes, to be funded in 4 per cent. stocks, before April 1, and declares that such as remain in circulation after that time shall be subject to a depreciation of 33 per cent., or, in other words, that, when presented at the Treasury, they shall be redeemed by the payment of 67 cents in the dollar of the new currency. There is but one opinion expressed as to the wisdom of all this stringent legislation. The people everywhere approve it. That it will work great hardship in many cases, they know full well. Indeed, such weighty burdens could not be laid upon any people who were not terribly in earnest in what they were about. A tax like this would cause a revolution in any Government of Europe. Such a conscription would hardly be attempted by the Czar. Experiments of a like character would not lightly be determined on in Turkish finance. Let the Yankees and the world at large see, from the boldness with which Congress has carried out this work of patriotism and the cheerful acquiescence which it has met with at the hands of their constituents, that the Confederates are willing to make any sacrifices which are necessary for the accomplishment of their independence. You will recollect, in the affecting story of Palissy the Potter, how, when every resource had been exhausted to keep up the fires in his furnaces, that resolute child of genius broke up his furniture and fed the flames with the costly fragments. He pursued his dream of beauty in enamelled porcelain with heroic self-abnegation to final triumph, and left behind him, in the exquisite wares which are now kept in the museums of the Continent as the richest legacies of art in the 16th century, the invaluable lesson that earnestness and fortitude will ultimately overcome all opposing obstacles, and command success. Palissy's plates and dishes are very delicate things—bien fragiles, indeed—and may all go the way of less precious crockery: but the moral of his life will survive the mutations of empire: it is, in truth, imperishable. Like Palissy, the Southern people are prepared to part with everything that is necessary for the prosecution of the mighty work in which all their energies are engaged. They will be free—they will rid themselves of the tyranny of the North—they will stand up in the majesty of an independent people, though the end involve everything of a material nature that is prized by man. It is amusing to see with what eagerness the Yankees publish the avowals of anti-slavery opinions on the part of English sympathisers with our cause, as if they thought that we would be willing to go back into their accursed Union if we could but hold on to slavery. Slavery, we believe, will vindicate itself in the forum of the world's opinion; we can respect the natural prejudices of men like Lord Wharncliffe, and leave it to time to remove from us the obloquy under which we have suffered; but if slavery were to be swept away utterly by this war from the face of the Confederate States, we should accept the result as fortunate in comparison with political reunion with the Northern people. We will undergo anything but that; and such is the significance of the legislation of Congress. Happy Yankees, if they would but recognise and heed the same!

The closing scenes in both Houses of Congress were full of pathetic interest. The day before the adjournment, the noble 'Address of Congress to the People of the Confederate States' was read in the House of Representatives. There was not a heart unmoved in the crowded auditory, as sentence after sentence of lofty defiance and patriotic sentiment rang out on the ear like the blast of a trumpet; and when, after a simple recital of our wrongs at the hands of the enemy, the eloquent memorial turned to the sufferings and heroism of individual States, at the name of Virginia floor and galleries broke out together in an irrepressible burst of applause. This address is from the pen of J. L. M. Curry, of Alabama, one of the forty members who failed of reelection to the House, and, like everything else that has come from that gentleman, bears the impress of a naturally powerful and highly cultivated mind. Mr. Curry goes directly from his labours in the councils of his country to the hard service of the field as a private in a cavalry company in an Alabama regiment. Of such material are largely composed the armies which are battling for freedom against the Federal hosts recruited from the Shannon and the Rhine! The last moments of the session, as well in the Senate as in the House of Representatives, were devoted to paying the customary tributes to a deceased member, the late M. R. H. Garnett of Virginia. Something beyond the ordinary feeling on such occasions entered into the speeches which were made in both Houses. The decorous solemnity which befitted such proceedings was rather heightened in effect by the valedictory remarks of Mr. Bocock, the Speaker of the Representatives, and Mr. Hunter, President pro tempore of the Senate; and then the members of the First Congress bade each other farewell. But you will have remarked that they did not adjourn until they had recommended by joint resolution the observance of Friday, the 8th day of April next, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer. In this they but reflected the sentiment of our people, which is that of firm reliance on Almighty God, and humble submission to His chastisements in effecting the work of their national deliverance.

There have been some important military movements of the enemy in Mississippi, although in what force or with what purpose we are utterly unable to know here at the capital. It would seem that a very large body of Federal troops under Sherman have traversed the State from Vicksburg to the line of the Mobile and Ohio railroad, which road they now hold at Meridian. The telegraph has played its usual tricks with us with regard to this movement, now representing this column to be 35,000 strong, intended for the attack of Mobile, and now assuring us, on the authority of General Maury, that it did not exceed 1,000 in numbers, and meant nothing beyond a raid on the railroads. General Polk, who is in command of the Confederate troops in that department, has fallen back before them after some slight skirmishing, and chosen a point south of Meridian, where he will await their advance. It is most improbable that they seriously design attacking Mobile from this direction. The fate of that city is bound up in the struggle which must be soon fought out between Grant and Johnston for Georgia and Alabama. If Grant should defeat Johnston, then Mobile might fall into the hands of the Federals without further fighting. Meanwhile, it would seem premature in Sherman to hazard the attempt of taking the city, when failure would be the entire destruction of his command. It seems far more likely that the enemy desires to secure a point d'appui somewhere on the gulf, where the land forces would be in constant communication with the fleet, and from which they may move upon Mobile in a combined land and water assault some months later. By holding the lines of railway from Mobile and New Orleans to Northern Mississippi, they would possess themselves of a large cotton-growing region, and at the same time protect the navigation of the river, which is still interrupted at various points by our troops on this side. On the 16th inst. an expedition, fitted out by Farragut at New Orleans, consisting of seven mortar boats and four gunboats, acting in concert with Sherman, approached Mobile by Grant's Pass, and opened a terrific fire on Fort Powell, which replied with so much spirit and effect that the fleet was compelled to withdraw. But little damage was done to the fort, and the only casualties were one lieutenant and one sergeant slightly wounded. The siege of Charleston goes on as heretofore. The enemy's shells are crashing into the houses of the city, and doing considerable injury to the pavements, and an innocent cannonade is kept up irregularly on Sumter. The weekly record of the siege has been varied, since the date of my last letter, by two pleasing incidents—the sinking of one of the enemy's ships of war, an old-fashioned, three masted wooden vessel, and the defeat of the land forces, in an attempt to occupy John's Island, by the command of General Henry A. Wise.

Streight, with sixteen other officers escaped from the Libby prison, has reached Fortress Monroe. The Yankee papers are good enough to inform us that the advance of the enemy upon Bottom's Bridge, a fortnight ago, was made with the view of liberating their prisoners on Belle Isle and their compatriots of the Libby, and that, but for the unfortunate desertion of that inevitable scamp who is always sure to come over to us and reveal their plans just at the critical moment, it would certainly have succeeded.

The examination of Mrs. Patterson Allan for treasonable correspondence with the enemy, which has been going on for several weeks before Commissioner Watson, was brought to a close on Friday last, the Commissioner remanding her for trial at the next term of the Confederate States District Court, Judge Halyburton. Little doubt exists in the public mind of her guilt, but the public heart is tender towards women; and should she be found guilty, as is not improbable, it would sanction her pardon by the President. Meantime she has been admitted to bail under a bond for one hundred thousand dollars.

The weather during the past week has been absolutely hyperborean. On the morning of the 16th instant the mercury fell to 4° Fahrenheit. The James River was frozen over at the wharves of this city so firmly, that men walked across on the ice. One dreads to hear from our prisoners in their cruel exposure at Camp Douglas and on Johnson's Island.

Generals Bragg and Robert E. Lee are in town. There is a rumour that Bragg is to be reinstated in command in the South-Western department. General Lee is in the finest health and spirits, and the smile that lurks under his grizzled moustache is full of cheer for the summer campaign.

Marshal George P. Kane, of Baltimore, who was so long imprisoned in Fort Warren, and has been for some time past in Canada, arrived in Richmond yesterday, and, it is said, will enter the Confederate army.

The anniversary of the birthday of Washington was observed here to-day by closing all the offices in the several departments of the Confederate Government, the adjournment of the State Legislature, and the display of the national flag on all the public buildings.

Richmond: February 15, 1864.

THE REPORTED FAMINE IN THE SOUTH—REVELATIONS OF JIM, THE LATEST CONTRABAND—THE ADVERTISMENTS IN THE DAILY PAPERS—THE WANTS AND AMUSEMENTS OF THE PEOPLE—A VIEW OF THE ACTUAL CONDITION OF RICHMOND—PRESIDENT DAVIS'S ADDRESS TO THE ARMY—ACTS OF CONGRESS—THE ESCAPE OF FEDERAL OFFICERS FROM THE LIBBY PRISON—THE RECAPTURE OF FORTY-EIGHT—THE OBSERVANCE OF LENT—ADDRESS OF THE PROTESTANT EPISCOPAL BISHOP OF VIRGINIA—DEATH OF CLAUDE CROZET AND OF M. R. H. GARNETT.

A letter just received by flag of truce mail from a kind friend in the North, who yet retains tender feelings for Southern associates in days long syne, despite the ferocity of hate which rages from Maine to Minnesota for all 'Rebeldom,' expresses the Christian hope that your correspondent's household may be happily exempted from the prevailing horrors of the Confederate capital. The writer of the letter is evidently much touched by the grim revelations of Jim, the latest 'intelligent contraband' who has arrived safely in New York a fugitive from the family of Jefferson Davis, and who tells a delighted Northern public that the President is reduced to such culinary straits that a turkey is made to serve his establishment for three dinners—that it is served warm on Monday, reappears cold on Tuesday, and is finally finished in a hash on Wednesday. The amount of destitution and famine which such a restricted commissariat in the President's mansion would imply among the Confederate people at large, appears to give the liveliest gratification to the Yankees. If the story of Jim were true, the quiet endurance of the severest privations by the Confederates ought not only to secure the respect and sympathy of mankind, but convince the Yankees themselves of the utter hopelessness of Southern subjugation. It is due to truth, however, to declare that Jim is as great a liar as any of his predecessors or present associates, and that, while there is certainly some scarcity of provisions in Richmond, there is nothing like starvation. If the President's table is moderately served, about which your correspondent knows nothing whatever, it is because His Excellency does not think it becoming to feast while the army is stinted, and not because he cannot dine on partridges and venison when he pleases. The condition of affairs in a city can be derived as readily and as accurately, perhaps, from the advertisements in its daily papers as from any other index of current life: and the foreign reader, looking over the Richmond Daily Dispatch for Thursday, February 11, 1864, certainly would not gather from its 'wants,' 'special notices,' 'lost, strayed, &c.,' 'amusements,' and other contents of a business nature, that the citizens were suffering for food, or were under any immediate apprehension of being handed over to the enemy. If Richmond were blotted out of existence to-morrow—if, indeed, the Confederate States should disappear for ever beneath the waves of the ocean, and this copy of the Dispatch were all that should remain to convey to after times an idea of the habits and manners of their people, and the state of things in their capital, just before they became non-extant—it would never be suspected by the student who should ponder it that Richmond's citizens were perishing for want of provisions, or were exceedingly miserable at the danger which threatened them from the army of the United States. We read herein that Messrs. George Dunn & Co. have for sale a large assortment of valentines for the approaching Valentine's Day, and that these same public benefactors have published a pleasing variety of new music, among the titles of which that of 'No Surrender,' the piece itself illustrated by a battle-scene and picture of Fort Sumter, strikes us as patriotic and inspiring. And, as if to show that the Messrs. Dunn's musical publications were not neglected, and that the Confederates did not intend to permit music to become one of the lost arts among them, one gentleman advertises for a pianoforte, which he wishes to rent by the month, and another, who signs himself 'Beauharnais,' desires to secure for a Female College in South-western Virginia a professor of music. We learn, too, from these advertising columns that President Davis held a levee on Tuesday evening, the 9th instant; and we infer that it was crowded from this—that a lady offer liberally to reward any person who will restore to her a 'fine linen cambric handkerchief, trimmed with Valenciennes lace,' which she lost there. The stunning reward of one hundred dollars is promised to the fortunate finder of a 'black-and-tan terrier pup,' which certainly does not suggest the menace of starvation to the owner, unless we suppose that he wished to convert the terrier pup into pies. But, on the other hand, there are several advertisers who are willing to take boarders, and groceries of all kinds are set forth as for sale privately or at public auction. In the line of amusements there are some notable cards. There is to be, on the evening of the 11th, a 'grand select ball' at Monticello Hall. Dean Milman's tragedy of 'Fazio, or the Italian Wife,' is to be done in the most truly tragic manner (Bianca, Miss Eloise Bridges) at the Broad Street Theatre. 'Madlle. Donseux' proposes to make her 'fourth grand ascension on the tight-rope' that evening at Metrop'itan Hall. And a 'Professor,' who rejoices in the overpowering duplication of aristocratic names of 'J. St. Maur Bingham,' and who might be supposed therefrom to leave Mr. Turveydrop in melancholy eclipse for deportment, announces at his Concert Hall and Dancing Academy, Exchange Hotel, a series of most bewildering tableaux vivants, with sailor's hornpipe and highland fling. For the quieter and more intellectual portion of the community the Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association have made arrangements with the Rev. Dr. Duncan to give a lecture that evening on the 'Inspirations of the Age.' Such is a newspaper view of Richmond for the 11th day of February, 1864, and assuredly it does not afford the idea of a half-starved, badly-scared, mutinously discontented, thoroughly demoralised community, such as is to be derived from all the accounts of the Confederate capital that enliven the Northern newspapers. There has never been during the war a more cheerful temper or a more resolute spirit in the citizens of Richmond, one and all, old residents and officers of the Confederate Government, than we may remark at the present moment.

Reverting for one moment to the Dispatch of the 11th instant, a document may be found therein which will naturally attract a very large share of attention both in America and Europe—the address of President Davis to the soldiers of the Confederate States on their voluntary reenlistment for the continuance of the war. Admirable as have been all the previous official papers of the President, none has gone forth to the world which to a greater degree challenges the approval of the intelligent reader for the sentiments it contains, and the style of eloquent simplicity in which these sentiments are expressed. Earl Russell himself must read it, if not with satisfaction, at least with a constrained respect for its author. The sympathies of educated Englishmen must always be with good grammar and manly majesty. But there is an elevation of tone, a true dignity, a serene confidence in the ultimate triumph of right, an affecting recognition of the hand of Providence in human affairs, manifested throughout this address, which cannot but call up at once the noble language of Washington.

But three days more remain of the present session of Congress, which expires by limitation of law on the 18th, and the most important measures which have occupied the attention of both Houses yet hang suspended in the Committees of Conference, the Currency Bill and the Military Bill. Confederate bonds have gone up with astonishing activity in the Stock Exchange, under the general belief that the funding system will make the outstanding Treasury notes utterly worthless. It is not supposed that the Senate's extension of the conscription age to fifty-five will be a part of the Military Bill as it will become the law of the land. But we shall so soon know the exact provisions of both these vital acts of legislation, that it is idle to indulge in conjecture as to what they may or may not provide. One thing may be said of both, however—that the people and the army will respond with hearty enthusiasm to whatever the wisdom of Congress shall determine as indispensable to the public security. Among the Acts which have already passed both Houses and obtained the signature of the President, are two, complementary to each other, which will affect very materially the private convenience and interest of the speculator, and come home to the palates and pockets of a very considerable class of our population. The first absolutely prohibits the importation into the Confederate States of all articles of luxury, apparel, beverages, fruits, jewellery, furniture, paintings, or statuary. No more pale ale, no more cognac, no more London coats, no more Stilton cheeses; we must come down to Confederate homespun and ash-cake, and bid a longum vale to the julep. The second absolutely prohibits the exportation out of the Confederate States of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, &c., &c. No more running the blockade, therefore, by the private owner, thereby transferring his capital to England. The effect of this enactment must be salutary if the Government will take the exportation of cotton and tobacco into its own hands, and thus establish a credit abroad as a basis for our finances at home.

On Tuesday night of last week, the 9th inst., one hundred and nine Federal officers succeeded in making their escape from the Libby prison in this city, and, striking off into the country in every direction, had left their place of confinement many miles behind them before their flight was discovered. An animated pursuit of the fugitives was commenced early the next morning on all the roads and byways leading out of Richmond, and has been ever since kept up. Forty-eight of them had been recaptured up to last evening, and others will probably yet be brought in. Such as took the line across fields for York River have doubtless arrived within the Yankee lines of Butler, and we may look out for astounding narratives in forthcoming issues of the New York Herald. Their mode of escape was by tunnelling underground into the open street. The notorious Colonel Streight led the party, and has not yet been retaken. The modes of recapture of the forty-eight that have been recommitted to the Libby were various, and some not a little amusing. Two valiant Captains were brought to surrender by a couple of unarmed boys. One Colonel was overhauled by a negro on the tow-path of the James River Canal, and after a severe tussle conquered and led into town. The rejoicing of the Yankees over what Artemus Ward would call the Libbyration (no pun designed on the word ration) of Colonel Streight will doubtless be excessive. They will regard it as an offset to the escape of Jack Morgan. Let us see which of the two will use his freedom to the best advantage.

The social gaieties of the capital have come to an earlier termination than usual this winter, in consequence of the Lenten season commencing in the second week in February, some weeks sooner than last year. The weekly receptions at the President's have been intermitted in observance of the fast. The discipline of the Episcopal and Roman Catholic Churches having put all within their respective communions on half rations, like the army, something ought to be saved of the stock of provisions on hand against a season of real scarcity, which may possibly be in store for us. On this subject of keeping Lent, the Right Rev. John Johns, Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Virginia, has addressed to the clergy and laity of his diocese a pastoral letter, full of Christian patriotism, which deserves to go, with the President's address to the army, wherever men read English, all round the globe, that the character and temper of the Confederate people may be as widely known as possible.

Two men of worth, ability, and high position have just been lost to Virginia, the one full of years, the other, as it were, just entering upon what promised to be a successful and distinguished career of statesmanship:—Claude Crozet, by birth a Frenchman, Captain in the Grand Army, follower of Napoleon to Moscow, these many years Chief Engineer of the State of Virginia, author of many scientific works; and Muscoe R. H. Garnett, member of the Confederate House of Representatives, and formerly member of the same branch of the Legislature of the United States, a young man of honourable ambition, a ripe classic scholar, a true Virginian, devoted to the interests of his mother commonwealth, and already reflecting credit upon her—credit which, had he lived, would surely some years hence have been renown, and might have been glory. Mr. Garnett died at his home in Essex County yesterday morning. The news has created universal sadness in the Capitol.

The exchange of prisoners has not been resumed. Judge Ould, in the interests of humanity, wrote to Meredith, some weeks since, offering to receive a certain number of Yankee surgeons, with medicines and supplies, for their sick and wounded prisoners, but Lincoln paid no attention whatever to the letter. It was not addressed to Butler. Why comment upon such heartless indifference on the part of the President of the United States to the sufferings of his soldiers? If he believes all that has been said of the pitiable condition of the prisoners in Richmond, he is a monster to sacrifice their lives to Butler's dignity. But we may leave his conduct to the condemnation of his own people.

The plot to assassinate the President turns out to be a canard of the most ridiculous kind. The German who was arrested has been discharged, and the parturient mountain has shown us the smallest possible muscipular abortion.

After five weeks of glorious weather, winter seems disposed to resume its severity, and a dense snow is falling out of doors, which, however, melts as it touches the surface of the earth, yet warms with the kisses of yesterday's sun.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: March 9, 1864.

THE SPRING CAMPAIGN IN LOUISIANA—DISINCLINATION OF NORTHERN OFFICERS TO TAKE THE FIELD—PROBABLE INFLUENCE OF CITY LIFE—HATRED TO THE YANKEE—FEDERAL INVITATIONS TREATED WITH DISDAIN—THE PROJECTED CAMPAIGN IN THE RED RIVER COUNTRY—THE PROBABILITY OF 'A GREAT EXPEDITION AFTER A LITTLE COTTON'—THE SHERMAN EXPEDITION—A FEDERAL CORPS NOT YET HEARD FROM—GENERAL SHERMAN'S EXPLANATION OF HIS FAILURE—FIGHT AT OKOLONA—CONFEDERATE VICTORY—POSITION OF GENERAL GRANT—THE CONFEDERATES OPERATING ON INTERIOR LINES.

Ere this reaches you the spring campaign will have fairly opened in this department. The troops have already been concentrated for the forward movement, and the Commanding General goes to the front to-day. The chosen field of operations is West Louisiana, that cemetery of Federal ambition, prowess, and power, where dreams of victory and conquest were rudely dispelled by the determined bravery of a mere handful of men fighting for liberty and independence. It would not surprise me if this inspiring lesson should repeat itself this summer. And, indeed, one might suppose that Banks and his lieutenants anticipated such a result, so both do they seem to enter upon active operations in that section. Or perhaps their tardy movements are owing to a not unnatural disinclination to exchange the comfort and pleasures of city life for the hardships and hazards of the tented field, they having indulged during the past winter in all the follies and festivities incident to the season. In truth, I should not be surprised if Banks and his officers had found their Capua in New Orleans. They have been passing months of elegant idleness in this gay Southern city, with its varied populations—delicious climate steeping the senses in 'golden languors'—where, even with the busy, business is but a means to pleasure, and pleasure such as is characteristic of the quick fancy and warm imagination of the semi-tropics. It would be strange indeed if, with such seductions, the unsophisticated Northerner had not dreamt away his thirst of conquest, and sickened of what to him had never been a passion—the blood-bought honours of the battle-field. Such dangerous dalliance might have proved fatal to the morale even of a French or English army, though officered, as it is, by gentlemen of birth and fortune; and if such, or any other foreign army, had been the army of occupation, its presence might have proved fatal to the oppressed as well as the oppressor. But the Austrian is no more hated by the Venetian than the Yankee by the Southron. This was very clearly shown during the past winter in the great but fruitless efforts of the 'conqueror' to bring about a reunion of the citizens and the military in the round of festivities incident to the season. These efforts were mortifying failures in every instance. The military authorities gave open-air concerts, promenade concerts, soirées, levees, and bals-masqués; but though urgently invited, none of the citizens—that is, none of any consideration—attended. They were assailed with threats, blandishments, and bribes (in the shape of valuable favours or concessions), and warned of the penalties and pains incident to such contumelious 'disaffection;' but they still attended not. High officials and high officials' better-halves did them the 'honour' of special invitations, and yet they attended not—not only refused, but, as some loquacious 'rebels' assert, the specially invited actually turned these prom-made concerts and bals-masqués into ridicule, and laughed at them as refreshing instances of Yankee 'high life below stairs.' But what better could have been expected of these rebels to the 'best Government the world ever saw'? As usual, the Southern women were most prominent in heaping ridicule upon these 'Yankee balls,' &c. They express themselves quite indignant at the bare supposition that they would lend their presence to such festivities—that they could be brought in contact with these shoddy aristocrats, especially the female portion, whose humble birth and way of life had wholly unfitted them to grace the positions to which the fortune of war had elevated them. We may attribute much of this asperity of feeling to the hate engendered by civil war, to the fallen fortunes of the Confederates in this city. The Pole, the Hungarian, the Venetian, has little left to him save a heritage of hate, and no generous heart will find fault if he does not pause to do justice to whatever virtues his oppressor may possess. Be this as it may, these expensive experiments (for money has not been spared) to bring about a brotherhood of feeling between the 'rebel sympathisers' in this city and the army with its hosts of adventurers, were almost irredeemable abortions, and brought no little ridicule upon the prime movers. Of course I have reference solely to the primary, or at least ostensible, object of these festivities. Viewed in this light their failure must have caused no small mortification to their originator, especially if, as was said by a 'loyal' journal of this city, the result sought to be achieved was more to be prized than a great victory in the field. Such a moral or social victory remains to be won, unless the military authorities are satisfied with the fawning fellowship of such purchased minions of Federal power as claim to be citizens of New Orleans, but whose hopes and prejudices are all with New England, whence they migrated hither. I have dwelt upon this social phase of the war, as it illustrates in that respect the relations of the belligerents, demonstrating how settled is the hostility of the one, and how delusive are the hopes and vain the expedients of the other. Viewed in any other light, these social festivities are, of course, undeserving of serious attention. They have been resorted to as a means to the 'suppression of the rebellion;' as such they received the particular attention of the Commanding General of the department.

But this 'weak piping time of peace' is at an end. The Yankee cavaliers must now forego 'the idle pleasures of these days,' these 'sportive tricks,' these 'merry meetings,' these 'delightful measures' to which 'he capers nimbly in a lady's chamber.' All these his new-found delights he must forego, even for the 'dreadful marches,' 'stern alarums,' and dire encounters of 'grim-visaged war.' Though no knight-errant, and wholly unconscious of the spirit of chivalry, he will surely figure to more advantage in the field than in promenade concerts and bals-masqués.

I have said that active operations were about to begin in Western Louisiana, and the movements already made certainly look that way. No change has as yet been made in the plan of the campaign indicated in my last letter. Banks is to march with a strong column from Bayon Teche through the Opelousas country to the line of the Red River, striking it at Alexandria, where he will be joined by an auxiliary force sent from Vicksburg. A portion of this force will disembark at Alexandria and unite with Banks, who will then push forward to Shreveport, while the remaining portion of the forces sent from Vicksburg will proceed in their transports up the river under convoy of the gunboats. Such is the plan of the coming campaign in the Red River country; and the Yankees, unmindful of the past, are already exultant in anticipation of easy victory, permanent occupation of that region, and of securing 'any quantity of cotton.' Nous verrons. Banks is said to have intended this movement for some weeks past, but whether in conjunction with the force from Vicksburg does not appear. Sherman, it is said, planned the combined movement while in this city last week, but after all Banks may have to make the movement alone. Sherman is wanted elsewhere, and the spring campaign in this State, which it was boasted would destroy the forces of Generals Dick Taylor and Magruder, may turn out to be nothing more than an expensive raid—a great expedition after a little cotton, as the New York Tribune satirically terms most of the movements in the Gulf Department. The Federal forces in the Teche consist mainly of cavalry and mounted infantry; and this fact, taken in connection with the immense wagon-train which has been sent to the front, strengthens the supposition that Banks intends nothing more than a raid after cotton.

Magruder is gone to reinforce Taylor with 10,000 troops, having now but little use for an army in Texas, and General Taylor thus reinforced can defeat the columns of Banks and Sherman combined. But it is even doubtful whether Sherman could proceed up the Red or Ouachita river. I am told that they have been very effectually obstructed, and every commanding position on either bank well fortified; and this receives some corroboration from the report circulated this evening, that a Federal flotilla had met with a decided repulse on the Ouachita. The report comes through Federal sources.

The Sherman expedition is still wrapped in mystery—or rather, I should have said, the object of that expedition, and the extent and nature of the disasters which befell it. All we know is, that Sherman came to this city last week; that one of his corps commanders has returned to Vicksburg, but whether with all or a portion of his corps does not appear; and that the other corps (General Hurlbut's) has not yet been heard from. General Sherman says it started from Meridian for Memphis, after he found that General Polk was too strong for him, and the Confederate cavalry was 'gobbling up' all his foraging parties. Now, if Sherman did not lose a portion of his army in an engagement with Polk, why are we still ignorant of the whereabouts of Hurlbut's corps, and kept in doubt whether McPherson has really returned to Vicksburg, and, if so, how many men he brought back? The Federal authorities do not deny that the whole movement was a failure, but they do not deny that it met with any serious disaster. Advices from Mobile or rumours rather, I should have said—say that 1,000 prisoners taken in engagements with Sherman's forces have already been brought to that city. The cavalry column, which was to sweep over the country like a tornado, cut off Polk's retreat, and play havoc generally, has fared no better than the main body. General Sherman, while in this city a few days ago, was said to have attributed his ill-success, in no small degree, to the failure of his cavalry to unite with him. He said that he took 7,000 picked men, the best cavalry he ever saw, but they wholly failed him in the hour of need. In fact, they did not come within fifty miles of him during the whole time. It was not, however, for want of effort. They might have been the 'best cavalry General Sherman ever saw,' but the Confederate horse of General S. D. Lee proved themselves their masters. With little more than half their numbers, they thoroughly routed the Federals, following them up with such persistent valour that the enemy was glad to escape the seemingly impending annihilation. Here is an account of the fight at Okolona, in which Bedford Forrest, one of General Lee's lieutenants, made one of his characteristic fights—hazardous and desperate, but brilliant in results:—

(Telegraphed to the Mobile Register.)

'West Point, Miss., Feb. 25, vid Gainesville and De Soto.—There was heavy fighting on Tuesday, the 22nd, in the vicinity of Okolona.

'General Forrest, with a force not exceeding 2,000 men, attacked the enemy, estimated at 6,000. After severe fighting all day, night closed on the enemy routed and flying.

'They contested every step, falling back and forming, but were successively driven from every position. General Forrest pursued them to a short distance from Pontotoc, where, late in the evening, the enemy formed three separate lines, and made their last desperate stand. They made three sabre charges on horseback, but each recoiled, driven back with great slaughter. Many passed through our lines and were captured. The road was lined with abandoned sutlers' stores and dead horses.

'The next morning General Forrest's command was too tired to continue the pursuit; but General Gholson, with six or seven hundred State troops, arrived, and went on in pursuit of the enemy. The enemy left their dead on the field. Their loss is estimated at a hundred killed, including two colonels; their wounded are much more numerous, many of whom fell into our hands.

'Our loss will not exceed 100 killed and wounded. Colonel Jeff. Forrest, commanding a brigade in Chalmers's division, was killed; and Lieutenant-Colonel Barksdale, commanding 5th Mississippi, mortally wounded.

'Colonel Barteau, of Ball's brigade, was severely wounded in the breast, and Colonel M'Cullough, commanding a brigade of Chalmers's division, in the hand.

'About 150 prisoners have arrived here, including a colonel and a lieutenant-colonel. More are coming in. A courier, just in from Okolona, reports that General Gholson has captured a large number of prisoners in his pursuit. Five pieces of artillery, and a large quantity of small arms, sabres, saddles, &c., are among the spoils. General Forrest's command have returned.

'Demopolis, Feb. 24.—General Gholson is pursuing the routed and scattered columns of the enemy above Pontotoc. In the recent engagement General Forrest killed two men with his sabre, and had two horses killed under him. Sherman's advance had reached Pearl river.'

In about a month hence I suppose we shall be allowed to know all about the Sherman expedition. The probability is that the Federals calculated upon an easy victory over Polk, and the consequent and immediate fall of Mobile: the city being occupied by the enemy, the eventual surrender of the water defences became a mere question of time. Holding Mobile, they would have uninterrupted water-communication far up into the State; and with the immense means of transport at their command, the Federals might then talk with some show of reason about flanking Joe Johnston at Dalton. As it is, Sherman has not succeeded even in making a diversion in favour of Grant. The latter finds himself confronted by General Joe Johnston at Dalton, with a large and effective force, and so he hesitates at attacking him, contenting himself with reconnaissances in force, and making feints upon Johnston's communications by moving a column towards Rome. The Confederate General is the superior strategist of the two, so Grant will make nothing by such diversions. If he had his usual superiority of numbers—four or five to one, as at Vicksburg and Lookout Mountain—he would undoubtedly have attacked Johnston before this. At present, being compelled to strengthen Knoxville, threatened by Longstreet, keep up a bold front before Chattanooga, and protect his communications, Grant cannot muster a force greatly superior in numbers to that of his opponent. The talk in military circles here is that Sherman has been ordered to retire to Chattanooga with his grand division, and that the expected battle between Johnston and Grant is postponed until Sherman's arrival. It would take him fully two weeks, perhaps longer, to go from Vicksburg to Chattanooga, viâ the Mississippi and Ohio rivers, and the Louisville, Nashville, and Chattanooga railroads, which is the route, I believe, he would have to traverse. Meantime Polk can reinforce Johnston within a week, viâ the Alabama river, or by railway to Montgomery and Selma, thence by railway to Atlanta, Johnston's base, whence reserves can be forwarded to him in a few hours. Thus we have those interior lines again, playing sad havoc with Federal strategy, and enabling the Confederates to provide against the numerical superiority of the enemy by rapid concentration of forces. Should Sherman move to the support of Grant, or unite with Banks in the expedition to the Red River region, it strikes me the Confederates might become masters of the situation in Mississippi.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: March 23, 1864.

MR. LINCOLN'S CALLS FOR TROOPS—THE MILITARY POWER OF THE NORTH—THE FAILURE TO SUBDUE THE SOUTH—THE RIGHT OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES TO RECOGNITION—CONDUCT OF THE ENGLISH MINISTRY—ABANDONMENT OF THE ATTEMPT ON MOBILE—FEDERAL DISPUTES ABOUT THE DIVISION OF PLUNDER—MR. CHASE'S SCHEME FOR KEEPING DOWN THE PRICE OF GOLD—INDIFFERENCE TO THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS IN THE STATE OF NEW YORK—INEFFICIENCY OF THE GOLD BILL—MR. CHASE'S LATEST INVENTION—A BLUNDER IN HIS ESTIMATES—HOW THE NORTH REGARDS THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF DEBT.

The order for a new levy of 200,000 men—not 300,000, as I mentioned in my last that it was expected to be—came last week. Seven hundred thousand is now the number of recruits the Government has called for since it was exultingly proclaimed at Washington, and re-echoed at every cross-road in the North, that the South was conquered and despairing, the Confederacy dissolving, and its broken armies crowding the roads with fugitives hastening to shelter themselves under President Lincoln's proclamation of pardon. There has been heavy fighting since all round the circumference of the beleaguered Confederacy; and these same starving and ragged fugitives have been found baffling the best-laid plans and beating the best troops of the North. Now comes the Government demand for enormous levies, and there has been a military consultation at Washington between the President and the new Commander-in-Chief, Lieutenant-General Grant, resulting, as given out, in an entirely new organisation of the military plans of the Government, of which the addition of 200,000 men to the already enormous force in the field is a part.

The whole number of volunteers and conscripts called out under the successive requisitions of the President since the beginning of the war, to create and fill up armies, now exceeds 2,000,000 men, of whom more than a million are reckoned to be in arms.

This is the grand array of military power which, after three years of prodigious exertion, this Government pronounces to be still necessary to break up the Government of the Confederate States, and bring their territory and people into subjection to the North. In addition to these enormous levies, it has, wherever it could penetrate into Southern territory, seized upon slaves, and put arms into their hands against their masters, thus summoning to the side of the invaders the alarms of servile insurrection, which they looked for to be potent auxiliaries in breaking the spirit of the South. Exasperated by the failure to conquer the armies of the South, they added to the calamities and sufferings of regular warfare the horrors of a war of devastation and pillage, and summoned fire and famine to the help of the sword. Huge armies are sent into peaceful districts, merely to lay them waste and make them uninhabitable—to destroy the crops in the field and the food in the granaries—to drive off or kill the cattle—to burn mills and factories and shops, and all tools and implements of industry—and to sack dwellings—with the savage purpose of reducing the unarmed population, the houseless women and the children, to hideous want. Nevertheless, the fourth year of this war is commencing, and the South is not subdued, nor repentant, nor dismayed; it is even hopeful, and more sternly resolved than ever to fight the battle for independence until it is won.

Certainly, here is a spectacle of faith, valour, and endurance, to win the admiration of mankind. If ever the title to be free were won by sublime devotion and heroic deeds—if proofs of the unanimous desire and inflexible purpose of a brave and intelligent people, educated to self-government, and resolved to do all and suffer all rather than become the vassals of a usurping invader, were ever held to give a claim to recognition among nations—the people of the South and the Government of their choice have earned that title and given those proofs. They establish, at least, in all generous hearts, and among just men everywhere, their right to the moral support of mankind, in demanding that the strong oppressor shall be held strictly to all the duties and obligations which the law of nations places under the guardianship of civilised governments, and the practices of modern times have made the common law of humanity.

It is the reproach of England that she should have a Ministry which, on mean calculations of gain or under the meaner promptings of fear, is straining its own powers and sanctioning the perversion of English laws to embarrass the struggle of a gallant people who, fighting for independence, have thrice beaten back their enemies, and are now girding themselves for a fourth encounter against terrific odds; and that an English Solicitor-General should be so swift to do them wrong as to read against them, in the House of Commons, papers which are shown to be forgeries, and a British Secretary of State should grossly misstate, in the House of Lords, facts in his own department to their prejudice. How long will English love of fair-play, English sympathies for oppressed nationalities struggling bravely for freedom, and English pride which resents a menace as an insult, endure all this?

There has been no marked military event this week, unless the abandonment of the attempt on Mobile from the sea is to be considered important. It was doubtless designed to be part of a concerted attack by the army and navy; but the other parts failed, by Sherman's retreat and by Banks's delay in cooperation, and Farragut is said to have retired also, and to give out that he is waiting to be reinforced by a new class of boats, prepared for this service, before renewing the attempt.

General Banks, in concert with General Sherman, is moving upon Western Louisiana with a considerable land force, aided by gunboats, by way of the Red River. The expedition is a renewal of the gigantic Mississippi raid, for the seizure of what property can be found and the laying waste of the lands of the rebels. There is thought to be a large quantity of cotton and sugar in that region, and the south-western armies have a voracious appetite for cotton and sugar, and care more about gathering booty than for fighting the rebels. The division of the plunder among the rival branches of the service, army and navy officers, and camp followers, and speculators, has already caused violent feuds: and they complain at Washington that the national arms stand still, because the clamorous chiefs cannot settle the proportion each is to have of the spoils of the people they are robbing and going to rob. It is boldly charged by adverse factions of these robbers against each other, that of a hundred thousand bales of cotton which have been taken from their owners along the Mississippi, under the plea of confiscation for the use of the United States, not five thousand have reached the Treasury. There is a universal scramble, and they are quarrelling beforehand about the division of the booty they are expecting from this grand raid into Upper and Western Louisiana. It is to be hoped they will find Confederate bayonets to stop their way.

The domestic topic most agitated here and at Washington for some time past is Mr. Chase's latest expedient for improving the currency: The continued high price of gold is the subject of constant apprehension, and Congress, under the advice and at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury, has legislated for the purpose of arresting the depreciation of the paper currency. They have passed a law authorising him to use the gold received into the Treasury for duties on imports, to regulate the market for gold, and put down speculation by overstocking the market with a sudden supply at his discretion. The idea is, that the possession of this power will prevent the speculation to which it is a fashion to attribute a good deal of the 'high price' of gold, which is the popular form of describing the low value of Government paper. The power, as given, is more restricted than he wanted; for it confines him to the use of so much of the gold only as is not required for the payment of the interest on the public debt, or for the reserve of one per cent. on the amount of the public debt which the law of 1862 sets aside as a sinking fund. The surplus above these sums he may employ, paying it out in anticipation of the interest accruing within twelve months, or by selling it at his discretion in any manner he may think expedient.

The attempt to repeal the sinking fund was made in the Bill as reported, and actually got majorities in both Houses on separate propositions, but was set aside by an amendment at the last moment. It would have been a deadly blow at all faith in the public engagements if the securities in the law upon which these loans were negotiated could be set aside thus summarily by a legislative vote on a collateral question of financial expediency. The demonstration is, however, a very significant one, and will have ill effects on the public credit.

This indifference to the obligation of contracts has even reached the State of New York, which has heretofore been one of the most punctilious of the American States, and consequently in the highest credit at home and abroad. The State Senate has voted to pay in currency the interest on the bonds of the State contracted in gold; and although the House has not yet acted upon it, the success of such a proposition in one body, after long and strenuous debate, is an omen, of which foreign holders would do well to take notice, of a willingness to break contracts and repudiate one-third of the interest of the debt which may easily ripen into a willingness to wipe off the principal.

Mr. Chase has got his Gold Bill, but it has thus far proved to be utterly inefficient, even to frighten the gold-dealers. Prices have actually risen since it was passed, and range somewhere between 161 and 163. It is doubtful, under these circumstances, whether he will bring any considerable sum into the market, with the risk that, if he puts down the price, it will be bought up and exported, and this unnatural reduction of the domestic supply react in increasing the subsequent rates. The only step he has decided on is now said to be that he will sell occasionally custom-house certificates of gold to bonâ-fide payers of duties in commercial cities, 'without notice,' at rates 'below the selling price of gold.' The simple meaning of this is, that Government will receive from the favourites of the Treasury its own depreciated paper in payment of duties at better rates than they can use it for in buying gold in the open market. The Government thus speculates on its own discredit, with a percentage of loss, which is the profit of those who are specially favoured. The practical value of this power is that of making the fortunes of those to whom the Secretary confides his plans, from choice or from the necessity of executing them. That it will be so used is as certain as that, in the same way, the management of the Treasury heretofore has enabled a class of men, confidentially associated with the Secretary, to help themselves and their friends to millions. As an aid of the Government finances it is an abortion, which it is discreditable to the understanding of the Secretary to have ever devised or encouraged. It may help private speculations on the necessities of commercial men, setting aside as useless all intelligent calculations on the course of events and the laws of natural demand and supply, but for any influence in giving permanent improvement to the currency it is of as little use as the setting of the weathercock by hand is to fix the direction of the wind.

A most damaging statement for Mr. Chase's financial sagacity, has recently been furnished from his own department in an official report of the 'recognised' public debt of the United States as it stood on the 15th of this present month.

In December last Mr. Chase made his annual report to Congress, in which he stated the amount of the public engagements and debts, and gave his estimates of what they were expected to be at different periods, for which Congress was expected to make provision.

The latest date to which he made up his account was the 30th of the preceding September. The amount of 'recognised' debt was then $1,222,113,553. Estimating for all expenditures, with a liberal margin for contingencies, he advised them that the debt would, in certain contingencies, which he pointed out as possible, be $1,634,150,042; but it might reach a maximum of $1,686,956,641. To these calculations he added the following paragraph, encouraging the hope that events, with the aid of discreet legislation, would reduce even the smaller amount.

'It is not impossible that vigour in the prosecution of the war, and economy in every branch of expenditures enforced by new legislation, may reduce actual disbursements and consequent increase of debt below these figures.'

He left himself the power to accuse others of want of vigour in war matters, want of economy in administration, and want of wisdom in legislation, if the increase of the debt were not reduced below the liberality of his estimates. He left nothing with which to excuse himself for having largely understated it.

The report of March 15 states the recognised public debt on that day at $1,580,201,776, which is an addition of more than $358,000,000 to the debt of September 30, and, at the rate of increase of debt (not of expenditure), of more than $2,113,000 a day for 167 days. At the same rate of increase, the public 'recognised' debt will be, on the 1st of July next, a little over $1,805,600,000, in lieu of the $1,634,000,000 estimated by Mr. Chase.

Here is a demonstrated blunder of Mr. Chase, in his estimate of the progress of the debt for seven months, of $171,000,000, or more than $600,000 a day on his best estimate, and nearly $450,000 a day on his worst.

A Minister in any other country, who in such a crisis as this should make such an enormous blunder, would lose his credit instantly, and be removed for a more competent director of finances. Here nobody seems to think it of any other moment than to point a political sneer. Foreigners, who are tempted by high rates of interest to invest their money in the securities of a Government thus administered, may judge therefrom how lightly the future responsibilities for this debt weigh on the minds of the people. Perhaps the true explanation of this recklessness is contained in a speech made at one of the late political gatherings in Connecticut by a leading politician of the dominant school: 'A debt of two thousand millions, with the corresponding taxation, would be intolerable; a debt of five thousand millions would be nothing.'

When, as this war goes on, and this 'recognised' debt accumulates with a rapidity which Mr. Chase cannot foresee or imagine for half a year before him—and to that are added the unnumbered millions not yet recognised for claims, services, losses, expenditures, advances, and provisions for bounties and pensions—the advent of that five thousand millions is seen to be no great way off; and the common class of voters have begun to consider it settled that it matters but little how quickly it is piled up to the nominal amount of what will turn out to amount financially to 'nothing.'

Emigration to the United States.—Nearly two hundred thousand emigrants have arrived in this country during the past year, mostly at New York. At least one hundred and fifty thousand have joined the army.—New York Herald, March 13.

The New Hampshire Election—How it was Done.—The election in New Hampshire was carried practically by force. The object was effected completely by force and bribery combined. Those who have had means of information allege that the Administration sent 6,000 soldiers into the State. It seems quite certain that not less than 4,000 actually arrived. The soldiers, promised a holiday, accepted their furloughs and voted as they were directed. No Democrats were permitted to come home. This was as plain farce applied to the election, as if a bayonetted squad had attended every poll. It is as roundly asserted, that the Administration spent not less than half a million of money in transportation of troops for purchase of votes.—Boston Courier.

Railroads in the South.—The principal railroads in the Confederacy are now sedulously engaged in endeavouring to increase their stocks, and to provide for the contingencies of future service or loss. Under the delusive expectation of an early termination of the war, the railroad companies have, heretofore, relied almost wholly on their existing stock, and made but few efforts at supply or reparation. They scarcely husbanded their resources, which under the exhausting demands made upon them, became greatly diminished. Of late, with more experience, a wiser prescience seems to guide their management. In different parts of the Confederacy iron is now being provided and rolled for machinery and the construction and repair of locomotives and rolling stock.—The Secretary of War has recommended that skilled mechanics be furnished from the army for some of the more delicate machinery needed by the railroads. The railroad transportation is of incalculable importance to the Confederacy. Shut off from the sea, and with command of very few of its rivers, the Confederacy is dependent, almost wholly, on the railroads for commmnication and transportation.—Richmond Paper.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

Wednesday Evening.

The state of the money market has not experienced any great change. The tendency, if anything, is towards stronger rates, previously to the payment of the dividends, but it is scarcely supposed the full quotations will be eventually maintained. The encouragement to public enterprise—for new companies continue to make their appearance—will of course hereafter interfere with the supply of capital, but so long as the minimum keeps at its present point, or there is the slightest prospect of a reduction, we shall have the existing animation, with probably an occasional increase of activity. It is very certain, nevertheless, that this state of things cannot exist for ever, and it a reaction once sets in, the effect will be astounding particularly after the late speculation in the shares of the bank, credit, and finance companies. For first-class paper, the quotation is $5\frac{7}{8}$ to 6 per cent.; for 6 months' bills, the rate is $5\frac{3}{4}$: the Joint Stock Banks charge $5\frac{3}{4}$ and $5\frac{7}{8}$ for advances; and on the Stock Exchange, the terms rule from 5 to $5\frac{1}{4}$ per cent.

BULLION AND SPECIE MOVEMENTS.

The transactions in bullion and specie are again of a rather unsatisfactory character, inasmuch as there has been no gold sent into the Bank during the past week, whilst the withdrawals have amounted to 97,000*l.*, though this certainly is a smaller amount than for some few weeks past; but it is sufficient, with the high price of money, to prevent any reduction at present in the rate of discount. The amount of specie arrived is 365,394*l.*, of which 28,070*l.* is from New York, and the remainder from Australia.

The shipments of specie by La Plata, which sailed on the 2nd inst. were 81,880*l.*, of which 79,760*l.* was in gold, and 2,120*l.* in silver. The Ceylon, which sailed yesterday, took out for the East 188,965*l.*, of which 174,780*l.* was silver, and 14,185*l.* gold. The proportions were:—for India, 131,513*l.*; the Straits and China 48,848*l.*; Alexandria, 6,500*l.*; and Aden and Galle, 2,164*l.* Bar silver has been in considerable demand, and the price has advanced to 5*s.* $1\frac{3}{4}$d. per oz. The Mexican dollars by the last West India mail have been disposed of this afternoon at 5*s.* $1\frac{1}{4}$d., being a fractional advance upon previous quotations. The gold ships at present known to be on their way from Australia are the Jassen with 64,000*l.*, the Calliance with 55,000*l.*, the Moravian with 17,000*l.*, and the Agincourt with 12,500*l.*

BANKING AMALGAMATION.

It has been officially announced that the old-established private bank of Messrs. Jones Loyd and Co. have transferred their business to the London and Westminster Bank. The reason alleged for such a change is the desire of the partners of the former establishment to retire from business, and if such be the case, it might naturally be expected that the firm would seek the aid of some other important establishment to take over their accounts. On the first announcement of the Amalgamation, the shares of the London and Westminster Bank advanced from 20*l.* to 22*l.* per share, but there has since been a considerable reaction, though nothing like the extent of the advance.

MERCANTILE SUSPENSION.

The suspension has just been announced of Mr. Thomas Freeman, of Spa Road, Bermondsey, engaged in the timber trade. The liabilities are said to amount to 20,000*l.*; and the assets, it is said, are not likely to be very favourable. The accounts are under investigation by Messrs. Cooper Brothers & Co.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has within the last day or two shown an improving tendency, particularly as regards business, but with only a fractional advance in prices. There seems now to be rather more confidence on the part of the dealers, who operate with more freedom. Consols closed this evening at $91\frac{1}{2}$ to $91\frac{5}{8}$ for money, and the same for the account, which, as compared with last week, is a rise of $\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. Exchequer Bills are a trifle firmer, being now at, 7*s.* to 2*s.* dis. A rather extensive business has been transacted in foreign stocks, particularly in Mexican and Greek. The former has fluctuated considerably under the influence of the various reports with reference to the ultimate assumption of the throne of Mexico by the Archduke Maximilian, a hitch having at the last moment arisen with reference to family matters. It is, however, thought that the affair will ultimately be satisfactorily arranged, and at the last moment the price of the stock has again improved. A good business has also been done in Greek stock, and quotations have improved $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Spanish and Turkish have also been fairly dealt in at a fractional advance. The latest official quotations were—Greek, 25 to $25\frac{1}{2}$; Mexican, $45\frac{1}{2}$ to $45\frac{7}{8}$; Spanish Passives, $35\frac{1}{4}$ to $35\frac{3}{4}$; Ditto Certificates, 13 to $13\frac{1}{4}$; Turkish (1854), 93 to 94; Ditto (1862), $71\frac{1}{2}$ to 72

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been firm, and the price advanced to 55 to 57. During the last day or two sales to some extent have produced a reaction—and we closed 52 to 53, but firm thereat.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The transactions in American Government and Railway Securities still continue on a very limited scale, and prices, though on the whole fairly supported, exhibit, if anything, a declining tendency. Dealers show no disposition whatever to enter into speculative operations whilst the result of affairs across the Atlantic remains in such a very doubtful state. The official dealings comprise:—Atlantic and Great Western Railway, New York Section, $80\frac{1}{2}$ and 79; do. do., Pennsylvania Section, 77, $76\frac{1}{2}$, and 76; Erie, shares $100, all paid, $70\frac{1}{2}$ and $69\frac{3}{4}$; do. do., seven per cent. preference, 60; do. do., second mortgage 1863, $63\frac{1}{2}$; Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 16 dis.; Michigan Central, 72 and $72\frac{3}{4}$; New York Central seven per cent. convertible bonds, $74\frac{1}{4}$; and Pennsylvania Railway Bonds, second mortgage, $85\frac{1}{2}$ and 85.

TENDERS FOR BILLS ON INDIA.

The biddings for 40,00,000 rupees in Bills on India took place to-day at the Bank of England. The proportions allotted were:—to Calcutta, 22,24,000 rupees; to Bombay, 16,00,000 rupees; and to Madras, 1,76,000 rupees. The minimum price was, as before, 1*s.* $11\frac{1}{2}$d. per rupee on Calcutta and Madras, and 1*s.* $11\frac{3}{4}$d. on Bombay. The applications within the limits amounted to 126 lacs. Tenders on Calcutta at 2*s.* will receive about 18 per cent., and above that price in full; on Bombay, at 2*s.* $0\frac{3}{4}$d., about 76 per cent.; and on Madras, at 2*s.* $0\frac{1}{8}$d., in full.

NEW LOAN FOR VENEZUELA.

The Government of Venezuela, through the agency of the General Credit and Finance Company, have issued terms for a loan of 1,500,000*l.* The price of issue is 60*l.* for every 100*l.* in a 6 per cent. stock, the dividends to be paid half-yearly on April 1 and October 1. The money is to be applied to a settlement of the general finances of the country, to assist in making roads, to pay off existing claims, and to develope the agricultural resources and industry of the country. The loan interest and sinking fund are secured by a special hypothecation of the whole export duties of the republic. Out of the proceeds 120,000*l.* per annum will be applied to the payment of the interest and redemption of the debt, 90,000*l.* to the payment of interest, and 30,000*l.* to a sinking fund, this amount being augmented periodically by the interest on bonds bought up or redeemed.

RAILWAY SECURITIES.

Since the settlement of the half-monthly account, business in the British Railway Share Market has shown rather more animation, the continuation of favourable traffic returns having brought forward buyers, and the brokers appear inclined to enter more into speculative transactions. Prices have varied to some extent, but on the whole the result is more favourable than otherwise. The transactions recorded exhibit a rise of $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Metropolitan; of $1\frac{1}{2}$ in London, Chatham, and Dover; of $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. in Caledonian, London and South-Western, North-Eastern (Berwick), Ditto (Leeds), and Ditto (York); and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in Great Northern and London and North-Western. On the other hand, there has been a decline of 3 per cent. in Scottish Central; of 1 per cent. in South Devon; of $\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. in South-Eastern; of $\frac{1}{2}$ in Great Western; and of $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. in Lancashire and Yorkshire. Foreign railway shares have not been in so good request, but prices do not show any material variation. For shares in British possessions a much better business has been transacted, and prices are firmly supported.

PROGRESS OF ENTERPRISE.

A variety of new undertakings have again been brought forward during the past week, and various others are only awaiting a favourable opportunity for launching. Amongst the most important schemes just introduced, are the Clyde Engineering and Iron Shipbuilding Company (Limited), under the auspices of the London Financial Association. The object is the purchase and extension of the old-established shipbuilding and engineering business of Messrs. Smith & Rodger, of Glasgow. The arrangement, it is said, will be most satisfactory, part of the purchase money being paid in cash and the remainder in shares; and it is stated that the establishment of a London Board will place the directors in a position of being able to contract at once with our own and foreign governments and the large shipping companies for business. The proposed capital is 500,000*l.*, in 10,000 shares of 50*l.* each, with a first issue of 5,000 shares. There will be required a deposit of 1*l.* on application and 1*l.* on allotment. The Home and Colonial Assurance Company (Limited), Fire, Life, and Marine, have just issued a prospectus, and the object of the undertaking is the consolidation of numerous small local and colonial institutions. In addition to the colonial connection sought to be preserved, it is also proposed to cultivate a home business, a department likely to be supported through its foreign relations. It is also anticipated that, as a Fire Insurance Company, its business will be extensive. The proposed capital is 1,000,000*l.*, in 20,000 shares of 50*l.* each, with power to increase; but the first issue will be 10,000 shares only. Beyond the deposit of 1*l.* per share on application, and 1*l.* on allotment, it is not intended to make any call.—Another undertaking is called the British Shipowners' Company (Limited), and has been started at Liverpool with a proposed capital of 2,000,000*l.*, in 100,000 shares of 20*l.* each. The business of the Company will not be confined to one branch or class of ships, or to any particular trade, but will embrace all descriptions, so that every opportunity may be made available for employing its sailing or steam vessels, either of wood or iron, in any trade likely to be advantageous to its interests. Another announcement is that of the Oriental Financial Corporation, with a capital of 1,000,000*l.*, in 20,000 shares of 50*l.* each. The object is the promotion of financial, commercial, and industrial enterprise in India and the East by the application of English capital, for which it is stated there is ample scope. The directors propose to act as general financial agents, making advances on approved security, and also to undertake the investment of funds, either in the purchase of property, or in lending it out on mortgage.—The Brighton Brewery Company has been brought forward with a capital of 100,000*l.* in 10,000 shares of 10*l.* each, and it is intended to be an adjunct to the three large hotel companies recently established in that town. A brewery has already been purchased; consequently the expense and delay of building new premises will be avoided.—Another financial undertaking, to be called the English and Foreign Credit Company, has just been brought forward, with a capital of 2,000,000*l.*, in 40,000 shares of 50*l.* each. The first issue is to be for 20,000 shares only. The deposit to be 1*l.* per share on application, and 4*l.* on allotment. 15*l.* per share is all that is intended to be called up; but as the operations of the Company extend, additional capital will be raised. It is stated that promises of business have been secured, which will place the undertaking in a most favourable position. The general objects of the Company are described as 'the same as those of other companies of a kindred nature which have lately been started in this country.'—This evening two fresh important undertakings have been announced. The first is the International Land Credit Company (Limited), with a capital of 8,000,000*l.*, with power to increase. The first issue is to be for 6,000,000*l.*, in 300,000 shares of 20*l.* each, of which 250,000 are subscribed for on the Continent, the remaining 50,000 being reserved for England. There will be required a deposit of 1*l.* on application and 1*l.* on allotment. There will be two calls of 2*l.* each during the present year, after which it is not expected that further calls will be made. The founders of this Company have previously established in Belgium La Banque Hypothécaire Belge and La Banque de Crédit-Foncier et Industriel; in Holland, La Banque Hypothécaire Néerlandaise; and in Austria the Vindobona Mortgage Assurance Company. The present Company has been formed under the English law of limited liability, and with an office and direction in London, as well as at Brussels, and arrangements have been made with the Banque Hypothécaire Belge for a complete fusion, while a treaty has been concluded with the Banque de Crédit-Foncier et Industriel, which insures the benefit of their experience and a large and profitable business from the commencement, a minimum dividend of 11 per cent. on the paid-up capital being secured in any event as the result of the first year's working. The second undertaking is the Telegraph Construction and Maintenance Company (Limited), with a capital of 1,000,000*l.*, first issue 750,000*l.*, in 37,500 shares of 20*l.* each; deposit on application 1*l.* per share, and on allotment 3*l.* per share. The object of this Company is the making and maintaining telegraphic lines of communication, both submarine and on land, in every part of the world. Hitherto the manufacture of cables and wires has been conducted at two distinct establishments, viz., the wire-manufacture and the coating with gutta-percha. It is considered that it will be far more economical to perform the whole process under one establishment. Consequently, a contract has been entered into for the purchase of the entire machinery, &c., of the Gutta-Percha Company by Messrs. Glass, Elliott, & Co., and that firm have agreed to transfer to this Company, at the cost price to them, the works so acquired. A contract has also been entered into with Messrs. Glass, Elliott, & Co., for the purchase of their manufactory, stock, business, &c., the consideration being paid, to the extent of 100,000*l.*, in fully paid-up shares of the Company. Under these arrangements, the Company will enter into possession of the amalgamated businesses, and be entitled to their profits from the 1st January last.

THE COURSE OF THE PRODUCE MARKET.

Business in these departments continues without activity, purchases being confined to the bare provision for immediate requirements; but in what is passing, steady rates prevail. Imports, whilst slightly increased, are still very moderate; and the clearances, both for consumption and export, being of fair extent, stocks have further diminished. Cotton has been in limited demand, without material change in price, during the last few days. The corn trade does not present any new feature. A want of demand is experienced, and notwithstanding that arrivals are light, easier rates would have to be taken to effect sales of any extent. The American provision market is steady; fine butters make 90*s.* to 100*s.*, and cheese 54*s.* to 64*s.* per cwt. American bacon moves off slowly, at 44*s.* to 48*s.* for new. Lard is very unsaleable. Petroleum meets a good enquiry at 1*s.* 10½*d.* per gallon for refined on the spot, 2*s.* for July and August, and 2*s.* 2½*d.* for last four months' delivery. Crude offers at 15*l.* 10*s.* per ton. Linseed oil is more in demand, and the supply offering being light, the price has advanced to 33*s.* per cwt. Rape oil is firm at 43*s.* 6*d.* for foreign pale, and 41*s.* to 41*s.* 6*d.* for brown. There is no movement in fish oils, and quotations are little better than nominal. The tallow market is weaker, but without sensible depression, present rates being considered moderate. The hop trade is at the moment dull, and prices a shade weaker; American are quoted 105*s.* to 132*s.* per cwt., according to quality. Holders of sugars are firm, expecting a reduction of the duties when the Chancellor of the Exchequer brings forward his financial statement to-morrow. Meanwhile the trade have bought sparingly until to-day, when purchases were extended, and prices have risen 6*d.* to 1*s.* per cwt. Ceylon coffee during the last few days has slightly given way, in consequence of dull reports from the Continent; Brazil kinds are, however, firm, with more enquiry. Extensive tea sales have been in progress since Tuesday, and evidence a steady but not an active market. Spices sell well. Singapore pepper making the advanced price of 4*d.* to 4½*d.*; pimento is readily disposed of at 2½*d.* to 2⅝*d.* per lb. Jute has been rather largely offered to-day, but the demand has proved sufficient to support prices at about their previous level. Saltpetre is the turn cheaper, 5 per cent. having sold at 34*s.* 9*d.* cash. There is rather more doing in metals; spelter brings 21*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* on the spot, and 21*l.* 15*s.* May and June shipping. Lead is firm at 22*l.* for soft English pig. Scotch pig iron, after touching 59*s.*, closes 58*s.* 6*d.* to 58*s.* 9*d.* per ton cash.

LIVERPOOL, April 6.—There has been rather more demand for cotton during the last few days, and in this respect the market shows a decided improvement; but, nevertheless, prices remain without any material change. Holders show rather more disposition to realise, doubtless being influenced, to a certain extent, by the large quantity of cotton known to be on its way from India, China, and other countries. The chief demand at present is for American descriptions, which being scarce particularly for the better qualities, the price is well maintained; but for the inferior descriptions quotations are less steady. The sales this week have reached 32,000 bales, of which 8,000 were taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year amount to the present time to 492,180 bales, and to the same period last year they were 154,370 bales. There have been imported this year 433,357 bales, and to the same period in 1863, 369,375 bales. The exports this year have been 78,531 bales, and to the same period last year 81,171 bales. There have been taken for consumption during the present year 339,800 bales, and to the corresponding time in 1863, 237,600 bales. The quantity taken on speculation during this year has been 72,530 bales, and to the same last year 122,270 bales. The computed stocks at the present time are 296,560 bales, and at the corresponding period in 1863 they were 383,120 bales. The closing quotations this afternoon were: American descriptions, 24¾*d.* to 27½*d.*; Pernambuco, 26*d.* to 27*d.*; Maranhams, 26½*d.* to 26¾*d.*; Egyptian, 21½*d.* to 31½*d.*; Smyrna, 22*d.* to 22½*d.*; Surats, 12*d.* to 21½*d.*; China, 17*d.* to 17½*d.*; Japan, 18*d.* to 19½*d.*; and Peruvian, 26*d.* to 27*d.*

The markets at Manchester have not yet shown signs of animation from the recent depression, and business for all descriptions of goods continues very slack. For all sorts of hank-yarns suitable for shipping there is little or nothing doing, but in the Bolton class of yarns a rather better business has been doing, at full rates. Home-trade houses report a very small business, without any change in prices. The same inactivity pervades the cloth markets, and the buyers show no disposition to enter into transactions in the present unsettled state of affairs. Any offers that have been made have generally been at rates below what manufacturers could accept, and they seem tired of making concessions, and in many cases are more disposed to withdraw their stocks than accept the very low prices offered. There are not many orders in the market that appear to be of a pressing character, and there seems no disposition whatever to speculate. What few purchases have been made are said to have been effected at the very lowest quotations.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

THOMAS DE LA RUE & CO.'S ILLUSTRATED TRADE CATALOGUE, PART I. 56 pp. Imperial 8vo. is now ready.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

TWO Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General Jackson, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. Foley, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for 1,000*l.*, while 500*l.* may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for 1,500*l.* a complete Statue of 'Stonewall' Jackson, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for 'General Jackson's Statue,' at Messrs. Coutts & Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

Notes on Events of the Week.

AMERICA.

THE Arabia has brought New York advices to April 1. The threatened invasion of Kentucky has been commenced by General Forrest, with a force of cavalry and mounted infantry, stated to number 5,000 and 7,000. We heard of him last at Okolona, in North-eastern Mississippi, where he routed the Federal General Smith with about one-third his numbers. On the 24th ult. he attacked and captured Union City, on the north-western border of Tennessee, taking 500 Federal prisoners. Pushing forward into Kentucky, he crossed the entire State, a distance of about sixty miles, and captured the important town of Paducah, on the Ohio river, at the mouth of the Tennessee, with large quantities of Government property. He attacked the fort, but being destitute of heavy artillery did not capture it. Two Federal gunboats arriving from Cairo commenced shelling the Confederates, and the town was nearly destroyed. On the 29th, General Forrest was at Eddysville, on the Cumberland river, thirty-five miles east of Paducah. Another large Confederate force is reported as concentrated at Pound Gap, doubtless to act in concert with General Forrest in a grand effort to recover Kentucky, and with it Tennessee, compelling the evacuation of Chattanooga and Nashville.

It is reported that General Polk has joined his forces to those of General Johnston at Dalton, and that the Confederates were advancing their artillery, indicating an early movement on Ringgold and Chattanooga. A telegram announces that General Longstreet's cavalry has arrived at Marietta, Georgia; but as this place is seventy miles south of Dalton, it is probably an error.

Lieutenant-General Grant was still inspecting his forces. It is rumoured that he will remove General Meade, and offer commands to Generals M'Clellan and Fremont.

President Lincoln has issued a proclamation further defining the terms of amnesty.

Probably the most important news by the Arabia is that of the outbreak of serious riots in Illinois. These conflicts are between the Republicans and Democrats, or the war and peace parties. At Charleston, near the centre of the State, twenty or thirty were killed or wounded, and the peace men or 'copperheads,' 1,500 strong, were entrenched near the town. General Heintzelman, with 5,000 troops, had marched to suppress the insurrection. Outbreaks were threatened in other districts, and these disturbances are not unlikely to spread over the Western States.

THE Federal expedition up the Red River appears to have taken Alexandria, and there is a rumour of a reconnaissance as far as Natchitoches. Fort de Russey, on the river below Alexandria, was surprised by General Smith, commanding the Federal land forces, and taken with 8 guns and 283 prisoners. There appears to have been a race for the fort between General Smith and the Confederate General Taylor, which the former won by three hours. The Confederate iron-plated ram, Missouri, yet to be encountered, is believed to be able to sink any vessel in the Federal navy, and the Webb and Mary Jane ironclads, and a fleet of cotton gunboats, will dispute the passage to Shreveport. Even if successful, the expedition can only be one of plunder and destruction, like that of General Sherman in Mississippi, uniting the South in a more bitter hatred against its invaders. The object of the expedition is stated to be 'to free Texas, Louisiana, and Arkansas by one movement, to destroy the rebel armies therein, and prepare the States for "reorganisation."' These States have an area of 340,000 square miles, and are to be conquered by a gunboat expedition up one of their ten or twelve great rivers. Its real objects are cotton and other plunder for speculators, and votes for Mr. Lincoln.

AMONG the last acts of the recent session of the Confederate Congress was the passage of resolutions thanking the Louisiana troops for enlisting for the war without limitation or conditions; Humphrey's Mississippi Brigade, McLaw's Division, for enlisting for forty years or the war: and the North Carolina troops, for enlisting for the war. The Confederate army, which has borne the brunt of battle for three years, has re-enlisted by companies, regiments, and brigades, without bounties or stipulations for reward. Since the war began, we are assured on every hand, the army was never so well provided, and the generosity and devotion of the people are worthy of the heroism of the army. It is the general opinion that at no time had the North so little prospect of carrying out its plan of conquest and subjugation.

BITTER complaints begin to be made in the Federal States of the war on the Churches levied by the Lincoln military authorities. In sections of the South occupied by Federal troops, the Presbyterian and Baptist churches have been taken forcible possession of, their preachers turned out, imprisoned, or banished, and Northern preachers installed in their places. This is justified on the Abolition theory that slaveholders cannot be Christians, though it is not very long since that nearly all Christians were slaveholders. The complaints made against this religious war are none the less bitter from the fact that no Roman Catholic church has been interfered with—probably for two reasons: the prayers are in Latin, which the Federal officers do not understand, and a considerable portion of the army is Roman Catholic.

THE reports of Federal Generals are pleasant reading for warm weather. We thought General Sherman's account of his expedition to, and retreat from, Meridian tolerably cool, but General Smith, the commander of the cavalry force that did not join him, beats him as decidedly as he was beaten by the Confederate General Forrest at Okolona. His expedition, he says, 'was perfectly successful, and the retreat was not at any time a rout, although there was some straggling.' Perhaps, however, both must yield the palm in the 'happy despatch' business to General Butterfield, who says of the Sherman raid that 'the captures of prisoners exceed all losses;' leaving, of course, a clear gain to the Federals!

PROMINENT New England Abolitionists are engaged in getting up a testimonial to George Thompson, the man, they say, who 'never turned his back upon a good cause, nor put his hand to a bad one.' It might be suggested that, as Mr. Thompson had done something to plunge America into a civil war now in its fourth year, involving a national debt equal in its burden to that of Great Britain, with an amount of bloodshed and suffering difficult to conceive of, it would be well to wait for the result of all this carnage, debt, and devastation, before rewarding any one for his agency in producing it. We have no desire to impeach motives, nor should we like to stand in George Thompson's shoes if men were rewarded according to their works.

'How many fleeces?' asks a Yankee kidnapper for the Federal army of his agent in Montreal. He is informed that he can have from ten to twenty a week at seventy-five dollars each. Federal agents are now at work in Canada, Ireland, England, and Germany, sending men to America upon every pretext, but, when landed, to be drugged, enlisted, robbed of their bounties by these greedy sharks, and sent to swell the armies in Virginia and Tennessee. Enlisted under false names, no help can reach them. If they have relations who apply to British Consuls, and enquiries are made, the ready answer is that no such names are on the army lists. Of course they are not. And these nameless men find nameless graves on the battle-fields of Virginia or in the swamps of Mississippi, 'and are never heard of more.'

IT would be the part of wisdom, clearly enough, for the Government at Washington to quietly submit to, if it cannot cheerfully accept, what it has no power to prevent, the inauguration of the Mexican Empire; but it cannot make up its mind to swallow the leek so nicely cooked and laid before it. We read that the House Committee of Foreign Affairs is preparing to report resolutions emphatically reaffirming the Monroe doctrine, which would simply be a declaration of war against the French and Mexican Empires. Too impatient to wait for the action of the committee, we are told that 'Mr. M'Dougall introduced a resolution to declare war against France for its attempt to place a throne within the Mexican Republic.' Nothing less than an American army, we are elsewhere told, will secure to American citizens their rights in one of the Mexican provinces. No doubt the abandonment of the Monroe doctrine, and the conversion into waste paper of so many Buncombe speeches based upon it, will be a great humiliation, but it will be better than a fleet of French ironclads in the Chesapeake, or off the harbour of New York.

THERE are certain significant items, cropping out of the most 'loyal' of Northern papers, which are better indications of the actual state of things than the most laboured leading articles. Such is the headline: 'Deficiency on all Calls, 315,000.' Such is the admission of the perhaps leading Government paper of New York, that 'the huge proportions and rapid increase of the public debt' are contributing 'most powerfully to create and spread despondency as to the result of the war.' Such is an elaborate argument, by a leading member of Congress, that a failure to pay the interest on the public debt 'would not retard the national growth for a single hour.' Such, above all, are the arguments in favour of a military despotism—the articles urging General Grant to seize upon the dictatorship, displace the imbecile Government at Washington, and bring the war to some kind of a termination. But General Grant must win his place at the head of the army before he can save the country.

THERE seems little danger of a lack of fighting material in the Confederate States.

In the debates on the Conscription Law in the Confederate Congress, it was stated that a call upon all persons liable to military duty, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five, would give an army of 1,100,000 men. This estimate takes no account of 3,000,000 of negroes, who have not yet been called upon to fight. A Bill was, however, passed authorising President Davis to call out 20,000 negroes, slaves and free, to serve in the army as cooks, teamsters, &c.

IT has been centuries since the people of any civilised country have suffered calamities so great as the civil war in America is inflicting upon the negro, in whose behalf, as some pretend, it is waged by Northern fanatics and mercenaries. Torn from his home by invading armies—for he has not voluntarily left it—he has become the victim of cold, hunger, disease, idleness, filth, and demoralisation. On the Mississippi the negroes have died 'like rotten sheep;' at Washington whole camps were swept away by the small-pox: on the coast of South Carolina they rapidly fell victims to all the vices of the army, and a population that had been sober, orderly, industrious, and moral, became the reverse. Conscripted into the army, they are placed between the fire of the Confederates and the bayonets of their white comrades, and where four out of five are killed, as at Port Hudson, or Ocean Pond in Florida, they are said to 'fight like devils.' Of 3,000,000 of negroes in the Confederate States, it is probable that 200,000 have been driven from their homes by invading armies: but it is doubtful if one-third of this number is now living. Of the survivors, the able-bodied are in the Federal army, or working plantations for Yankee speculators. The aged, the weak, and the children are dying in camps of exposure and neglect.

Happily, this sad fate has come to comparatively few of the whole number. Had the hopes and expectations of very short-sighted philanthropists been realised, similar and greater calamities must have fallen upon millions. The negroes have been as deaf to the proclamation of Lincoln as they were to the call of his prototype, John Brown. Even Henry Ward Beecher sees that slavery is not dead. 'Dead!' he exclaims; 'we know that within the lines of the frontier army there are yet 3,000,000 of slaves. As yet we learn they are docile, amenable to the will of their masters, patient and subservient.' And that, it is not hard to see, is their safest and happiest condition.

THE testimony of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher to the heroism of the army and people of the Confederate States will be accepted, we presume, by his English admirers. We must say that it is frankly given, and does him credit as a shrewd observer of the present and prognosticator of the future. The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Inquirer says he rather startled his hearers, at the Plymouth Church, by an eulogy of the rebel troops, in which he said: 'Where shall we find such heroic self-denial, such upbearing under physical discomfort, such patience in poverty, in distress, in absolute want, as we find in the Southern army? They fight better in a bad cause than you do in a good one; they fight better for a passion than you do for a sentiment. We believe them to be misguided, but we must do them the credit of saying they fight well, and bear up under trouble nobly; they suffer and do not complain; they go in rags, but do not rebel; they are in earnest for their personal liberty; they believe in it, and, if they can, they mean to get it.' We have the testimony of Mr. Sala that the same sentiments are freely expressed in the army of the Potomac, where the word 'rebel' is never heard—that term being left to the newspapers. It may be hoped that this wholesome respect will spread from the camp and pulpit to the press and the people.

After three years of fruitless effort, the mind of the North comes back to its first idea—the idea that led to the first great disaster of the war, and which has cost it the lives of two hundred thousand men—the 'On to Richmond!' 'Richmond must be destroyed!' General M'Clellan led a great army to the very suburbs of the city; his head-quarters were not more distant from the Capitol at Richmond than the Crystal Palace from St. Paul's; yet he was defeated day after day, and driven to the cover of his gunboats, and then back to the Potomac. At that day Richmond had scarcely any defences but the genius of the Confederate generals and the valour of their soldiers. Three years of persevering labour have made the city a fortress, with extensive and elaborate defences. As described in the Boston Courier by a refugee, they consist of an almost continuous outer embankment, with an inner line of works, all heavily armed, with a military road between the outer and inner defences. The citizens are drilled in companies, so that at the first alarm of the sentries every man is at his post, and General Pickett's division, stationed about thirty miles distant, can reinforce the militia at short notice. Richmond is probably secure enough against any force that can be brought against it, and can be taken only by first defeating the Confederate armies in the field.

The Presidential election, which is absorbing public attention in the Federal States, and to the same extent paralysing the warlike energies of the people, is operating as a 'fire in the rear' on the military commanders. Grant, Butler, Banks, Meade, Sherman, in the field, and Fremont and M'Clellan out of it, as well as Lincoln, Chase, Stanton, and we know not how many other civilians, are possible candidates. There were several more some time since, as Pope, Hooker, Burnside, Rosecrans, but their claims have been summarily disposed of. All the worse for those who remain. Mr. Lincoln, as the man in possession, has the friends of all the other candidates against him, since he must at all hazards be defeated. He is now daily arraigned in their newspaper organs, as the one sole cause of three years of failure and disaster. Lincoln has brought the republic to the verge of ruin. Lincoln has heaped up a mountain of debt which must be a perpetual burden or a perpetual disgrace. Lincoln—honest old Abe—is held responsible for such a state of widespread rascality and corruption as probably never existed since the Roman Empire was sold by auction to the highest bidder. It is hard to say whether the partisans of Fremont or of M'Clellan are the more bitter and violent in their denunciations of the existing Administration. By both the President is accused of incompetency and dishonesty, of ruining the nation while he is destroying the liberties of the people.

It is impossible that such a contest should go on with increasing bitterness for six months longer without producing the most serious effect upon the army and the people. In the army it is treason to vote for any one but Lincoln—with the people it may well be considered treason to vote for him.

Gold, which fluctuated from the 26th to the 31st between 63 and 68, closed on April 1 at 66¼ per cent. premium, in spite of Government efforts to 'bear' the market.

The lateness of the hour when the Arabia's mails were delivered in London, compels us to hold over, this week, our usual correspondence from New York and New Orleans.

ENGLAND.

It is officially announced that the Earl of Clarendon will shortly proceed to Paris upon a private mission to the Court of the Tuileries.

Our account last week of the doings of Garibaldi left him on board the Sapphire steaming to the Isle of Wight. There he became the guest of Mr. Seeley, M.P., at Brook House. On Thursday evening last he was entertained at dinner by the corporation of Newport and presented with an address. On Saturday the General crossed to Portsmouth and visited the dockyards and shipping. He was received by Vice-Admiral Sir Michael Seymour and Major-General Lord W. Paulet, C.B., Commander of the Western District. On Monday morning the General left Brook House at nine o'clock, and crossed to Southampton, where he was received by the Mayor and conducted by him to the railway terminus en route for London. The train with the General and his friends was to arrive at the Nine Elms station at 2.30 P.M. There an enormous crowd had collected, consisting of those persons who had tickets for the platform, and of the members of various associations destined to take part in the coming procession. The shed was decorated with flags inscribed, 'Welcome Garibaldi,' the 'Pure Patriot,' the 'Hero of Italy,' the 'Man of the People.' With much endeavour the police got the procession into some kind of order. There were bands, marshals, carriages, Shoemakers' Society, Temperance Society, Friendly Societies, Foresters, Odd Fellows, Freemasons, Executive Committees, Hungarian Nationality, Italian Nationality, Polish Nationality, Garibaldian Legionaries, Trades' Unions, and Working Men's Committees. On his arrival Garibaldi was received by Sir Robert Clifton, Colonel Sykes, and Messrs. Ewart, Ayrton, Locke, Dunlop, W. E. Forster, and Guildford Onslow, all members of the House of Commons, and also by some City aldermen and officials. When Garibaldi appeared with his two sons Ricciotti and Menotti, the cheering of the crowd in the open courtyard of the station was very great. Then the addresses from the City, the working men, and the Italian Committee were presented, and the General acknowledged each in a few plain words. Those from the City and the Italian Committee were of the ordinary stamp, that from the working men was remarkable enough. It not only offended by its turgid language and fulsome adulation, but also by an allusion to Joseph Mazzini, whom it spoke of as 'illustrious' and as 'having done so much for Italy, freedom, and humanity.' That address was signed on behalf of the working men of Great Britain's metropolis by a person called Robert Hartwell, and, whether it emanated from that individual, from Mr. Potter, or any other pretentious demagogue, was simply a gross insult to the working classes of England. After the reading of these addresses, an Italian lady, 'got up' in a most amazing costume, rushed forward, and astonished the public with an illustration of the powers of an 'improvisatrice' of her native country. When her oration had at length terminated, Garibaldi made his way to the carriage, drawn by four horses, provided for him by the Duke of Sutherland. Then the procession commenced to march past, and occupied an hour in so doing, the poor General standing the while, and seemingly thankful that at last the mob had ceased to wring off the hands of himself and his sons. After the procession had passed, Garibaldi's carriage moved forward, and slowly made its way through the packed masses in Miles Street and Bond Street, to find, on debouching into Kennington Lane, a seemingly impassable barrier of living creatures. Indeed, it was only by driving the pole of the first carriage into the mass and chancing the consequences that a way could be obtained for the vehicles to pass. In the Westminster Road matters were, if possible, more hopeless, and so slow was the rate of progress that Westminster Bridge was not reached till past six o'clock. Twenty-five minutes were consumed in crossing the river, and at least an hour in passing along Parliament Street, Charing Cross, and Pall Mall. The multitude assembled on Charing Cross, at the foot of the Haymarket, and at Waterloo Place, was truly marvellous, while the windows of the clubs and houses were filled with ladies, and scaffolds in every available position were packed with occupants. The General reached Stafford House at twenty minutes to eight o'clock, after a drive of five hours and twenty minutes, and was received by his noble host the Duke of Sutherland. Garibaldi has every reason to be satisfied with the reception accorded to him. Doubtless the mob was disorderly enough, and afforded to the quiet observer the speculation that curiosity, not enthusiasm, had brought the great bulk of the people together. Never was so motley a crowd seen. The artisans and mechanics mustered in good force, and that, too, not in their holiday attire; but a considerable proportion of the multitude consisted of those persons whose clothes and appearance betoken that they are not industrious workmen, and whose lives certainly must be classed as 'existences problématiques.' These people are found in abundance in great cities, but only appear in public on the occasion of a pageant, an illumination, or a row. It is at least to be hoped that when these worthies pressed around the General with their boisterous clamour and rude violence, they were not regarded by him as the English people. The foreign element was in great force, and the novelist would have found ample materials for descriptions of any number of dark conspirators. Garibaldi was cheered considerably. The ladies were vigorous enough, and there was a sufficient waving of flags and kerchiefs.

There was no attempt at any disturbance on political grounds, though men were to be seen marching about in the crowd fiercely demanding of the bystanders whether they were for the Pope or Garibaldi, the intensity of their manner leading one to suppose that no third course was open to a peaceable citizen. The streets of the metropolis were monopolised till early dawn by multitudes not sober, and decidedly boisterous.

On Tuesday, about noon, the General left Stafford House and visited Lord Palmerston, and then, accompanied by the Duke of Sutherland, drove to the beautiful villa of the Dowager Duchess of Sutherland at Chiswick. There a brilliant assemblage of Dukes and Duchesses, Earls and Ladies, met him. Among the most notable were the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, the Earl and Countess of Clarendon, the Earl of Granville, the Earl and Countess Russell, Viscountess Palmerston, the Chancellor of the Exchequer and Mrs. Gladstone, and the Earl and Countess of Shaftesbury. The General walked in the glorious grounds of Chiswick, and planted a cedar on the lawn. After luncheon the General left, and on his return visited Mr. Stansfeld, M.P., at the now famous house in Thurloe Square. In the course of the day the Duke of Wellington, the Earl of Harrowby, Sir J. D. Hay, the Lord Mayor, and other persons of mark called on the General. It is a matter perhaps deserving a passing thought, that up to Tuesday evening no Conservative of any position had been invited to meet or had called on Garibaldi. However, on Wednesday night there was a dinner and reception at Stafford House, at which all parties were represented. The General will attend the Royal Italian Opera at Covent Garden to-night. The opera of 'Norma' and the two principal acts of 'Massaniello' will be performed on the occasion.

The costs incurred by the Bishop of Salisbury in the prosecution of the Rev. Dr. Rowland Williams in the case of the 'Essays and Reviews' amounted to the sum of 2,000*l.*, for the payment of which His Lordship is, of course, personally liable. However, more than two-thirds of the amount have already been subscribed in the diocese.

At a meeting of the Common Council of the City of London held on Thursday last, Mr. Alderman Phillips proposed that 'the thanks of the Corporation be respectfully tendered to Sir Moses Montefiore for the signal services rendered by him to the cause of humanity, by having undertaken missions to various countries for the relief of those oppressed for their religious convictions, and more especially for his journey to Morocco, to solicit from His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of that country that his Jewish and Christian subjects should be relieved from all civil and religious disabilities.' The resolution was prefaced by an eloquent speech on the part of the worthy Alderman, who gave an admirable sketch of the journey and reception of Sir Moses. The resolution, having been seconded by Deputy Elliott, was carried with acclamation, and was followed by another resolution to the effect that Sir Moses should on an early day be invited to Guildhall to receive the compliment.

Lieutenant-Governor Eyre has been appointed Lieutenant-General, Governor-in-Chief, and Vice-Admiral of Jamaica. The Hon. Manners Sutton has been appointed Governor of Trinidad. Sir Richard Graves McDonnell has been appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia. Mr. Anthony Musgrave has been appointed Governor of Newfoundland, in the room of Sir A. Bannerman. Mr. R. Rawson, C.B., has been appointed Governor of the Bahamas, in the room of Mr. Bayley, C.B. We presume that this change may be explained by the correspondence between the Duke of Newcastle and Governor Bayley, which was published by us last week.

General James Ahmuty, the oldest officer in the Indian army, has recently died at Lahore. He was gazetted to the Bengal Artillery in 1790, at the time when Tippoo Sultan was at the height of his renown and power. He took part in the siege of Delhi in 1803, in the very same month in which Sir Arthur Wellesley won the battle of Assaye.

As we announced briefly last week, the great Alexandra case has been brought to a close by a judgment of the House of Lords, the effect of which judgment is that the verdict for the claimants of the ship stands. It is unnecessary to go over the ground already so often trodden by us, and to relate the history of the trial or the argument and decision of the Court of Exchequer. It will be remembered that on the day before the case was heard in the Exchequer, the Barons, on the application of the Attorney-General, framed certain rules under the authority of the 26th section of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act. That section empowered the Barons to apply to the revenue side of the Exchequer the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1854, for the purpose of making the process, practice, and mode of pleading of the revenue side uniform with that of the plea side. The latter statute had granted in all civil suits an appeal from the decision of any one of the three Courts at Westminster, wherever a rule nisi for a new trial had been made absolute or discharged. The appeal was to the Exchequer Chamber, and thence to the House of Lords. The Barons thereupon drew up certain rules, ordaining and regulating an appeal in revenue cases from their own court to the courts above of precisely similar character to that which obtains in civil actions. On the strength, then, of these rules, the Attorney-General took the cause to the Exchequer Chamber. That court, however, decided that the Legislature had not given the Barons the power to make rules which should bind the Exchequer Chamber to hear an appeal from a lower court. The Crown then appealed to the House of Lords to reverse this judgment, and the cause was argued before their Lordships on the 11th, 14th, and 15th March. On April 6 their Lordships gave judgment. The Lord Chancellor and Lords St. Leonards, Chelmsford, and Kingsdown agreed with the majority of the Exchequer Chamber, while Lords Cranworth and Wensleydale upheld the validity of the rules. The Lord Chancellor gave judgment to the following effect:—The appeal, he said, depended on the question whether the rules made by the Court of Exchequer on November 4, 1863, were warranted by the power contained in the 26th section of the statute of the 22nd and 23rd year of the Queen, commonly called the Queen's Remembrancer's Act. The Common Law Procedure Act of 1854 gave new rights of appeal from decisions on motions for new trials, and defined and bound certain courts to entertain those appeals. The operation of the Act was expressly limited to the superior courts of common law. Therefore another exercise of legislative authority was necessary to make such rights of appeal applicable to suits between the Crown and subject. The Barons had assumed the power of determining at their pleasure whether, in certain cases, these rights of appeal should or should not exist. By the 20th section of the Queen's Remembrancer's Act the power of appealing by a Bill of Exceptions was for the first time created on the revenue side, but not the right of appeal contended for, and so the impression was almost irresistible that the latter right was intentionally omitted. Then as to the said 26th section, the Barons were authorised to make rules as to the process, practice, and pleading of the revenue side, and to apply to the revenue side the provisions of the Acts relating to the plea side in matters of process, practice, and pleading, so as to effect uniformity therein. The word 'practice' was equivalent to the cursus curiæ, or regulation of proceedings within the court itself. Could then sections creating new rights of appeal be denominated as provisions respecting 'process, practice, and pleading?' It seemed absurd to denominate the paramount right of entering a superior court, and invoking its aid to redress the error of the court below, as a part of the practice of the inferior tribunal. No one using the common language of lawyers would call those rules provisions relating to the practice of the Court of Exchequer. They were, in fact, legislative enactments purporting to create a new jurisdiction in the Court of Exchequer Chamber and the House of Lords, and prescribing the mode in which such new jurisdiction should be exercised. In conclusion, His Lordship said that it was a subject of deep regret that any rules should have been made expressly with a view to the determination of a particular cause. Four years had elapsed without the necessity of such rules occurring to the Barons. On the eve of the argument of the motion for a new trial in this important case, the rules in question had been made without due deliberation. The result was that the efforts made to settle a question of the gravest importance, and most essential for the guidance of the Government, and regarded with great expectation, had been rendered abortive; or, to speak correctly, the mons parturiens of this great cause, raised with so much labour and expense, would produce nothing but the ridiculous issue of some discordant opinions on the meaning of the word 'practice.' The learned Lord then moved their Lordships that the appeal of the Crown be dismissed with costs.

Few more able judgments on a purely technical point have ever been delivered than that of the Lord Chancellor, and it will be quite unnecessary to give here even an abstract of the judgments given by the three learned Lords who coincided with the view taken by the Lord Chancellor. At the same time it is right to mention that the speech of Lord Chelmsford was eminently luminous and exhaustive, and that those of Lords St. Leonards and Kingsdown were logical and precise. On the other side, Lord Cranworth did not belie his great reputation; and Lord Wensleydale displayed that wisdom which in former days made the name of Baron Parke so justly celebrated. It perhaps may be worthy of remark that the rules framed by the Barons of the Exchequer found support in the opinions of the two noble Lords who formerly occupied seats in that court, and their defence of the course taken by the Barons, therefore, partook of a chivalrous character. We shall endeavour to give very briefly the main points urged by Lord Wensleydale. He held that the words in the latter half of the 26th section, taken in their plain grammatical sense, allowed the Barons to frame rules embodying all or any of the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Acts of 1852 and 1854. Such a power was not unreasonable, and precedents of such delegations of authority by the Legislature were not wanting. Nor again did the express importation by the Legislature into the Queen's Remembrancer's Act of certain provisions of the Acts of 1852 and 1854 afford any inference that no other provisions of those Acts were to be applied by the Barons. There was, in fact, special reason for the express enactment of those important provisions. Finally, the intention declared was that the process, practice, and mode of pleading of the revenue side of the Exchequer should be assimilated to that of the plea side. The word 'practice' had the same meaning as in the preamble of the Act of 1852. Suits were begun and ended in the same court. The cause was not removed. Execution issued from the same court, the Court of Error giving its assistance to come to a right conclusion. In fact, the whole proceeding from the beginning to the end of suits constituted the practice of the court. The objection that the rules were framed to affect pending suits was not in his opinion valid.

The hearts of the men who delight in the English race-horse and the thousand excitements of the turf are once more gladdened by the return of the racing season. Epsom opened the campaign in good earnest last week with a short and merry meeting, and Newmarket this week wears its full air of business. The principal events at Epsom were the City and Suburban Handicap and the Great Metropolitan Stakes. For both prizes there were numerous competitors, and those, too, of no mean stamp; while the contests were magnificent in their severity, the wagering heavy, the crowds great, and the weather splendid. Twenty-five animals went to the post for the City and Suburban, of whom the favourites were Mr. Jackson's Veterinarian, Count de Lagrange's Jarnicoton, and the Duke of Beaufort's Lord Zetland. The odds of 20 to 1 were betted against Merry Hart, and those of 40 to 1 against Bradamante. The ground traversed was the last mile and a quarter of the Derby course. At the distance the race was left to Lord Burleigh, Bradamante, and Merry Hart; but in the final struggle his Lordship succumbed to the weight of 8 st. 12 lbs., and Merry Hart, challenging in the last few strides, defeated Bradamante by a length. The value of the stakes was 1,300*l.*, and the owner of the winner also won 7,000*l.* in bets. Probably our readers will remember that Merry Hart was beaten by a head last October for the Cambridgeshire Stakes, and that a mistake in the weights on that occasion alone deprived her of victory. Therefore it is a matter of great pleasure to find the popular Earl of Westmoreland to some extent consoled for that disappointment. For the Metropolitan Stakes, which were contested on Friday last, eleven horses went to the post, and of these Lord Zetland, Joco, and King Charming were the favourites. The length of the course was two miles and a quarter, and the stakes were worth about 800*l.* At the Stand, Joco, Touch-and-Go, King Charming, and Major were leading exactly in line, and the probability of a dead heat with the four was imminent. Lord Zetland had come with a rush at the finish, but the leaders closed in, and he could not pierce the rank. Speculation vainly endeavoured to determine the winner, until the judge awarded the victory to Mr. William Day's Joco by a short head, Touch-and-Go, King Charming, and Major running a dead heat for the second place. We defer any report of the Newmarket Meeting to next week.

The new steamship Matilda, from Cardiff for Bermuda, and laden with coal, was wrecked in a dense fog off Lundy Island, in the Bristol Channel, on Monday, April 4. The captain and crew were saved, but lost everything. The vessel was insured for about 20,000*l.*

THE CONTINENT.

On March 29, a dashing descent was made by the Danes upon the village of Assendrup close to Veile; the Prussians were surprised, and suffered a loss of twenty-two hussars and twenty-three horses. The assailants, finding that the force stationed there was too strong to be further trifled with, retired to their ships, leaving the Prussians in a fury of impotent indignation which unfortunately vented itself upon the innocent farms and homesteads of the neighbourhood.

The projected flank attack on the position of Düppel was attempted by the Austro-Prussian forces on the 3rd inst.; the pontoons were brought to the sea-shore, and the troops furnished with the necessary provisions. Such, however, was the force of the current and the violence of the north-west wind, that after several ineffectual trials they were forced to desist. The Danes were apparently quite prepared to receive them on the opposite shore, and the presence of seven Danish cruisers in the vicinity may doubtless have had its effect in shaking the resolution of the allies.

The siege operations of Düppel are going on very slowly; a fresh parallel has been opened under cover of a smart advance of the Prussian outposts; eighty fresh guns of heavy calibre are on their way to reinforce the siege train. Nevertheless, the criticism of a distinguished French officer on the Prussian works is somewhat remarkable as contrasted with these accounts of siege preparations; it is to the effect that the Prussian trenches are of no value whatever for the protection of breaching batteries, and can only be useful for the purpose of covering the advance of a body of men, and of throwing them somewhat nearer the line of hostile fortification.

On the morning of the 11th inst. an assault was made by the Prussians upon Bastion No. 8 of the defences of Düppel, and a weaker attack upon the Danish left wing. Both attempts were totally unsuccessful. A German letter of the same date, states that the fire from the bastions had become very feeble, and that the Danes were preparing to evacuate their entrenchments.

The bombardment of Sonderburg was continued fitfully through several days, and has resulted in the utter annihilation of the little town. A semi-official account of the affair states that, about an hour after the cannonade had begun, the Danes sent a flag to require the Allies to remove their sick and wounded from the church at Düppel, as they found it necessary to direct their fire upon it; to this an answer was returned that they were welcome to do so. The Danes availed themselves of the permission, while the Prussians recommenced their bombardment of the devoted town, with what results we know too well. This, in German minds, constituted a violation on the part of the Danes of the compact whereby both Düppel and Sonderburg were to be respected; and this sophism they allege as a justification of their conduct. Another excuse given is, that Sonderburg, although nominally unarmed, was in reality a military position of the enemy, filled with men and warlike stores; moreover, that a notice of intended bombardment was sent upwards of a month ago, and that the peaceful inhabitants of the town had deserted it, carrying away all their movables. Technically speaking, the first excuse given is a question of law, while this is a question of fact; and, treating it as such, we shall more readily admit the disinterested evidence of correspondents on the spot than the biassed conjectures of the belligerent press.

From Jutland Proper we hear that several cavalry skirmishes have taken place in the neighbourhood of Fredericia and of Horsens; the cavalry are probably used to lay the more distant country under contribution, while the towns have to suffer under the immediate oppression of the military power. The exactions made on the town of Horsens during twelve days amounted to $70,000 in cash and $50,000 in kind, or 8,400*l.* and 6,000*l.* respectively.

The Prince Admiral of Prussia has made an abortive attempt to assert the existence of his navy by a reconnaissance with the fleet of gunboats outside the port of Stralsund. The sea was high, and a Danish frigate in dangerous proximity; the gunboats therefore returned to the security of their harbour.

A circular has been addressed by the Danish Foreign Secretary to the Representatives of that monarchy at the European courts, commenting in the strongest language on the political conduct of the Allies, not only in the Duchies but also in Jutland Proper. After professing the most tender regard for the integrity of the Danish monarchy, they have seized every opportunity—nay, have gone out of their way to insult and to do violence to the royal authority. Loyal officers have been dismissed and notorious rebels promoted; the King's arms have been torn down from public buildings; the circulation of his money prohibited; his name violently suppressed, even in the prayers and services of the church. Secessionist demonstrations are everywhere looked upon with favour by the authorities of the invasion, who do not even scruple to permit factious assemblages to proclaim solemnly the accession of the Pretender to the 'ducal crown.' The ministers addressed are requested to communicate these facts to the Courts to which they were accredited.

As the day for the meeting of the Conference approaches, the Continental press takes wider flights, and launches into broader seas of speculation. Luckily we have two facts which beam through the fog and obscurity of conjecture with a certain if not reassuring light. The first is the despatch addressed by M. Drouyn de Lhuys to the Prince de la Tour d'Auvergne, French Ambassador in London. The French Minister dwells on the natural sympathy and traditional friendship of France for Denmark, but confesses that the treaty of 1852, on which the quarrel began, is of a most anomalous nature. According to that treaty, Denmark was placed in a certain position with regard to some of the European Powers totally independent of any engagements, but with regard to other Powers conditionally on the fulfilment of divers requirements. Moreover, of the European States, some had withheld, others had withdrawn, their assent to the treaty. The Federal Diet in particular had entirely ignored it, as not having been a party to its ratification. The main cause of the difficulties is the rivalry of populations, and the main remedy for them lies in an appeal to the wishes of the populations. Such are the official sentiments of the French Minister, and they have been received, by the Prussian press at least, with a clamorous welcome. The result of such an appeal will be, they doubt not, the Germanisation of Holstein and Southern Slesvig; Northern Slesvig may be incorporated into the Danish monarchy if it pleases. These ideas, however, are by no means re-echoed by the Austrian organs, which are perfectly aware of the danger of driving the principle of universal suffrage to its logical extremity. The divergence of tone between the two Cabinets is becoming more and more decidedly marked; and if, as is most probable, the Conference is to divide itself into two camps, we may expect to see the two great German Powers on opposite sides. The other great fact, which throws some light on the possible event of the Conference, is the adherence of the Federal Diet to the proposition. Without following our foreign contemporaries into the quicksands of speculation, we may at least infer from this fact that the German Diet are ready to discuss the difficulties on European grounds, without dragging in the pitiful question of the succession of the Duke of Augustenburg.

The day of meeting has been changed from the 12th to the 20th inst., in order to give the German Diet ample time to consider the question and appoint a representative. France will be represented by her Ambassador at the Court of St. James's, Denmark by MM. Quaade, Krieger, and Bille (Danish Minister to England). M. Quaade resigns his portfolio of Foreign Affairs to Bishop Mourad during his temporary absence from Copenhagen. The representatives of Prussia will be Count Bernstoff, Ambassador to the English Court, and Herr von Balau, formerly Minister at Copenhagen.

The States of Holstein have held a meeting, at which forty out of forty-nine members attended: a resolution was voted protesting against any decision of the Conference of London which may in any way interfere with the rights of the Duchies; it further declares that the meeting acknowledges no sovereign but their hereditary ruler Frederick VIII. (the Duke of Augustenburg).

The members of the Extraordinary Rigsraad of Denmark have been elected. The result of the elections is that the Second Chamber is ultra-Danish, and desires to maintain a political union between the component parts of the kingdom; the First Chamber takes broader views, and would be satisfied to see Denmark Proper bounded by the Eider, and all due allowance made for differing nationalities.

A remark made by a Bavarian journal shows the length to which pretensions may be carried if not kept in proper check: it asserts that a large body of Germans may be found in Slesvig who, in consequence of the inhuman regulations of the Danish Government, have actually forgotten their native language, and are to all appearance Danes. To such unfortunates we suppose it behoves the Federal Diet to hold out a helping hand, to awaken their indignation against the wrongs which they have suffered and ought to feel, and by a judicious supply of German grammars and dictionaries to restore them to the place which they have so pitiably lost. Now to force any man to change his nationality is bad; to drag him under the dominion of the Federal Diet is worse; but to make him learn German against his will is simply an unparalleled atrocity.

After the most conflicting statements with regard to the intentions of the Archduke Ferdinand Maximilian, it is a relief to find that all difficulties have at length been surmounted; it is believed that the Archduke has renounced for himself and his heirs of both sexes all pretensions or claims to the throne of Austria, so long as he or his dynasty sit on the throne of Mexico. The formal offer and acceptance of the Crown took place on the 10th inst. at Miramar. The answer of the Archduke to the deputation was made in the Spanish language. His Imperial Highness recognised the offer as the result of a universal vote, and acknowledged that all the guarantees that he had at first demanded had been supplied by the generosity of the Emperor of the French. He took possession of the constitutional power given to him by the nation, and would keep it only so long as was necessary to create regularity in Mexico, and to organise liberal institutions. He expressed his earnest desire to place the monarchy on a constitutional basis; he was determined to respect liberty, and to enforce a respect for order; a thorough concord would give Mexico the blessings of strength, prosperity, and peace. He again expressed his gratitude to the illustrious Sovereign 'whose friendly aid has made the regeneration of our lovely country possible,' and concluded by informing the deputation that he should, before leaving Europe to take possession of his throne, obtain the blessing of the Pope, which would now be doubly precious to him. The new Emperor was to leave Miramar for Rome on the 11th inst.; but it is said that a slight attack of fever has at present confined him to his old residence.

By the permission of the Emperor of Austria, a body of 3,000 men and 300 sailors is to be raised in the Austrian dominions for service under the Crown of Mexico. The force is to consist of three battalions of infantry, one regiment of hussars, a company of pioneers, and a battery of artillery. Two hundred and sixty officers are also required for the service, 200 of whom have already volunteered.

An important discovery has been lately made in the neighbourhood of Turin in the shape of a mine containing rich veins of nickel, copper, and cobalt. Some question having already arisen as to the propriety of a new coinage, this accession to the mineral wealth of the country is most welcome. Those of our readers who have travelled in Switzerland will remember, with pleasure, the clean and extremely pretty small coinage with which that country is blessed, all made of the metal nickel. After the traveller has got over the first propensity to give to each silvery 20-centime piece the value of half a franc, he will acknowledge that for cleanliness, portability, and general convenience, there is nothing like nickel.

Apropos of money matters, the Papal Government is projecting a new loan of 40,000,000 francs (1,600,000*l.*). The Italian press, in commenting on this, quietly asks, who is to take the responsibility for the sum? The Italian Government was cognisant of the state of the Papal finance in 1859 and 1860, and was then ready to take upon itself the burden; but it protests that it is not to suffer for all the extravagances which a moribund Government has indulged in since that time.

The movements of General Garibaldi have created a considerable stir in Europe; of course the press has made much of his visit to England, the French viewing it in too political a light, the Italians seeing in it, for some reason, a general adherence to the principles of the Italian Ministry. The Spaniards have contrived to find out that they also are concerned in the affair, inasmuch as the General in passing Gibraltar is said to have dropped a friend or two, or to have there met Señor Olozaga, the Spanish Progressionist, or to have required a certain number of Mazzinists to rendezvous at that place, with a view to a revolution in Spain and Portugal. There appears to be little foundation for any of these stories, and the most effectual preventive for any such occurrences as are feared is now being put into operation by the Spanish Ministry: the press law is to be seriously modified, and a restraint put, except in very extraordinary cases, on the preliminary seizure of newspapers.

A visit was lately projected by the King and Queen of Portugal to their Imperial Majesties in Paris. A lively opposition to it has for some reason been started in the capital, going so far as to call such a visit 'impolitic and unnecessary.' The project has, for the present at least, been given up.

Two Austrian frigates and a gunboat have left the port of Lisbon, destined for the Baltic.

The National Government of Poland has found it necessary to publish a circular denying the truth of the Russian statements that the members of the National Government had been discovered, and its organisation annihilated. Great irritation is felt among the Government officials at an order emanating from Prince Tscherkaskoj, the new Governor of Poland, ordering all reports to be made in the Russian language. In vain the officials pleaded that they knew no language but Polish: the Prince retorted that he knew none but Russian, and would learn no other. A strange story is told concerning the Polish refugee Kutzschinski, captured lately by the Russian Consul at Constantinople. His compatriots, finding that the Turkish Government declined to assist him, organised a plan for rescuing him on his way to the Russian steamer that was to take him to Odessa. Unfortunately, they mistook a Greek assassin, whom the police were carrying off to prison, for their countryman, and made a premature attack. The Russians, thus warned, took other means of transporting their prisoner to a place of security. Prince Couza, of the United Principalities, is in disgrace with the Russian Government for the favour which he has shown to Polish refugees. The Russians have threatened, on a continuance of such conduct, to occupy the northern frontier of Moldavia.

A report has been presented to the French Government on the subject of the currency, which will probably bring about a remarkable change in the value of French coinage. The report states that, since the beginning of the present century, 246,171,107 coins have been struck, varying in value from 50 centimes to 2 francs; in spite of this enormous supply, there has been so great a deficiency in small change that, out of 89 departments, 6 only have not made it a matter of special complaint. The causes of the deficiency are, first, the general increase of business, and, secondly, the drain caused by the debased currency of some neighbouring countries. It is recommended that the intrinsic value of each coin should be reduced by making it of $\frac{835}{1000}$ instead of $\frac{9}{10}$ of fine silver. In so doing, France will only be following the example of England, Russia, Portugal, Brazil, the United States, &c., and will speedily be followed by Belgium.

The Boulevards of Paris are to be completed in the course of the year. When finished, they will be some miles long and 60 yards broad; set with a double avenue of trees, and lighted by four rows of lamps: they expand into 40 'places,' at different points of their course: and will be adorned throughout their whole length with benches for the accommodation of the tired wayfarer. Augustus boasted that he found Rome of brick and left it of marble; Napoleon may say that he found Paris in barricades and left it in squares.

The Duc de Luynes has performed an interesting feat in transporting a small steamer to the shores of the Dead Sea on the backs of camels; its dimensions were not large, it being only 30 feet long, and consequently easily put together on the spot; but its appearance has frightened the phlegmatic Arabs out of their composure. They assert that it is an evil spirit risen from those accursed depths, and have accordingly dubbed it Shaitan (Satan).

The Emperor, on the request of Prince Murat, has given the sum of 10,000 francs to be run for at the Vincennes races on May 29.

The French soldier has carried all his gaiety and bonhomie with him to Mexico; he soon worked his way into the affections of the natives, who had bitter cause to fear the approach of a military force. He now drinks 'pulque' with the Mexican citizen with as much cordiality as if it were the cognac of his native café.

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE BUDGET.

On Thursday the House of Commons was inconveniently crowded to hear the financial statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. From an early hour in the morning a number of persons were in waiting for admission to the Strangers' Gallery. A great many peers were in the members' galleries, and foreign Ministers and other distinguished persons filled the space under the galleries. Mr. Gladstone did not disappoint his eager and expectant audience. Whatever may be the difference of opinion as to the merits of the Budget, no one can deny that the speech by which it was introduced was singularly clear and eloquent. A glance at the facts and figures with which Mr. Gladstone had to deal will show that his oratorical skill can scarcely be overpraised when he could for three hours so discourse on them as to charm one of the most fastidious and exacting audiences ever assembled.

Mr. Gladstone commenced by explaining at length the position of the country and the progress of the revenue. In the past financial year, the distress in Ireland was mitigated, Lancashire was rather better off than in 1862-3, and we had an unusually abundant harvest, and therefore he considers that it was an average financial year. Our expenditure since 1859 has been as follows:—

1860-61	72,504,000
1861-62	70,838,000
1862-63	69,302,000
1863-64	67,056,000

The expenditure for the past year, as compared with 1859-60, shows a diminution of 2,961,000*l.*; but, allowing for the costs of fortifications, it shows a diminution of 3,286,000*l.* But in 1860, terminable annuities fell in, which relieved the country of an annual charge of 2,146,000*l.* From a peculiar arrangement of accounts, 1859-60 was charged with 2,540,000*l.* in respect to the terminable annuities, and therefore that amount must be deducted to correct the above estimate. That is to say, the reduction in our expenditure last year, as compared with 1859-60, was 740,000*l.*, independent of the saving from the falling in of the terminable annuities.

Turning to the revenue, Mr. Gladstone was able to point to a steady and important increase. In 1860-1, since which time we have imposed no fresh taxes, the revenue was 70,283,000*l.*, which was larger than the revenue for the past year by 1,657,000*l.* [We wish to give the right hon. gentleman's statement as clearly as possible, and therefore omit all details that do not affect the main results.] But this falling off in revenue is only apparent. Since 1860-1 the following taxes have been taken off:—

3*d.* in the pound on Income Tax	£3,525,000
Paper Duty	1,340,000
Reduction in Tea Duty	1,660,000
Charges on Shipping	143,000
	£6,668,000

Consequently, instead of diminishing, the revenue in these years has increased by 5,011,000*l.*, or at the rate of 1,670,000*l.* per annum. The elasticity of the revenue is shown by comparing the receipts of 1862-3 with those of 1863-4. It was estimated that the remission of taxes would involve in the latter year a loss of 3,343,000*l.*, whilst the actual loss was 677,000*l.* Going back to 1853, Mr. Gladstone calculates the annual increment of the revenue at 1,000,000*l.*—that is, independently of additional taxation, and from 'its own proper and inherent vigour.'

Before introducing the Budget for the year, Mr. Gladstone reviewed the progress of trade and the effect of free-trade legislation. Since 1842, when free-trade legislation commenced, our trade is three times greater. The account for the past three years is as follows:—

	Imports.	Exports.	Total.
1861	217,485,024	159,632,498	377,117,522
1862	225,716,976	166,168,134	391,885,110

Respecting the effects of the repeal of the paper duty, Mr. Gladstone said the importation of foreign paper, which, in 1859, was 18,000 cwt., had risen in 1863 to 197,000 cwt. In 1859 we imported materials for paper-making 115,000 cwt., and in 1863 731,000 cwt. The price of paper has been reduced to a greater extent than the amount of the duty. Printing paper is nine farthings per pound cheaper than it was in 1859, whilst the duty remitted is only six farthings per pound. Mr. Gladstone thought that the withdrawal of protection would give a stimulus to the trade, and compel the makers to exercise skill and invention. He cited the case of a maker who found, in October last, that his paper cost 57*l.* a ton, and did not pay, but who by improvements in process and the use of chemical agents had reduced the cost of a paper equally good, if not superior, to 39*l.* per ton. The position of the British paper trade would be improved with regard to the raw material, as the Government of France intends to make concessions respecting the export duty on rags. Mr. Gladstone noticed another difficulty the paper-makers have had to meet. He said: 'The paper trade is in no small degree dependent upon the cotton trade, and the consumption of paper in the export of cotton goods is enormous. And you must recollect that while the value of our cotton goods exported, being, from their almost doubled price, very high in amount, may tend to diminish the apparent loss in trade, yet the dear cotton goods require no more paper for wrapping than the cheap goods; and therefore a large demand for paper has, since the repeal of the duty, and from causes quite unconnected with it, been entirely cut off.' [Here the right hon. gentleman alluded to an important fact that cannot too often be impressed upon the attention of those who are interested in the industrial welfare of the country. Until now, so far as our wealth is concerned, we have not suffered from the war in America, and in one view we have been gainers by the strife. When the war broke out, we held an enormous stock of cotton and cotton fabrics, and the increase in the value of this stock has been a heavy addition to our wealth. But that is over. We have now to do a trade with less profit, for we have to pay dearly for the raw material; and the enhanced price, by checking demand, diminishes the margin for profit. Moreover, the increased cost of the fabric does not tend to revive our staple industry. It needs no more hands to make dear than to make cheap cotton.]

The revenue from the spirit duties has very slightly increased though the duty has been raised. Mr. Gladstone ascribes this to the distress in Lancashire and in Ireland, and to the increased consumption of wines. In 1858-9, the import of wines was 6,974,000 gallons, and in 1863-4, 10,729,000 gallons, being an increase of 55 per cent. The import of wines from France since the change of duties has increased 330 per cent. The result of free trade with France is highly satisfactory. In 1859 our imports and exports were 26,431,000*l.*, and in the past year 46,987,000*l.* Respecting the trade in tobacco, Mr. Gladstone reported an increase since the decrease of the protective duty on manufactured tobacco. In the eleven months ending February 1863, the import of cigars was 2,316,000 lbs.; and for the eleven months ending February 1864, 3,976,000 lbs. Last year 36,590,000 lbs. of raw tobacco was entered for home consumption, against 35,735,000 lbs. for the preceding year, that is, the year ending March 31, 1863. The export of British manufactured tobacco was, in six months of 1862-3, 50,000 lbs., and, in the corresponding period of 1863-4, 123,000 lbs. From 1842 to 1862 the average annual increase of revenue from tobacco duties was 105,000*l.*; but since the change of duty was adopted last year, the increase has risen to 290,000*l.*

Looking to the extent of pauperism as a test of the condition of the country, we find that in 1848-9 the total number of paupers was 981,330; and in 1863-4 it was 828,320. [This return includes Lancashire; but the extent of avowed pauperism is by no means a true gauge of the extent of Lancashire distress. In all parts of England, but particularly in Lancashire, there is an unconquerable aversion to become classified paupers; and, rather than do so, men and women frequently suffer the direst distress.]

The public debt at present is 791,574,000*l.*, and the annual charge on it is between 26,000,000*l.* and 26,500,000*l.* During the past year 3,360,000*l.* has been paid off. In 1815 the debt was 861,039,000*l.*, and the annual charge was 6,435,000*l.* more than it is at present. The Russian war added 39,026,000*l.* to the debt, of which about 16,500,000*l.* has been paid off. During the past year 433,000*l.* has been converted from perpetual into terminable annuities.

The estimates for the current year are:—

Charge for funded and unfunded debt	£26,400,000
Consolidated fund	1,930,000
Army	14,844,000
Navy	10,432,000
Collection of revenue	4,693,000
Packet service	883,000
Miscellaneous services	7,628,000
Reserved	80,000
Together	£66,890,000

The revenue for the current year is estimated as follows:—

Customs	£23,150,000
Excise	18,030,000
Stamps	9,320,000
Taxes	3,250,000
Income-tax	8,600,000
Post Office	3,950,000
Crown lands	310,000
Miscellaneous	2,250,000
Indemnities	600,000
	£69,460,000

This shows a surplus of about 2,560,000*l.* Of this Mr. Gladstone disposes of 10,000*l.* in various minor changes, including the reduction to 1*d.* of the duty payable on proxies used at meetings of joint-stock companies. On sugar the following alterations are proposed:—

	Present duty.	Proposed duty.
	s. d.	s. d.
Refined per cwt.	18 4	12 10
2nd class sugar ,,	16 0	11 8
3rd class ,, ,,	13 10	10 6
4th class ,, ,,	12 8	9 4
5th (a new class) ,,		8 2

This gives an average of 4*s.* per cwt. reduction; but it is difficult to compare classified duties, and Mr. Gladstone thinks that 'the effect of this change will be to reduce the duty on sugar to 1*s.*, or more than 1*s.* a cwt. less than it has ever been before.' This will cause a loss of 1,719,000*l.*, but allowing for entries of sugars now practically excluded, and 6 per cent. for increased consumption, the loss to revenue in 12 months would be 1,358,000*l.* Deducting for the fraction of the current year that has gone, Mr. Gladstone estimates the loss of revenue at 1,330,000*l.* He proposes to make the sugar duty a permanent enactment, instead of a duty granted from year to year. [The trade will appreciate this, for the system of granting the duty from year to year keeps the market in a state of chronic excitement.]

Mr. Gladstone proposes to take 1*d.* in the pound off the income-tax, which will involve an immediate loss of 800,000*l.*, and an ultimate loss of 1,230,000*l.* per annum. He also proposes to reduce the duty for fire insurance on stock-in-trade from 3*s.* to 1*s.* 6*d.*, which will involve a loss of 283,000*l.* The whole of these changes will decrease the revenue by 2,232,000*l.*, leaving the actual surplus 238,000*l.*, which he considers ought not to be further diminished.

In reference to the malt-duty, Mr. Gladstone urged several reasons why it should not, in his opinion, be reduced. The beer-tax had been removed thirty-five years ago; but its repeal had been a total loss to the revenue, though it was practically a part of the malt-duty. It was not, therefore, likely, that if we reduced the malt-duty by one-half (the whole duty yields about 6,091,000*l.*), the revenue would be benefited by a large increase in consumption, but there would be a heavy loss. Then the repeal of the malt-duty would be an injustice to Scotland and Ireland. Taking the revenues from spirits and from malt together, England pays 10,500,000*l.*, or about 10*s.* per head; Scotland pays 3,620,000*l.*, or about 22*s.* per head; and Ireland pays 2,653,000*l.*, or about 10*s.* per head. The malt-duty paid by England in the past year was 5,722,000*l.*, by Scotland 263,000*l.*, and by Ireland 300,000*l.* Therefore Mr. Gladstone contends that to repeal the malt-duty would be to relieve England at the expense of Scotland and Ireland.

KIDNAPPING BRITISH SUBJECTS.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Sir A. Agnew said that two months ago the son of a gentleman residing in this country went on shore from his ship in New York, and it was believed that he was kidnapped by the Yankees. The agent of the ship told the unhappy father that New York had become a horrible place, and that hundreds of young men had been kidnapped and never after heard of.

Mr. Layard said Her Majesty's Government had received reports from our Consuls at Boston, Portland, and New York, about kidnapping Irishmen. It appears from these reports that at Boston 102, and at Portland 47 British subjects had been pressed into the Federal service. 'These persons had been tempted under various pretences to leave Ireland, and on arriving in the United States were actually imprisoned for some time, kept without sufficient food, and then plied with whisky. When in a state of inebriety they were prevailed upon to enter the army of the United States.' [This, be it observed, is the statement of Mr. Layard, the representative of the Foreign Office in the House of Commons.] Lord Lyons has been instructed to make enquiry and to ask for redress, and also to call upon the United States Government in future to protect British subjects who might be induced under false pretences to proceed to the United States. [Would it not have been rather more to the purpose to ask the United States Government not to employ any more agents in inducing emigrants to go to the United States under false pretences?]

THE STEAM-RAMS.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Sir L. Palk called the attention of the Attorney-General to the evidence which was being obtained in Egypt about the steam-rams at Birkenhead. It appeared from the correspondence that has been published, that Messrs. Laird had furnished the Government with the fullest information they were able to give, and had afforded free access to the vessels whenever it was required. From the first they had stated that M. Bravay was the purchaser, and, so far as they were concerned, the transaction was a bonâ fide one. Why then could not this statement have been investigated long ago? Why was there a delay both unfair and prejudicial to the interests of commerce? If the Government could send a roving Commission into foreign countries to beat up evidence about the steam-rams, there could be no difficulty in seeking for evidence about arms, cannon, and men that were shipped for the North. So common was it to ship arms to New York that the other day an account was published of how the Germania was detained at Southampton in shipping some heavy siege-guns from the Low Moor Ironworks.

The Attorney-General, in reply to the question put by Sir L. Palk, said, the Commission to obtain evidence in Egypt was applied for by his advice. The Commission was to return by May 10, and, if the arrangements of the Court permit, the Government will be ready to proceed with the trial after Easter term. The delay in sending out the Commission has not delayed the trial. A single Commissioner has been sent out. 'Of course, if the other side go to more expense, that is a voluntary action on their part.' [Of course it is voluntary. It is voluntary on the part of the defendants whether they will engage proper legal assistance. It is voluntary with them whether they will defend the action at all; but if they do so it is not altogether voluntary that they watch the proceedings of the Commission.]

THE DANISH WAR.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Shaftesbury called attention to the bombardment of Sonderburg for forty-eight hours without notice, by which eighty women and children were killed or wounded. Assuming the account to be true, His Lordship said: 'It is a state of things which will bring us to believe that the Prussian Government which is responsible, and the Prussian military which are the instruments, are not fit to be counted in the list of civilised men or civilised nations.' Earl Russell said he had instructed the British Minister at Berlin to enquire into the circumstances, and he will not give an opinion until he knows the real facts of the case.

On Monday, Lord Campbell moved: 'That in the opinion of this House, if the demand made by Denmark for mediation, according to the principle laid down in the protocol of Paris, 1856, had been more decidedly supported by Her Majesty's Government, the bloodshed and the other evils already occasioned by the war in Denmark might have been prevented, and there would have been less danger than there now is of a more extensive disturbance in the peace of Europe. That in the opinion of this House, a Conference upon the Danish question, in order to lead to a practical result, ought to be accompanied by such steps as may convince the Powers of Europe that Her Majesty's Government adhere to the treaties in which the Duchy of Slesvig has been guaranteed to Denmark by Great Britain.' His Lordship reviewed the progress of the negotiations as set forth in the papers laid before Parliament, and he considered the dignity of the country had been lowered. We had obligations towards Denmark which would not be satisfied by an unsuccessful Conference, and the Danes who are most interested are most sceptical as to the success of the Conference. It was the duty of the British Government to make such declarations, and to pursue such a course, as to convince Europe that we are determined to defend the integrity of Denmark. Suppose through our supineness that Flensburg and Kiel should be occupied by a German navy, we could not submit to such a proceeding, and war would be the result. If Kiel were occupied by a British fleet, we should have a diplomatic locus standi. If the German Powers are entitled to take possession of Danish territory as a material guarantee for vindicating a doubtful right, this country is entitled to occupy the waters with a view of discharging an undoubted obligation.

The Duke of Argyll denied that England was bound by the treaty of 1862 to act alone for the defence of Denmark, and the Government had spared no effort to induce the other Powers who were parties to that treaty to enter upon some common action. Her Majesty's Ministers were no more to be blamed for not preventing the outbreak of the present war than was the Government of Lord Derby for not preventing the Italian war. There was nothing in dispute between Denmark and Germany that might not have been settled without resort to hostilities, and the Government had sought to avert unnecessary bloodshed. 'They desired nothing but to restore peace to Europe, no doubt compatibly with the local rights of the two Duchies, and consistently, if possible, with the integrity of the Danish monarchy.' [The 'if possible' is an ominous expression, from which we may infer that if Her Majesty's Government deem it expedient they will consent to the dismemberment of the Danish monarchy.]

Earl Grey gave a history of the events that preceded the outbreak of hostilities, and censured the conduct of the Government in advising Denmark to pursue a policy of concession when they did not intend to afford her material aid in the case of an aggression which the Government had described as an outrage. Denmark would have been better off if we had not proffered any advice. If the Government had been firmer, and Germany had known that she would have to meet England in the conflict, there would not have been the slightest chance of war. His Lordship condemned the barbarous way in which the Germans were carrying on the war.

Earl Russell said that, as Foreign Minister, he had endeavoured to divest his mind of all partisanship, and to meet this important question with perfect fairness. Neither Denmark nor Germany was free from blame, but he was of opinion that Germany might have obtained all her rights by negotiation, and it seemed to him that the German Powers were rather disposed to excite a quarrel than to exhibit a conciliatory temper. His Lordship observed that the Government was not found fault with because they did not avert a war, but because they did not join in one. He rejoiced that England was not taking part in a general war and so adding to our burden of debt. The Government were not called upon to assert the treaty of 1720, but the object of the Government was to maintain the treaty of 1852, and to have it recognised by the Powers of Europe. The French have great sympathy for the Poles, there being amongst other causes the tie of religion between the two peoples. While France sympathised with Poland, the sympathies of England, a maritime nation, were with Denmark, and, said His Lordship, 'while we refused to join France in the proposal regarding Poland, she refused to join us in the proposition with regard to Denmark. We have no reason to find fault with France on that ground, but still I must say that, if we are to defend Denmark on the grounds of the interests of Europe and the balance of power, the Powers of Europe ought to go together, and not to leave that great task to be undertaken by us alone.'

The Earl of Derby observed that he had been through the papers, and he commended the industry of Earl Russell, who had written, during the last year, 170 despatches upon the subject of Denmark and Germany. And, said the noble Earl, 'although certainly I have not been struck with admiration of the style of these despatches—although I have seen them characterised by what I consider a most forcible weakness, I must say that I have been struck with astonishment and admiration at the persevering industry with which the noble Earl has gone on spinning, day after day, thread by thread, his political cobwebs, utterly regardless of every single thread being swept away one after another—spinning, spinning, spinning on, but at the same time not making the slightest progress towards the completion of his web, and not having been able to catch a single diplomatic fly.' His Lordship condemned the vacillating policy of the Government, because firmness might have averted hostilities, whilst indecision had jeopardised the peace of Europe. He was not sanguine about the Conference, seeing that the principal parties concerned came to it with diametrically opposite declarations. In conclusion His Lordship said: 'I do justice to the motives which actuated the noble Earl throughout the whole of this correspondence. I cannot, however, conceal from myself my conviction that, by the strength of his remonstrances and the feebleness of his acts, he has confirmed the impression, so prevalent throughout Europe, that we have ceased to be a great Power, that our military and naval position has been made subordinate to our trading and commercial interests, and that, however England may bluster, and however loudly she may talk, there is not the slightest danger of her interfering materially to exercise the slightest influence or control in the affairs of Europe.'

Lord Wodehouse said that Denmark had consented to follow the advice given her by the British Government when it was unfortunately too late; but that advice was sound, and had not injured Denmark. He could not conceal from himself that the position of the Government to prevent war had been materially injured by the policy pursued with respect to the Poles. After entering into diplomatic correspondence, the Government were compelled to withdraw—wisely, he thought, but under circumstances which could not but weaken to some extent the good understanding which existed between this country and France. He hoped that this country would have again the full cooperation of France, without which he despaired of seeing this question satisfactorily and speedily settled. If this cooperation should not be obtained, and if the Conference should unfortunately fail in settling the question, a grievous shock would be given to the whole system under the protection of which the treaties of Europe existed, because they were preserved by the confidence existing among the great Powers. He questioned the expediency of such treaties as that of 1852. He thought that the British Government should interfere in the affairs of Europe as seldom as possible; but when led to do so, it should be in a manner to make the country respected.

After a few observations by Earl Granville, who is of opinion that the first act of the Conference should be to obtain an armistice, Lord Campbell withdrew his motion.

Earl Russell said the Prussian Government had given notice that Sonderburg, being part of the fortress of Düppel, was liable to bombardment. It appeared to him that that justification—if so it was called—was perfectly insufficient, because the people of Sonderburg naturally would not act on a general notice, but were entitled, according to the usages of war, to a special notice of 24 hours.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Dillwyn called attention to the bombardment of Sonderburg. Mr. Osborne followed in a caustic and humorous speech, and this called up Lord Palmerston. The noble Premier, who defended the conduct of the Government and said a few kind words for the Conference, was also rather humorous. After some remarks by Mr. Kinglake, who is rabid on the so-called national rights of Slesvig and Holstein, General Peel rose 'merely to say that it was not a fit subject for ridicule. The hon. member for Swansea asked whether it was true that Sonderburg was bombarded without notice, and eighty of its inhabitants killed. Then the noble Lord got up, and the world will hear of the House of Commons being convulsed with laughter. I say that is adding insult to injury.'

VOLUNTEER ARTILLERY.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Mr. H. Berkeley asked the Under-Secretary of War if any steps were to be taken to supply the Volunteer Artillery with useful guns. At present they had old guns that would be of no avail against an enemy. In reply, the Marquis of Hartington said the main object for which Volunteer Artillery was raised was not to act as field artillery, but to take part, if necessary, in the defence of the coast as garrison artillery. Up to the present time no field batteries had been granted to the Volunteer Artillery Corps, but provision is made in the Estimates for a limited supply.

THE BRITISH FORCE IN JAPAN.

In reply to Colonel Sykes, the Marquis of Hartington said that a small force had been sent to Japan to protect the settlements of Yokohama, but it was expected they would soon be withdrawn. It was not at all correct to suppose that any regiment was to be quartered in Japan.

MONASTERIES AND CONVENTS IN ENGLAND.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Newdegate made a very long speech about Roman Catholic establishments, in which he gave vent to a great deal of bigotry, which is as inimical to the spirit of Protestantism as it is uncharitable and distasteful. The gist of his complaint was that on the tombstones in the private burial-ground of the Oratorians, the baptismal and not the registered names were inscribed. Lord E. Howard made a telling speech in reply, in the course of which he alluded feelingly and gracefully to the faith of his family and to his family bereavements. His Lordship was loudly cheered.

THE BANKRUPTCY ACT.

On Friday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Moffatt called attention to the working of the new Bankruptcy Act. It was estimated that the amount of insolvency in England annually exceeds 50,000,000*l.* Under the new Act 9,663 persons had been freed from their liability, and of these 7,000 had not paid a farthing of dividend. The law as it stood is a boon to the debtor and a burden to the creditor. Out of 9,000 persons who had gone into the Bankruptcy Court, only 700 went on the petition of the creditors, and the rest on their own petition. He moved for a Select Committee.

Mr. Murray complained of the expenses of working. In two years the charges amounted to 224,000*l.*, or a sixth of the value of all the bankrupts' and insolvents' estates in England and Wales.

The Attorney-General did not deny that there were many evils in the working of the measure; and the Lord Chancellor, who was the author of the Bill, was desirous of having them remedied. The Government would be glad to see a Select Committee appointed at some future time.

THE GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES BILL.

This measure, which has led to such frequent and angry discussions, was referred, with the consent of the Government, on Monday night, to a Select Committee. In the course of the discussion Sir F. Kelly complained that Mr. Gladstone had reflected on the Professional Company. Mr. Gladstone said he did not mean to say that the Professional Company had been guilty of any greater offence than reckless speculation.

FLOGGING FOR RAPE.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, the Marquis of Westmeath moved the second reading of a Bill giving the judge power, when more than one person was concerned in the crime of rape, to order the infliction of corporal punishment in addition to the present penalties. After a brief discussion, in the course of which Lord Cranworth expressed his regret that punishments were not more severe than they now are, the Bill was read a second time.

THE SUEZ CANAL.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, in reply to Mr. D. Griffith, Lord Palmerston said it is to be regretted that whilst England and France are both in need of cotton, '30,000 or 40,000 people who might be usefully employed in the cultivation of cotton in Egypt, are occupied in digging a canal through a sandy desert, and making two harbours in deep mud and shallow water.' He hoped such an occupation would soon be put an end to. [It is fair to remark that French engineers differ from Lord Palmerston as to the practicability of forming the Suez Canal.]

DAUNT'S ROCK.

On Tuesday, in answer to Mr. Maguire, Mr. M. Gibson said the Government did not intend, at present, either to blow up Daunt's Rock, or to place a lighthouse on it. The Inman Company signified their willingness some time ago to contribute to the expense of a lighthouse. A private survey is going on of Daunt's Rock, which may enable the Government to decide upon the expense and practicability of removing it by blasting. Meantime an improvement has been sanctioned by the Board of Trade in the light on Roche's Point, which will then indicate to a ship making for Cork Harbour when she is approaching Daunt's Rock.

MUTILATION OF EDUCATIONAL REPORTS.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, Lord R. Cecil moved: 'That, in the opinion of this House, the mutilation of the reports of Her Majesty's inspectors of schools, and the exclusion from them of statements and opinions adverse to the educational views entertained by the Committee of Council, while matter favourable to them is admitted, are violations of the understanding under which the appointment of the inspectors was originally sanctioned by Parliament, and tend entirely to destroy the value of their reports.' Lord R. Cecil declared he had ample proofs that passages were cut out of the reports of the inspectors which were unfavourable to the opinions of Mr. Lowe; but he would not, unless challenged, be more precise, lest Mr. Lowe should punish his subordinates who had given the information. Mr. Walter cited a case within his own knowledge of such unfair mutilation. Mr. Lowe made a strong appeal to the House to reject the resolution, but in vain. On a division, it was carried by 101 to 93, being a majority of 8 against the Government.

ENDURANCE AND DETERMINATION OF THE SOUTHERN PEOPLE.

We are permitted to publish the following extract from a private letter addressed to an English gentleman by a citizen of the Confederate States, who is himself a heavy tax-payer, and who has been a heavy loser by the devastations of the Yankee armies in Tennessee. The letter is not less interesting as an illustration of the unflagging determination of the Southern people to dare all and to suffer all which may be necessary to the achievement of their independence, than for the evidence it affords of the calm but fixed confidence of all in their final triumph.

Atlanta, Georgia: Feb. 23, 1864.

My dear Sir,— * * * * Congress has at length passed the Tax Bill. It is radical certainly, but, so far as I have been able to learn, it will be cheerfully borne even by those upon whom it falls heaviest. Although the bills passed are objectionable in some of their features, yet we all accept them with good will as an earnest of the good faith of the Government, and of the fixed determination, at whatever cost, to fight out the war to a successful termination. I beg to refer you to the provision made by the 6th section of the bill for the payment of the bonds therein provided. They offer the highest security in the power of the Government—that is, a lien upon all export and import duties, and the receipt of the coupons at par with gold or foreign exchange, in which alone the interest is to be paid. These bonds are also exempt from taxation.

We are confident—more so now, if possible, than ever before—of our ultimate success. Not that we look for an uninterrupted series of successes, or that we expect to repel every effort of the enemy at a further advance. We have made up our minds for the worst—the worst that even Yankees may do—plunder, devastation, insult, and every species of outrage that may be inflicted. We shall bear it all, if need be; but it will not change the fixed resolve to be a free people. The slaves within our lines give us neither trouble nor uneasiness. Very few leave us, even where the enemy has occupied the country, except such as are forced off, or tempted by other promises than that of freedom, about which they manifest a most supreme yet sagacious indifference. Our troops have nearly all voluntarily re-enlisted for the war—that is, until our independence is achieved. This action on the part of the army, and the cheerful acquiescence of the tax-payers in the recent unprecedented taxation, must remove the last doubt, if there were any, that there is but one heart and one purpose in the Confederacy. Our muster-rolls number upwards of four hundred thousand men. From these, and others to be added, we shall be able to bring into the field an army, composed chiefly of veterans, of about three hundred thousand effective troops. We met with a series of reverses last year from causes not yet investigated. We hope for better success and better management in the ensuing campaign. Do not believe a word of Yankee delusion or falsehood about our nakedness or starvation. We neither enjoy nor care for dress or luxuries. But we have now, and shall continue to have, enough to keep us in heart and strength till the hated Yankee shall have abandoned the struggle for our subjugation. Our troops are in the main comfortable, and, when need be, those who remain at home will live cheerfully upon half-rations.

While we have strong hopes of being able to change the tide of events which last year turned temporarily against us, yet we have looked squarely in the face the possibility of further reverses. We no longer flatter ourselves with the hope of recognition, mediation, or even justice and fair play, from foreign Governments, until we shall first have extorted them from a reluctant foe. Our Government has never asked, unless it has exceeded the public wishes, for help from abroad. We have no claim upon their gratitude. But we did not expect, on the other hand, that proud, defiant old England, the terror of despotism everywhere, would turn her back upon a young nation, struggling for its existence, and for rights which she had once acknowledged, and which had never been relinquished, upon the haughty demand of an imperious, domineering, vulgar, upstart, Radical democracy. It does not change our firm purpose, nor excite any feeling of despondency, yet I do not deny that we were disappointed and grieved that any Ministry of England could be sustained in a promise to subvert the laws, if need be, to satisfy the demands of a Government which awaits impatiently the first favourable opportunity of dealing her a death-blow. We did in the sincerity of our hearts hope that nothing might occur during the progress of this war which would in the slightest degree mar the cordial good feeling created by mutual interest and kindred blood.

I will still hope that I may be wrong: that I am misinformed: that I look at the conduct of the British Government from a wrong standpoint; that I and the rest of my countrymen have fallen into an error; and that our old, respected, and almost venerated mother is, has been, and will continue to be, just to those who would be proud to call themselves friends as well as kinsmen.

Very truly yours,

W.

MR. LINCOLN'S HONESTY AND CAPACITY.

(From the New York New Nation.)

We all recollect that worthy citizen of Athens who banished Aristides solely because it annoyed him to hear the epithet, 'the Just,' constantly coupled with his name. We have all been struck by this strange specimen of political liberty, and by the lack of judgment in its application. It was not because this undue notoriety given to the name of a citizen of the republic might, after a time, prove dangerous, nor because the epithet of Just was questionable, that the worthy citizen of Greece banished Aristides. He would not even discuss the matter; the epithet annoyed him, and that was enough to ostracise its unfortunate bearer. In this we see an excess of liberty and a lack of political education.

Now, we are annoyed and irritated at hearing the words Abraham Lincoln and honesty always coupled together; but being more generous than the excellent Athenian citizen aforesaid, we propose, before ostracising honest Abe from the White House, to consider his right to the surname of 'Honest.' To call one man honest out of a population of 30,000,000, is not so much a compliment to him as a sarcasm upon all the rest. Let us look into his honesty and capability. After three years of patient silence we have a right, and it is moreover our duty, Mr. Lincoln, to examine your acts and show them to the nation. You commenced by confiding the fate of our cause, the honour of our arms, and the lives of our sons to men having no higher claim to such trusts than a host of voters at their command, whose support you coveted—in order to advance the welfare of the nation.

We have allowed you to further your political and personal interests, and to transform into heroes men whose inefficiency has swallowed up thousands of lives and millions of dollars, so that you might be able to dazzle the eyes of the people with victories far more apparent than real. We have permitted you to sacrifice tried patriots, whose popularity alarmed you, and whose energy disappointed your calculations.

We have allowed you to deceive the people; we have let you transform disgraceful defeats into victories; and we even made no outcry when you were reduced to beg exoneration for acts which have eternally disgraced the honour of our arms. You have been unable either to foresee or to forestall anything. What has become of the nation's enthusiasm? What have you done with the immense resources, unprecedented in history, that the nation has lavishly given you?

You are now appealing to conscription, and we will not enter into a discussion of the principle itself; but we will tell you that you should have foreseen that the day must come when you would need these men, and that you were to blame in not calling for them when the people's enthusiasm was first aroused, when they certainly would not have been refused you. You are to blame, inasmuch as, through your incapacity and personal schemes, the necessity for such an appeal has become a question of public safety. You are to blame for depriving us of the services of the men whose popularity stimulated that enthusiasm.

You have told the country that both the rebellion and slavery were dead; you have told the people that the forces of the rebels were reduced by desertions, and that they could not be recruited, fed, or clothed, and yet you are forced to act upon the defensive, being threatened at all points.

Whenever you have directed the action of our troops, they have been uniformly unsuccessful: you have perpetually offered us the wretched spectacle of splendid resources and excellent chances of success sacrificed to incapacity. The only success which you came near attaining, but the credit of which we intend to take from you, is due to the incredible imaginativeness that you have displayed in describing facts. Changes of base, masterly retreats, and reconnaissances have succeeded each other with a rapidity worthy of the greatest showman of modern times. The immense variety of circumstances is only equalled by the identity of the results.

We have:—

Sherman's reconnaissance
Smith's reconnaissance
Thomas's reconnaissance
Kilpatrick's reconnaissance
Custer's reconnaissance
Seymour's reconnaissance
Gilmore's Charleston reconnaissance.

The result is everywhere the same, ridiculous and disastrous. The sole concession we can make to your honesty is that you have improved upon the changes of base in 1862: you destroy fewer soldiers and burn less of the nation's property.

How is it that, after three years of incomparable victories, according to Halleck's facetious expression, 'unprecedented in the military history of nations,' you are still pondering how to preserve the national capital and your bases of operation?

Is it as a reward for such success, for the achievement of such results, that you now ask the nation to pass a vote of confidence, and re-elect you for another and perhaps still another term?

In your inaugural address, you gave a very striking illustration of your peculiar honesty by virtually pledging yourself, in accordance with the well-known principles of the party which had elected you, not to serve a second term, you did this in a manner which none of your supporters then misunderstood; but your words were evidently designed to bear a double meaning; so that, if you should find the sweets of office more enticing than you possibly anticipated, you might change your purpose without seeming to violate your promise. Candid people will see in this a good deal more evidence of cunning than of honesty.

The whole truth is this: you are leading the nation quietly to its destruction by deceiving the people as to the dangers which threaten it. In the first part of the campaign of 1862, you gained advantages which you were unable to utilise or even retain in 1863.

You sacrificed the entire West for the capture of Vicksburg, and then you proclaim to the four winds that the Mississippi is free, while not a single steamboat can navigate it without being attacked or perhaps burned, and without every passenger having the fear of death or captivity before his eyes.

To serve the ends of your cause, you have made a hero out of a man upon whom you have lavished everything, who had every obstacle removed from his path, and who was promptly furnished with reinforcements and supplies, while Rosecrans could get none; and who has scarcely been able to hold, with the immense resources at his command, the ground which his predecessor gained in spite of you by his own talents.

You have offered us the distressing spectacle of the sacrifice of merit to caprice and personal political interests; and this in a republic, in the name and under the plea of popular sovereignty.

And, to cap the climax, we are obliged to hear definitions like this: An unconditionally loyal man is one who, although not satisfied with the measures taken by the Government, approves them all and gives his constant support.

It seems almost incredible. Are we in Constantinople, in St. Petersburg, in Rome, or in Paris? Are we the descendants of those proud Saxons who refused to succumb to any yoke, or the illegitimate offspring of cardinals seeking to secure fortune and greatness by a perpetual worship? Are we really the descendants of those disciples of Luther and Calvin, who, rather than subject their reason to an authority which they despised, preferred to expatriate themselves to these shores, where, through the agency of liberty, they founded our national greatness which you are now striving to drown in a sea of cowardice and adulation, corruption and incompetency? Were our ancestors to visit the earth, they would certainly be surprised to see that, eighty years after the revolution which gave life and liberty to the nation, the Lincoln party could find no other definition of loyalty than a blind submission to the decrees of the Government.

But we have exercised this blind and mute submission during three years; during three years we have kept silent—and what is more generous than silence?

Some true Radical patriots said not long since, 'We have lost confidence in Fremont. What has he done or said for a year past?'

What could he do? what could he say? He has done for you that which Butler and Sigel have done: what we have all done: he has been charitable enough to keep silence, and to our eyes this is more than he should have done. In the face of so much incapacity and corruption, patriotism alone has kept us silent. Each time that a fresh defeat or a fresh concession to foreign Powers brought an indignant exclamation to our lips, we restrained its utterance. And yet have much grief, and love, and admiration, accompanied each fresh hecatomb of these unknown heroes, these martyrs to their country, who have fallen through the incompetency and the cold and insatiable ambition of the men whose mission it was to lead our sons to victory, but who, being blinded by political considerations for their personal advancement, led them only to a profitless death.

And you have not displayed more talent or energy abroad. Napoleon has trampled upon the rights of a friendly republic; he has insolently notified us of the blockade of the Mexican coast, and thrown the Monroe doctrine in our face. We ask, then, who is master now in America, he who lays down the law or he who submits to the same? Is it Napoleon III. or the successor of Washington?

God alone, by bestowing upon the country inexhaustible natural wealth and that ardent patriotism which makes every soldier a hero, has saved the country from the ruin into which your selfishness would plunge it. This is the secret of the difference between your currency and that of the South.

We have been imposed upon long enough. The ruin which you have been unable to accomplish in four years, would certainly be fully consummated were you to remain in power four years longer. Your military governors and their provost-marshals override the laws, and the echo of the armed bad rings forth as clearly now in America as in Prussia or Austria. You have encroached upon our liberty without securing victory, and we must have both.

You have dishonoured us abroad by shameless misrepresentations as to our true condition. Places that we occupied in 1862 are now again in the hands of the rebels, and God knows whether your preparations for the approaching campaign are adequate. Corruption has entered into every department of your administration, rendering it a very Augean stable, which needs a Hercules as your successor. It is time for the light to shine forth and for the truth to fully appear, so that all sincere patriots, all men who look for nothing further than the advancement of their country and of liberty, may rally in one compact body around the great principle of Liberalism, and form a Liberal party really worthy of the name. Such a one only can save the country.

Away with all the impostors who have invaded the temple of liberty and turned it into a vote-market! Let there be an end of this ridiculous farce of unconditional loyalty, which is only fit to secure the votes of those fools who, instead of delving to the root of the matter, blindly believe all the interested falsehoods published by journals that are paid to applaud and submit, whether right or wrong.

Mr. Lincoln's honesty is of a strange description. It consists in nearly ruining his country and in disregarding its interests in order to make sure of power for four years longer. To our eyes, the man who has deprived his country of the services of some of its best citizens, who has been unable to make any better use of the incredible resources confided to him, and who, after agitating so many public questions without solving one of them, disregards his own utter incapacity, is, of all the citizens of the United States, the least honest and the most dangerous.

But even if President Lincoln were the honest man that his penal organs represent him to be, how dangerous would his re-election prove to the liberties of the people, under existing circumstances, surrounded as he is with the military influences that he has at his back! Let us remember the teachings of history and the instances of feigned or real imbecility, all of which have resulted in despotism. Sixtus V., the half-stupid monk in his cell, and Napoleon III., the sottish debauchee, belong to the same school. The men who have had to endure them, elected them as unimportant individuals, whose election would give time for reflection and consideration, it will soon be sixteen years that France has reflected and pondered over her lost liberty. Fearing the unknown, and shrinking from the perturbations incidental to change, they have had despotism and ruin, which are leading them inevitably to the most terrible of all the revolutions that history has hitherto recorded. Americans of the old school will not believe us; they say our liberties are so firmly implanted in the blood of our old Anglo-Saxon race that none dare disturb them. But we think differently, and say with the poet,

Ce bloc enfariné ne me dit rien qui vaille.

PARIS TOPICS.

Paris: April 12.

Great satisfaction is felt here at the termination of the uncertainties which up to the last moment seemed to render the acceptance of the Mexican crown by the Archduke Maximilian doubtful. This was not accomplished without the intervention of the French Emperor, to whose good offices it was due that the Emperor Francis Joseph at length agreed to reasonable terms. It is understood that the family convention, while it provides for the new Emperor's resumption of his rank in Austria, in case of losing the Mexican crown by civil war or foreign invasion, excludes him in any other case from his rights of succession in Austria, and at all events deprives him of a large part of his private fortune. In his speech accepting the crown, the passage referring to the guarantees obtained from France has been much remarked. In addition to an aide-de-camp of the Emperor's who was sent from here to Vienna, the bearer of letters to vanquish Francis Joseph's tardy objections, there was also present at Miramar a secretary of the French Foreign Office, M. Herbet, authorised to receive the new Emperor's signature to a convention already agreed upon during his visit here, but which he then only signed conditionally. In this, it is understood, a Franco-Mexican commercial treaty was included. The telegrams of this morning announce that the Archduke's departure is delayed by a slight attack of fever, the natural result of the anxiety which so weighty a step as he has just taken must inevitably have cost him, heightened as it was by the vexatious obstacles thrown in his way at the last moment. He carries with him the best wishes of all who have been brought in contact with him, and in general of all Frenchmen.

The Budget report was distributed with the Moniteur this morning. It is a very long document, covering more than eight full pages, and I have only had time to look over it cursorily. I am struck with one article, that which imposes a stamp of one-tenth of a penny on cheques. These convenient media of exchange have only just been introduced into France, and they are still very little known, and, what may seem still stranger, their object and meaning are so little understood that they have given rise to innumerable discussions in the newspapers, some displaying an incredible amount of ignorance of the subject discussed. In the estimation of some of the writers a cheque was a bank-note issuable by every man who had an account at his banker's, and bearing interest. The Committee on the Budget explains what a cheque is, the advantages it offers, discusses the safest form in which it should be worded, whether as a receipt or as an order to pay, and devotes a paragraph to the London clearing-house, of which it explains the mechanism. The want of the cheque is severely felt here sometimes, and must be a source of hourly anxiety to persons in trade. A robbery in England, unless it be that of a bank, rarely produces a large booty in cash, because persons who receive and pay away considerable sums lodge all they have at their banker's. Here the head of a mercantile establishment has a bag for his gold and a tin box for his bank-notes, and these do not quit him. At breakfast they take their place on the table beside him, at night they are locked up in the safe, and on Sundays they probably take an airing with him in the country. I have known as much as 3,000*l.* sterling carried about in this way; and in the case to which I refer the bag and tin box, fuller or emptier according to circumstances, have been thus carried about for more than twenty years. Their proprietor, being a person of remarkable good sense, appreciates the advantage, not of security—this does not seem to impress him—but of receiving interest for the money thus literally locked and tied up; but he does not adopt the system of cheques, because a majority of the persons he deals with would refuse them.

While I am writing about money, I take the opportunity of mentioning to your readers the abnormal position of the French funds, which seem unable to rise above 66, at the same time that the political prospects of Europe become every day more reassuring. Everybody knows the Crédit Mobilier, the subject of so much laudation and so much abuse, whose success cannot be denied, and whose adversaries have been reduced to questioning its continuance. The Crédit Mobilier is inimical to the monopoly of the Bank, but was naturally anxious to preserve its own monopoly, which was threatened by the projected foundation of a new company with exactly the same objects. After a year's struggle in the limbo of the Council of State, the Société Générale pour favoriser l'industrie Française has at length obtained the authorisation necessary for its constitution. It is supported by the combined forces of the principal Paris bankers, Rothschild, Pinard, Talabot, Schneider, and others, and is viewed with great alarm by the Crédit Mobilier. Its nominal capital is 120 millions of francs, of which one-half, 2,400,000*l.* sterling, will be called up. It is said that, in view of preventing the Council of State from encouraging the introduction of a scheme which would absorb so large a sum, the managers of the Crédit Mobilier have been bearing the market to make it appear that the public credit would suffer by a fresh demand for capital. The manœuvre has not succeeded in its real object, the statutes have been approved, and the 20*l.* share, 10*l.* paid up, is already at 6*l.* premium.

We have had another monster balloon, larger than Nadar's, but more fortunate than his; on three successive Sundays it has been unable to get off, so that no accident has happened. Instead of being inflated with gas, it is intended to rise from the rarefaction of the air, on the principle of the fire-balloons boys sometimes play with in England. A furnace for burning straw is suspended beneath the orifice, and below this is the car. It is the oldest system, that of Montgolfier, and has been found efficient for balloons of smaller dimensions, but it seems more difficult of application on so large a scale. On Sunday, at least, it failed for the third time, the currents of air interrupting the hot air in its ascension into the vast receptacle, and after four hours vainly waiting for the signal, the crowd beginning to lose patience, the police interfered and caused the ground to be evacuated. But for this there might have been a serious riot; hisses and whistling rose shrill and menacing, and a party of the spectators in the outer line was already discussing the plan for burning the balloon and all its belongings, when a lady who overheard them called the attention of the police to the group, on which, with telegraphic speed, a compact squad, supported by soldiers, seemed to rise from the ground, which was cleared in a few moments. I understand that it is M. Godard's intention to go up the first time the weather is favourable, without any public announcement, and then at a more settled season to give their money's worth to the ticket-holders.

The balloon did not go up; there is one of the Paris papers, the Opinion Nationale, perhaps too often quoted in my letters, which I am told threatens to break down. Like all the French papers, excepting perhaps the Siècle, its sole dependence was upon the advertisements farmed by a company which has refused to renew the arrangement. At the same time its subscribers have fallen off so alarmingly, that the manager has addressed a circular to the recalcitrants expressing his regret at the withdrawal of their subscriptions, and requesting each to state in what respect the Opinion has ceased to meet his approbation. This proceeding excites grave murmurs among literary men, who consider such an appeal derogatory to the dignity of the press. A large portion of the capital, on the strength of which the Opinion was founded, was supplied by M. Ratazzi when Prime Minister in Turin; and I am told that although it has generally been considered as the organ of the Palais Royal, it has never received pecuniary assistance from that quarter, civil speeches and dinners being more freely dispensed there than the coin of the realm.

There are rumours of renewed complications in the Danubian provinces, where Prince Couza has always had to struggle with a powerful party representing old interests and foreign sympathies. It is alleged that the Duke de Grammont, the French Ambassador at Vienna, has only come here on account of these.

France, not content with her indigenous glories, seems about to claim a share of that belonging to our own Shakspeare, or perhaps, more properly, to their 'divine Williams.' A grand banquet is to be given at the Grand Hôtel on the 23rd in his honour.

The general impression caused by the Budget is highly favourable to the preservation of peace, and notwithstanding the little cloud in the East, and the storm-mutterings in Italy, I find that there is a general feeling that the strong expressions contained in the paragraph relating to the European position of the French Empire are the strongest guarantee against the misfortunes of war.

I shall be silent on the subject of the ovations of which General Garibaldi is the hero. They afford the press here the opportunity of indulging in all manner of surmises as to the object England has in thus honouring the agitator of nationalities.

LETTER FROM HALIFAX.

Halifax, Nova Scotia: March 31, 1864.

HOW IRISHMEN ARE KIDNAPPED BY THE YANKEES—A NORTHERN ACCOUNT—THE CHESAPEAKE.

If the Palmerston-Russell Government is to remain passive while Yankee recruiting agents depopulate Ireland—if it is to suffer the Irish peasantry to be drilled upon neutral soil for service against the South—perhaps against England itself—why then, it only remains for the friends of these misguided victims of Northern greed and avarice to raise a warning voice in behalf of suffering humanity; to point out to those who still remain at home the trials and temptations, and the terrible fate in store for them on this side of the Atlantic. I beg to call public attention to the annexed article from the Boston (Mass.) Daily Courier, which gives an account of the mode in which the United States crimps try to sell Irishmen to the Yankee recruiting officers. It ought to serve as a warning to any who may be tempted to emigrate by promises of employment and high wages:—

'The Irish citizens of Charlestown and Boston have been greatly excited this week, in consequence of the arrival in Charlestown of eighty-six young Irishmen from the city of Dublin, under extraordinary circumstances. These young men, one hundred and two in all, left Liverpool on February 27, in a steamer for Portland, which reached that city on Wednesday morning, March 9. The men took an early breakfast and then landed. A few of them strayed away from their companions, but the remainder came on to Boston in the afternoon train, in charge of the emigrant agent, a Mr. Finney, under whose inducements and promises they left their homes. Upon their arrival in this city, the men were conducted to an old building on Bunker Hill Street, Charlestown, belonging to Mr. Jerome G. Kidder, of this city, formerly used for his business purposes, but now improved as a "Mission House." At this building nothing was provided for the reception of the men; no food, although they had eaten nothing since early morning, and it was now half-past 9 o'clock; no bedding, no comforts of any kind, not even straw to sleep upon. After a little while some crackers and cheese were procured, and a tub of ale was brought in, with which the wearied men sought to refresh themselves. In the morning they had whiskey for breakfast, and a number of those who partook of it were made senseless.'

'Mr. Kidder, the owner of the building, presented himself on the night of their arrival, and told the men—so it is reported by several of them—that the work they were brought over to do was not ready; but that need make no difference; they need not be idle a single day: they could enlist at once, and recommended the 28th, an Irish regiment, to them. Upon this the suspicions were confirmed which had been growing upon the men, that they had been deceived and enticed from their homes under false pretences.

'The men are fine, stalwart fellows, young mechanics, all from the city of Dublin. One of them, a young man, by the name of Ward, is a comedian, who has acted upon the Dublin boards and in the Irish provinces, in parts like those assumed by Barney Williams and Florence. Their story is, that they were induced to come to this country through the representation of this Mr. Finney, who was announced in the papers as an "emigration agent for the principal railroads in New England, who was commissioned to procure 1,000 labourers." The terms he offered them were a free passage, work immediately upon arrival, a new suit of clothes, and two pounds a month and found, for wages. Mr. Finney now declares himself to be agent for Mr. Kidder, and Mr. Kidder protests that he caused the men to be brought over here in good faith, actually and bona fidely to work upon the Charlestown Water Works, and that he was ready on Friday to take as many of the men to West Medford as would consent to go, and put them at once to work. He says, moreover, that he has no knowledge of who ordered the liquor to the men on the night of their arrival. It was certainly done without his privity.

'The condition of the men the morning after their arrival in Charlestown was anything but gratifying. Their number had already been diminished by those left behind at Portland, and of these, the recruiting agents had snapped up eight. Without money, without friends, with scanty clothing, with no means to procure sustenance, they would have suffered greatly, had not kind-hearted countrywomen supplied their wants. Recruiting agents, however, found them, and in the course of the day gobbled up several. On the evening of Thursday they had another interview with Mr. Kidder, when they were told the hall must be cleared, and they would not have had a place to lay their heads, had not Capt. John Warren, who keeps an establishment on that street, near by, bestirred himself and procured billets for them upon the neighbours round. Yesterday morning they were still in Bunker Hill Street, subsisting upon charity, and still pestered with recruiting agents. In the course of the forenoon Mr. Kidder again appeared among them, offering to take as many as would go to the water works at West Medford. But the men had lost confidence in him. They cost Mr. Kidder $70 a head to land them in Boston. It will prove a poor speculation as it has turned out. But if they had taken his recommendation on the night of their arrival, to enlist, he might have made himself whole and something more.

'The Irish citizens of Boston and vicinity, feeling indignant at the imposition practised upon their countrymen, called a meeting at the Stackpole House to investigate the facts in the case, which was very largely attended. Charles P. Donnelly, Esq. was called to the chair, and Edward Ryan was appointed Secretary.

'The Irish who attended the meeting resolved to provide for the immediate wants of the emigrants, and to do all that can be done to punish those by whom they were deceived so cruelly. The wretches calculated well that at this time of year their victims could not easily find work.'

The notorious steamer Chesapeake, under convoy of the Federal revenue cutter Miami, sailed from this port on Saturday week, and arrived at Portland, Me., on the following Monday. Her commander declined to take any passengers, and instituted a thorough search before putting to sea, for fear of larking piracy. We see by the Richmond papers that a notice from the Hon. James D. Halyburton, Judge of the District Court of the Confederate States of America, has been published in the Richmond Sentinel, Enquirer, and Examiner, calling upon the captors of the Chesapeake 'to be and appear before the said court, to be held in the city of Richmond, in the said district, on the 2nd day of March next, at twelve o'clock, noon, if that shall be a day of jurisdiction; otherwise on the next day of jurisdiction thereafter; then and there to interpose a claim for the same and to make their allegation in that behalf.'

Over at St. John's, New Brunswick, the steamers have commenced running to the States. Passengers have to submit to a most minute search before they are allowed to sail for the 'land of liberty.' Even ladies' reticules are viewed with suspicion, and visions of deadly bowie-knives, revolvers, and rifled cannon haunt the Yankee officers of these Yankee steamers by day and by night.

The news from the Confederacy is most cheering—could not be better. The people and the army are in the best of spirits, and hopeful with regard to the future. The spring campaign promises to open much earlier than it has in former seasons, and the currency is improving under the prospective operation of the new tax-bill, which goes into effect April 1.

Private letters from Richmond state that no Government property was destroyed in Kilpatrick's raid—only personal property suffered from the Northern Vandals. The Yankees were met and repulsed solely by the local defence corps, consisting of old men and beardless youths.

Arms for the Federals.—In the year 1862 no less than 196,053 rifles and muskets were shipped at Liverpool for New York, Boston, Portland, and Philadelphia; also above 34 tons of ordnance and ordnance stores, 11,947,000 percussion caps, 119 fowling pieces, 82 swords, and 28 pistols. There was no shipment of munitions of war avowedly to any Confederate port.—Times, April 13.

Northern Fanaticism.—The Boston Courier, published in the hotbed of New England Abolitionism, gives it the following unpleasant character:—'It is impossible to converse ten minutes with an average Abolitionist without being satisfied that his ruling passion is not love of liberty, or even of the negro, but hatred, dire, malignant, unrelenting hatred, of the Southern people. To ruin the objects of his mad rage, he is willing to sacrifice every interest of the country, to demoralise its population, see its best blood shed in civil strife, and its whole future mortgaged in irretrievable debt. Religion, honour, patriotism—all are swallowed up in his blind passion and hatred of his own countrymen.'

Federal Prisoners at Richmond.—We are happy to have it in our power to lay before our readers the following proof of the falsehoods of the Federal press respecting the alleged cruel treatment of their prisoners by the Confederate authorities in Richmond. It is the statement of the special artist and correspondent of the Illustrated London News, and accompanies an admirable view of the camp of Federal prisoners on Belle Isle, Richmond, in that paper of April 9:—'When I visited Belle Isle, at the latter end of January, there were more than 7,000 prisoners in the camp, all of whom were rank and file from the Federal armies of Virginia and Tennessee. The officers are confined in the "Libby," a large and well-ventilated building, formerly used as a tobacco-warehouse—since it has been found politic to separate the private soldier from his commissioned superior. At the time I mention, the Northern journals were filled with accounts of barbarities practised by the Confederates upon those whom the fate of war had placed in their hands, and I was anxious to judge for myself of the correctness of these statements. Let your readers determine from my statement whether the charge of cruelty can be established:—The rations which I saw distributed to the prisoners were in every respect the same as those issued to the Southern soldier; possibly the former may get more fresh meat, and that, I apprehend, is scarcely a ground for objection. They certainly do not get such luxuries as coffee or sugar, but then the Confederates themselves are no better off with respect to these condiments, which, indeed, are only to be procured in the Southern States at such ruinous blockade prices as to prevent their finding their way into the commissariat of the Southern army. The doctor's report, on the day I visited the island, will also serve to indicate that the treatment to which the prisoners are subjected is not such as to affect their health. I am convinced your readers will be astounded when I tell them that, out of 7,000 of these cruelly-used captives, the sick-list only gave thirteen in hospital. Why, I have known, in one morning's report, as many as seventy-five or a hundred to be returned as unfit for duty out of a skeleton brigade of 1,500 in Bragg's army. After six months' confinement of these Federal prisoners at Belle Isle, there were only seventy-five graves to indicate the number of those who had died under the privations to which they are said to have been subjected. Any Adjutant-General of a division of 5,000 men in Lee's army could show a very different bill of mortality from sickness and hardship embracing a corresponding period. I think that these statements should go a great way to disprove the charges made by the Northern press. The Northern journals have undoubtedly been misinformed in this particular, and it is only an act of justice on my part to dispel from your readers' minds any wrong impressions they may have formed as to the treatment which the Federal prisoners meet with at the hands of the Confederates.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

Our friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through Henry Hotze, Esq., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 30s.; payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. Hopkins, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

The Index may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. Hutton, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.

At Manchester, F. A. Hasleham, Esq. Manchester Southern Club Office, Market Street.

At Paris, to Messrs. Pfeiffer & Muller, 52 Rue du Château d'Eu, Paris.

At Turin, to Sr. Filippo Manetta, 4 Borgo Nuovo.

At St. Thomas (West Indies), to C. W. White, Esq.

Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund.—In our last number the name of Messrs. Thomas Littledale & Co., who have given 50*l.* to the fund, was printed as 'Messrs. Thomas Settledale & Co.'

Forgery as a Weapon of Diplomacy.

Whether in private or public affairs, in matters of law or diplomacy, a resort to forgery is considered by the mass of mankind as the confession of an intrinsically bad cause by whomsoever it may be employed. The instincts of men naturally lead them to reject even truthful testimony in favour of an accused individual who is convicted of introducing false testimony in his defence. If the Confederate States Government could have been placed as an individual upon trial before an English jury for criminal complicity in the violation of the British Foreign Enlistment Act, under charges submitted by the United States Government, we cannot doubt but that the mere fact of the forgery of the pretended Mallory Report would have induced the immediate acquittal of the defendant, and entailed against the latter a bill of indictment for a far more criminal offence against the law than that with which the Confederacy was charged. If the pretended Mallory Report was the only instance in which the United States Government had employed, even if they had not themselves wrought out and fashioned, the rankest forgery as an implement of diplomatic warfare against the Confederacy, a lenient friend of their cause might perhaps seek to palliate the offence against morality upon the plea of indiscretion under a pressing need, and not again to be repeated. But, unfortunately for the reputation of the Federal Government, the isolated case referred to is but one of many instances in which similar means have been resorted to to bolster up their cause. The business of forgery seems to have been reduced to a system, to be employed in all cases where other testimony is wanting. It is practiced alike by the Government in its diplomatic intercourse to operate upon opinion in other nations, and by the leaders of the American press and people when they desire to deceive their fellow-countrymen. The intelligent public of Europe and America will bear us witness that we neither misstate nor exaggerate the lamentable truth. A simple statement of the fact itself conveys a degree of censure upon the enemies of the Confederacy which could not be heightened by any language of denunciation which might be employed to characterise such conduct. When, therefore, we quote the words of Earl Russell in the House of Lords, announcing, upon the confession of Mr. Seward, that the pretended Mallory Report was 'altogether a forgery,' we may without further comment pass on to the consideration of a more recent case of a similar character, equally criminal, more barefaced, and still more compromising to the United States Government, because its own recognised officials are the pretended discoverers.

The Parliamentary papers recently published in reference to the seizure of the United States steamer Chesapeake furnish us in full detail with the progressive steps taken by the United States Government to impose once more upon the too easy credulity of the British Government, by the disclosure of another pretended intercepted Confederate despatch. Even if Lord Lyons had not been once before so egregiously duped by the employment of a similar artifice, the ready credence which he gave to Mr. Seward's marvellous disclosures cannot but afford occasion for extreme surprise. In No. 4 of the Parliamentary publication referred to, Lord Lyons, upon the authority of Mr. Seward, discloses to Earl Russell, in a grave and earnest manner, the thread of discoveries which, crowned by information derived from an intercepted despatch of a Confederate agent, proved beyond question the imminence of an invasion of Nova Scotia by the Confederates, and the probable rescue of the steamer Chesapeake. Lord Lyons does not seem to have been at all impressed with the ludicrous conception of a Southern raid with a thousand rifled muskets upon the North American possessions of Her Majesty. He does not even seem to have enquired of Mr. Seward how he was able to decipher with such marvellous celerity and certainty the cabalistic characters of a despatch written in cipher; for he forthwith despatched a telegram to General Doyle at Halifax, informing him of the imminent danger with which Nova Scotia was menaced by the rebellious South, and asking, at the special request of Mr. Seward, if it would not be better to turn over the Chesapeake to the United States claimants, to avoid the contingency of the threatened rescue.

The communication made by Mr. Seward to Lord Lyons was to the effect that the Confederate despatch referred to had been intercepted by the Postmaster at New York, and had been by him translated, 'with the exception of some of the proper names,' and transmitted to the State Department. Unfortunately for the bungling originators of this ridiculous forgery, they managed somehow or another to decipher the name of Mr. Slidell as one of the parties to the meditated invasion of Nova Scotia, and a correspondent upon this very subject with the reputed writer of the intercepted paper. It is almost needless to say, by way of disproving that which upon its very face disproves itself, that Mr. Slidell pronounces the whole affair, so far as his knowledge goes, to be an arrant forgery out and out from beginning to end.

How long may the British Government be expected to tolerate the practice of such repeated deceptions without inflicting some rebuke, if for no other object than in vindication of its own outraged dignity? It is bad enough to be made the victim of an innocent and unintended deception; but when the proof is palpable that the practice of forgery, or, what is equally culpable, the employment of forged papers, is thus reduced to a system, it is difficult to imagine how the British Government can maintain its self-respect, and allow such a violation of diplomatic propriety, not to apply the harsher epithets which more properly describe such conduct. The patient and uncomplaining submission of the Government to these repeated attempts to betray it into a false position by such scandalous means, is scarcely less surprising than that, in the consideration of matters thus suggested, the object seems rather to appease the Government of the United States than to ask redress for outrages committed against the rights of British subjects and British territory. Even the kindly-disposed Lord Lyons, whose heart seems always to be overflowing with gentle affection for Mr. Seward and the Government to which he is accredited, and who, though often duped, is ever ready to confide again, cannot restrain himself from giving expression to his indignation when writing about the outrages of the Federals. We can almost imagine at times that we discover flashes of the spirit of the ancient Briton in the complaisant representative of Her Majesty at the Court of President Lincoln, when for a moment he chances to glance at the indignities which have been offered to his own country and countrymen. Even he, though a warm partisan of the United States Government, expresses himself, in this very matter of the Chesapeake, in a manner which proves the marvellous endurance of wrong and outrage which has ever characterised the conduct of the British Government in its intercourse with the United States. 'The details of the events,' wrote Lord Lyons to Earl Russell, under date December 29, 1863, 'which grew out of the arrival of the Chesapeake in the waters of that province [Nova Scotia] have been brought to my knowledge for the first time by these papers. I had not been without misgivings, but I confess that I was by no means prepared to learn that the violation of the territorial rights of Great Britain by the United States naval officers had been so flagrant and so serious, or the proceedings of those officers so violent and so unjustifiable, as they are now shown to have been. Mr. Seward was absent from Washington when the papers reached me, and he has not yet returned. He is expected to-morrow, and I shall, without a moment's loss of time, confer with him upon the intelligence I have received. . . . The question which now remains is the nature and extent of the reparation due from the Government of the United States for the wrong committed by its officers.'

Thus, with just indignation, wrote the long-patient Lord Lyons, under the influence of that proud spirit which is regarded as a characteristic of the true Briton. Upon reading this paragraph we hailed it as the incipient roar of the long-hunted Lion of England, who, having at length resolved to retire no longer, at last turns upon his pursuers. The grievous wrongs and insults are not any longer a matter of doubt, and patient endurance is no longer a virtue. To avenge the insult, and to redress the wrong, are duties which may be no longer evaded or postponed; and the representative of England's majesty only improves the time occupied by the absence of Mr. Seward from Washington in meditating upon the extent of the demand he should make upon the Government of the United States for the wrongs committed. We could not but feel that the Government of Great Britain had at last through its accredited agent resolved to vindicate the honour of the British nation. Alas! the next sentence of the despatch dispelled at once the pleasing but transitory illusion. The roaring of the Lyons was acknowledged to be only by sufferance, and the indignant determination to demand redress for grievous and admitted wrongs was only the result of a previous agreement and understanding with Mr. Seward; for, said His Lordship in continuation, 'Mr. Seward announced beforehand, in his note of the 18th of this month, that if any authority had been assumed by any officers within the waters or on the soil of Nova Scotia, the Government of the United States would at once express its profound regret, and be ready to make amends which would be entirely satisfactory.' Sic transeunt—the glorious illusions which, originating in the earlier paragraphs of this indignant protest against the acts of the wrong-doer, were destined to be dissipated for ever by a perusal of its closing words, to which we have nothing to add: 'The case being in this position, I think that it is prudent, and that it is due to Mr. Seward, that I should discuss the matter with him in a friendly and confidential manner before taking any further steps with regard to it.'

Garibaldi in England.

Where everybody is shouting and throwing his cap in the air, it seems churlish to keep a sullen silence, or to sermonise on the ephemeral character of popular caprices. It is far easier and pleasanter to move along with the crowd than to be elbowed and knocked over in the vain attempt to stand still or to get out of it. In the present case, however, there are certain grave reasons why we cannot adopt the pleasanter and safer course; but while we do not join as heartily as we might wish in the universal enthusiasm, we shall endeavour to make our solitary note of dissent as little discordant as possible. At this moment England is Garibaldi-mad. All our contemporaries, great and small, unite in chanting a pæan of praise to the Italian hero. Even the most staid and least excitable among them fill their columns with adulatory phrases. We are told, on the authority of the leading journal, that the crowd which welcomed the revolutionary chieftain was scarcely exceeded in numbers by that which did homage to the coming bride of the heir-apparent of the throne; and if we are to gather our impressions from the descriptions of enthusiastic reporters, Britannia has indeed received her guest with regal, perhaps more than regal, honours. We hope to be pardoned if all this appears to us of ill-omen for Garibaldi's permanent popularity. It reminds us involuntarily of spectacles too frequently witnessed on the other side of the Atlantic, where a king-hating democracy compensates itself for the absence of royal pageantry, and gratifies the natural love of show and demonstration, by worshipping noisily the idol of an hour. Englishmen have made great progress, within the present generation, thanks to a cheap and ubiquitous press, towards becoming 'Americanised,' or rather 'Yankeeised,' in this respect; and if they have not, Heaven be praised, reached that point when an opera-singer, a troop of cross-eyed Asiatics, or the marriage of a dwarf, stirs the popular heart to its deepest depths, and if they still select the objects of their hero-worship with better taste and more discrimination, there is, nevertheless, sufficient resemblance between what passes here and what so often happens in New York, to make the comparison 'odious,' or, at least, disagreeably suggestive. There is an unvarying diagnosis to all such mental epidemics. They always last precisely in inverse proportion to their violence. They are always succeeded by something akin to the reaction of a surfeited appetite, and a brilliant popularity which might have lasted a lifetime is thus often consumed, within a few days or hours, to mere cinders. Poor Kossuth was so sacrificed to a popular gratification in this country and in America, and his fate might well warn Garibaldi's friends. 'Lionised to death' is, in such circumstances, something more than a figurative expression. Most short-lived celebrities deserve their doom, but when that doom overtakes a truly great man, it is melancholy. It then seems as if he were made to assist, while living, at his own funeral obsequies.

Let us not be accused of grudging the Italian guest the honours that are being paid him here. If these honours are rendered to noble, though often mistaken purpose—to patriotic devotion—to lofty but unselfish ambition—then he fully deserves them. When that is said, all is said. As a man and a patriot, Garibaldi occupies the highest niche in the temple of Fame; as a statesman or as a captain, the truest kindness to him is to abstain from criticism. We believe him to have been the providentially appointed instrument for a great purpose almost miraculously achieved; but that purpose achieved, we also believe that his destiny is fulfilled, and his mission ended. We may respect him for his own moral goodness and heroic temper of soul, but we cannot respect the school of politics to which he belongs, or the associations which belong to that school—the worst of Connental heresies, and the most in antipathy to British instincts. It is partly Garibaldi's own fault, but more that of his career, that we cannot publicly dissociate him from Mazzini, from conspiracies, civil strife, and European conflagrations. Once in a while, at long intervals in history, a meteor flashes across the dazzled vision of mankind; once in a while a volcanic shock accomplishes what centuries of toil have failed to do, and a great crime becomes an heroic deed. But these are not the normal agencies which do the work of social and political regeneration. Such qualities as Garibaldi has, self-sacrifice and steadfastness, go indeed far towards it; but to make them fruitful of good instead of a danger of evil, it requires furthermore patience, obedience to authority, reverence for constituted order, and greater faith in Divine than in human wisdom.

Garibaldi, when we separate the man from the idea which he embodies, represents, in its most seductive and therefore most dangerous form, that destructive principle which aims at reforming the world by first returning it to original chaos. An adventurous life, a utopian disposition, one wonderful success, have invested him with that melodramatic character and theatrical splendour which most readily captivate the imaginations of the multitude. A hero of the genuine Anglo-Saxon type seldom possesses these attractive attributes. The constructive genius, which knows no higher law than duty, which seeks to evolve liberty from discipline and subordination, which patiently commits the seed to the soil, and is content to await its natural growth—this genius, which, with the less imaginative races, governs as well as conquers empires, is usually incorporated in sterner and sometimes unlovable moulds. In the list of England's great men there are many greater and wiser than he, and as brave; but few, if any, of that list could have evoked such spontaneous and cordial enthusiasm in their own, much less in a foreign country. Only, while obeying the impulse of doing homage, in the man, to the rarer and nobler qualities of our nature, let us beware lest we appear abroad to give deliberate sanction and bodily substance to the dreams of the visionary. It may be admirable diplomacy to play off Garibaldi against Austria and Prussia, to inspire them with a wholesome dread of danger while devouring their Danish prey; but the revolutionary element in Europe has other enemies besides Austria and Prussia; and it is, to say the least, an open question whether the sort of court English public men are now markedly paying its representative may not embolden it to attempt mischief which would occasion nowhere more sincere regret than in England.

It is a thankless task to say these things at this moment. A short time hence everybody will think of them, and many will say them. If we say them a little earlier, it is because we have had peculiar cause to be reminded of them. As a journal, our best efforts have been devoted, and will continue to be devoted, to advocate the cause of a nationality which has at least equal claims to respect with any that heroes ever bled and died for. This fact has given us an inexpressibly warm and sympathising interest in the trials and struggles of a country endeavouring to consolidate a nationality but partially achieved; and it is only fair to add that, with the exception of England, nowhere have the just rights of the Southern States found more able and effective advocacy than in Italy. Now, we firmly believe that, great as are the services Garibaldi has rendered to his native country in the past, she has in the present more to fear than to hope from his sincere but mistaken zeal. Furthermore, we cannot forget that this same great champion of oppressed nationalities, when applied to by a Yankee official to take service in the army of which Butler, McNeil, and Turchin are fitting ornaments, did not spurn the offer with indignation, but gratefully acknowledged the compliment while declining solely on the ground of nearer engagements. On another occasion he apostrophised Abraham Lincoln as 'the steersman of liberty,' and likened John Brown, the Kansas ruffian, to Our Saviour. We are charitable enough to regard such vagaries as errors of judgment only, and as the faults, not so much of Garibaldi, as of the school to which he belongs, and which, in the professed name of philanthropy, preaches bloodshed and extermination. But we think we have sufficiently, and yet without needless offence, alleged our reasons for not joining without large reservations in the enthusiasm which welcomes Garibaldi as no stranger was ever welcomed on the shores of Britain.

Advance of the Southern Armies.

The Confederate army has resumed the offensive. As yet, the programme of the campaign is involved in mystery. The movements of troops are unintelligibly reported, and it is only the 'raiders' who are heard of. But it is clear that a comprehensive plan of operations is on the point of being carried out; and that the Northern leaders, instead of continuing their advance into the heart of the Confederacy, will have to fight hard to hold their present ground. So many thousands of miles away from the theatre of the war, with the authorities at Richmond suppressing any information that might be useful to the enemy, and the bureaux at Washington inventing war news to order, it is a venturesome thing to attempt to foreshadow the course of the coming struggle. Still, there are not wanting indications of the real designs of the Confederate leaders, and from these we gather that the great conflict of the next few months will be for the possession of Eastern Tennessee. At no period since the day after the battle of Chicamauga Creek were the prospects of recovering Eastern Tennessee from the invader more favourable, and we think it may be inferred from all our recent information that the task of driving back the army of the Cumberland beyond the Ohio will be once more essayed. Sherman's late advance across Mississippi has taught, both to North and South, a useful lesson. It has given the North an idea of the peril and the absurdity of marching an army 500 miles through an enemy's country without supplies or the means of transport, without rivers and gunboats to fall back upon. It has given the South fresh confidence in one of her chief defences; the enormous extent of her territory has relieved her from all apprehension of an attack upon the Cotton States from Vicksburg, and has enabled her to draw away portions of her forces which might otherwise be still employed in guarding the western frontier of Alabama from attack. The earliest visible effect of Sherman's failure is Forrest's rapid dash across Western Tennessee into Kentucky. The last we heard of Forrest's gallant troops was their pursuit of General Smith's discomfited cavalry column almost into the streets of Memphis. 2,500 of the Southern cavalry had checked, stopped, and finally beaten back, with heavy loss, a force of treble its own number. Not waiting idly in the outskirts of Memphis, Forrest has now pushed boldly into what may almost be called for the time Union territory, and captured Paducah, a great depôt of Northern supplies on the confluence of the Tennessee and Mississippi rivers, picking up on his way the Federal garrison of 500 men at Union City, Western Tennessee. The Northern papers say that he was shelled out of Paducah by the Federal gunboats. But it is preposterous to suppose that Forrest intended to do more than surprise the town and carry off the supplies stored up there. He is next heard of within eight miles of Columbus, which is, however, too strong a position for Confederate cavalry to carry. His object will have been attained if he draws away a large force into Western Kentucky and succeeds in getting off with his booty. But Kentucky is threatened in another quarter. A considerable body of Confederate troops was concentrated, according to the last accounts, at Pound Gap on the Kentucky-Virginia frontier. The only object of this gathering can be the invasion of Kentucky and the interruption of the direct line of communication with the Federal army at Knoxville. There are large depôts scattered about Kentucky which will be exceedingly useful to the Confederates for the coming campaign. There is an abundance of recruiting material available. But, above all, these incursions in the rear of the far-advanced outposts of the Northern army, Chattanooga and Knoxville, will seriously jeopardise the whole Federal position, and greatly facilitate any offensive movements that may be contemplated by Johnston or Longstreet.

It would seem, indeed, that the advance of Forrest into Kentucky and the concentration of troops at Pound Gap are parts of the grand scheme for the ejection of the Federals from Tennessee. Simultaneously with these we hear of Johnston closing up towards Ringgold, of General Polk reinforcing him with troops from Alabama and Mississippi, and of the appearance of Longstreet's cavalry at Marietta, Georgia, on the road to Dalton. If it be true that Longstreet has turned up again in Georgia, we may be quite sure that a great and decisive action will shortly be fought somewhere between Dalton and Chattanooga. It will be remembered that, previously to the battle of Chicamauga Creek, Longstreet's division found its way to Bragg's army by the same circuitous route which it is now reported to have taken. Then its arrival was the signal for an attack; and if Longstreet be really in the neighbourhood of Dalton, General Thomas will not be allowed much more rest at Ringgold. We confess, however, we have some doubt about Longstreet's junction with the army of Georgia. His withdrawal so far South would leave the South-western frontier of Virginia dangerously exposed to an incursion from Knoxville, and would enable the Federals to drive farther in the wedge intended to isolate Virginia from the rest of the Confederacy. Moreover, supposing there be any foundation for the report that Grant contemplates a combined movement upon Richmond from all sides, Longstreet's division could hardly be spared by Lee. The latter General must be much stronger than he is alleged to be if he can spare so powerful an auxiliary force at this juncture. Still, the Confederate authorities may be in possession of information that Grant cannot move forward for another month or two, and may have intended to strike a crushing blow in the South-west at once. What the strength of the Federal army at Ringgold and Chattanooga is we cannot even approximately estimate. We know it has been weakened by the retirement of whole regiments of three-years' service men, and that there has been much sickness in its ranks. If Johnston be reinforced by Longstreet and Polk, his whole force will probably not be far inferior to the army under General Thomas, and we need not fear the result. Under any circumstances no Federal advance is likely to take place from Chattanooga. With Sherman's forces occupied on the Red River, with Forrest in Kentucky, and civil war in Illinois, no aid can be forthcoming for General Thomas. He is clearly in no position to take the initiative now. The next month or six weeks will show us whether he is able to hold his ground in the face of a determined attempt by General Johnston to dislodge him.

From Virginia nothing more is heard of the threatening movements reported a week ago. All is quiet along the Rappahannock. General Grant is busy reorganising the army of the Potomac and getting rid of dangerous candidates for the Presidency. His latest move is, it is said, to recall Fremont and M'Clellan to active service and give them new commands, the object of the movement being doubtless to remove them from President Lincoln's path. M'Clellan's candidature is somewhat popular; but 'honest Abe Lincoln' will contrive to employ him in some post where his military talents may be serviceable to the country without alarming the present occupant of the White House. And thus the three formidable opponents, Grant, Fremont, and M'Clellan, are shelved. When these politico-military promotions have been made, Grant will, we suppose, make his final move upon Richmond. His arrival at Fortress Monroe looks as if the old route up the York Town Peninsula were to be tried again, simultaneously with a direct attack from the north; and Fremont's and M'Clellan's appointments may be connected with this new arrangement. In the meantime, it is not impossible that he may be anticipated by Lee, and that his combinations may be spoiled by another of those flank movements which have so often disconcerted the Federal commanders, and thrown President Lincoln into paroxysms of alarm for the safety of Washington.

MORE FEDERAL FORGERIES.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—In looking over the Parliamentary Papers, 'North America, 1864, No. 9, relating to the seizure of the Chesapeake,' I find another gross forgery, which should be exposed in connection with the famous 'Report' of Mr. Mallory. You will perceive to what I refer by turning to page 8, Lord Lyons's Despatch to Earl Russell; page 9, Translation of a pretended Letter in cypher from a Confederate Agent to Mr. Benjamin; page 27, Letter from General Doyle to the Duke of Newcastle, and Mr. Gunnison, United States' Vice-Consul at Halifax, to Mr. Tupper. The forgery ought to have been patent to any one who did not wish to be deceived; but you may denounce it as such on my authority, since I am mentioned by name as cognisant of the facts stated in the pretended letter.

Yours, &c.,

John Slidell.

19 Rue de Marignan, Paris, April 11.

We subjoin the passages referred to in Mr. Slidell's letter. It will be observed that they directly connect the Federal Government with the forgery, through its Secretary of State, the Postmaster in New York, the War Office, and its Consular Agent at Halifax,

Page 8.—On December 24, 1863, Lord Lyons writes to Earl Russell:—

'Mr. Seward then gave me a paper, a copy of which forms Inclosure No. 3 in this despatch. It was, he said, the decipher of a letter from a Confederate agent at New York to Mr. Benjamin, the Secretary of State at Richmond. Some of the proper names were, he observed, undecipherable, but the rest of the letter had been made out, and it showed that there were plots to seize two other steamers besides the Chesapeake, and to make use of the neighbouring British territory to further the nefarious designs of the enemy.

'Mr. Seward went on to say that the statement in the letter that a large number of rifled muskets had been sent to Halifax, and other facts which had come to his knowledge, made him apprehensive that the Chesapeake might not be safe at that place. He begged me to warn the authorities, and to ask whether the vessel would be made over at once to her owners if they applied for her with the sanction of the United States' Government. In consequence of this request, I despatched to Major-General Doyle a telegram.

'Mr. Seward said that the plots to get possession of United States' steam-packets by sending Confederate emissaries on board them in United States' ports in the guise of passengers rendered it necessary to take extraordinary precautions at the ports, and to enforce restrictions there which might, he feared, cause some inconvenience to foreigners as well as to Americans, but the matter was too urgent and too important to admit of the neglect of any means of frustrating the nefarious designs which had been conceived.'

In addition to this verbal representation to the British Minister at Washington, Mr. Seward sets his Consular Agent at work to frighten the colonial authorities. Consequently, Mr. Gunnison writes to Mr. Tupper:—

'MR. GUNNISON TO MR. TUPPER.

'Consulate of the United States,
'Halifax, Nova Scotia,
'December 23, 1863.

'Sir,—I beg to inform the Government of this province that I have received information from my Government of the fact that 1,000 rifles have been shipped from New York to Nova Scotia by the rebel agents for rebel purposes in Halifax. The fact is reported to me as certain.

'I beg to call the attention of the Government to the matter, and request that such steps be taken by the proper authorities for the seizure of these arms.

'I would further say, that I have reason to fear the re-seizure of the Chesapeake by the pirates and their abettors in this province.—I have, &c.

'(Signed) N. Gunnison, Vice-Consul.'

It is much to the credit of General Doyle that under the combined influence of the Consular warning and Lord Lyons's telegram, he did not lose his head and restore the ship without delay to the claimants and the protection of the United States Government. He contents himself with informing the Duke of Newcastle of the alarming state of affairs:

'Government House, Halifax, Nova Scotia,
'December 24.

'At the same time I received a second despatch (from Lord Lyons) dated December 22, informing me that the United States' Government had intercepted a letter, which had excited apprehensions that the Chesapeake would be seized in this port by Confederates, and enquiring when this Government would give her up to the owners on the requisition of the United States' Government.

'To this I replied by telegram, that my Government had decided to put the Chesapeake into the Court of Vice-Admiralty, and that she could only be given up upon the order of that Court, but that proper precautions had been taken for her safety.'

Last, but not least, we present our readers with the 'intercepted' document itself, as we find it on page 9, forming Inclosure No. 3 of Lord Lyons's despatch:—

'Office of United States' Military Telegraph, War Department,
'Washington, December 21, 1863.

'Translation of a Letter in cypher forwarded to the Secretary of War by Postmaster Wakeman, New York City.

'New York, December 18, 1863.

'—— is here. The two steamers will leave here about Christmas. Lamar and Boners left here viâ Bermuda two weeks ago. The 1,000 rifled muskets came duly to hand, and were shipped to Halifax as instructed. We will be able to seize the other two steamers as per programme.

'—— has followed the President's orders. We will have —— under arrest before this reaches you; cost—000 dollars.

'We want more money. How shall we draw?

'Bills all forwarded to Slidell, and receipts received.

FEDERAL RECRUITING IN LANCASHIRE.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—In the Manchester Courier of this morning, I met with the following astonishing paragraph; and considering the statements contained in it were made at a meeting of the Central Executive Committee, their general accuracy can scarcely be doubted.

'At the meeting of the Central Relief Committee in this city on Monday, Mr. Thomas Ashton made a most important statement. He said he had been informed 'by persons upon whose testimony he could rely' that persons representing themselves as agents from some of the mills in America were engaging people here for factory work in those mills. Every man so engaged received a certain sum to defray the cost of outfit and passage money, and had to sign an agreement binding him to repay the advance within a period of ninety days, or, in other words, in about two months after his arrival in America. 'On stringent measures being adopted to enforce repayment, the emigrants who had not then saved sufficient money were induced or compelled to enlist in the army.' This is a sufficiently wicked device, but what follows is still worse. 'This system was at first tried with single men, but, as many of them contrived in some way to raise the amount of their individual expenses, it was now being applied to married men, with families of children over ten years of age, whose emigration expenses were much larger; consequently men so situated had scarcely any prospect before them but enlistment, when pressing demands were made for repayment of the emigration loans.' No one, we suppose, will deny that the Government is bound to cause investigation to be made into the facts here represented. They present the system of enticing people from this country in its worst and most odious aspect. The war has evidently worn out the courage, the patriotism, and the endurance of the subjects of the Federal States; and now the plan is, by dint of the most unscrupulous means, to entrap the bone and sinew of the 'old country' into going over and fighting the battle for them. If Lord Russell has no longer any terrors for the Federal Government, surely he and his colleagues can devise some plan to prevent British subjects from being ensnared to their ruin in this infamous manner.'

I am, Sir,
Yours respectfully,
Manchester: April 6. English.

Confederate Official Documents.

A BILL TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.

Whereas, the Confederate States are engaged in a war, upon the successful issue of which depend the integrity of their social system, the form of their civilisation, the security of life and property within their limits, as well as their existence as sovereign and independent States; And whereas, the condition of the contest demands that they should call into requisition whatever resources of men and money they have for the support of their cause, to faithfully administer the same: Therefore, as a part of the system of the public defence:—

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the exportation of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, and rice, from the Confederate States, and from all places in the occupation of their troops, is prohibited, except under such uniform regulations as shall be made by the President of the Confederate States.

Sec. 2. That if any person, or persons, shall put, place, or load on board any ship, steamboat, or vessel, or any other water craft, or into any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for conveyance or transportation beyond the Confederate States, or into any portion of said States occupied by the enemy, any of the articles mentioned in the first section of this act, or shall collect the same for the purpose of being conveyed or transported, contrary to the prohibition aforesaid, within the Confederate States, or beyond them, the said articles, and the ship, boat, or other water craft, wagon, carriage, or other vehicle, with the slaves and animals that may be employed or collected for the purpose of aiding therein, shall be forfeited, and all persons, their aiders and abettors, on conviction of being interested or concerned in the enterprise, shall be deemed to be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punishable by such fine or imprisonment, or both, as the court may impose.

Sec. 3. That it shall not be lawful to put on board any ship, boat, vessel, or other water craft, or upon any wagon, cart, carriage, or other vehicle, for transportation or conveyance as aforesaid, any of the articles aforesaid, unless a permit be previously obtained from some officer of the Confederate States specially authorised to grant the same, particularly describing the articles thus to be laden, and the ship, boat, vessel, water craft, wagon, carriage, cart, or other vehicle, on which the same is to be transported, and until bond shall be given that the same shall be conveyed and transported to the place of destination under such conditions and regulations, and for such objects, as shall be prescribed by the President under the first section of this act.

Sec. 4. That the collectors of all the districts of the Confederate States, and such other officers as may be designated by the President of the Confederate States, shall have power and authority to take into their custody any of the articles before mentioned found on any ship, boat, or other water craft, when there is reason to believe that they are intended for exportation, or when in vessels, carts, or wagons, or any other carriage or vehicle whatsoever, or in any manner, apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or towards the territory of the Confederate States in the occupation of the United States, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place whence such articles are intended to be exported, and not to permit the same to be removed until bond shall be given, with satisfactory sureties, that no violation of this act, and the regulations under the same, is intended.

Sec. 5. That the powers granted by this act to the revenue or other officers of the Confederate States under this act to allow or refuse exportation of the articles before mentioned, or for the seizure or detention of any of the said articles, shall be exercised in conformity with such instructions as the President may give through the Departments of War and of the Treasury, which instructions may impose conditions as to the destination and sale of the same, and the investment of the proceeds of the same, or a portion thereof, in military or other supplies for the public service, which instructions such officers shall be bound to obey; and if any action or suit shall be brought against any such officer or officers, or their agents, he or they may plead the general issue, and upon proof of a compliance with the provisions of this act, or with the regulations and instructions of the President, he or they shall be absolved from all responsibility therefor; and any person aggrieved by any of the acts of any of the officers or agents aforesaid, may file his petition before the district court of the district in which such officer or agent resides, and after due notice to him, and to the district attorney, the said court may proceed summarily to hear and determine thereupon as law and justice may require, and the judgment of the said court and the reasons therefor shall be filed among the records of the court, and in case any release shall be granted, the judge may impose such conditions as to giving bond and security as may, in his opinion, be necessary to secure this act from violation, and, in case of refusal, may impose double or treble costs upon the petitioner if circumstances warrant: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account.

Sec. 6. That exclusive jurisdiction is conferred upon the district courts of the Confederate States of all suits or actions that may arise under this act in behalf of the Confederate States, its officers and agents, for the recovery of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed in the same, by indictment, information, or action, according to the practice of the court, and the distribution of the penalties and fines shall be made under and according to the laws now in force for violation of the revenue acts, and all laws for the mitigation and remittance of penalties and forfeitures shall be applied in similar cases.

Sec. 7. That it shall be lawful for the President, or such officers as he may designate, to employ any portion of the military or naval force of the Confederacy or of the militia, to prevent the illegal departure of any ship, vessel, or other water craft, for detaining, taking possession of, and keeping in custody the same, or any wagon, cart, or other vehicle heretofore mentioned, their teams and drivers, and their products aforesaid, and to suppress and disperse any assembly of persons who may resist the execution of this act, or oppose the fulfilment, by the officers, of the duties imposed by the same.

Sec. 8. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

Approved, February 6, 1864.

OFFICIAL REGULATIONS TO CARRY INTO EFFECT THE ACT 'TO IMPOSE REGULATIONS UPON THE FOREIGN COMMERCE OF THE CONFEDERATE STATES, TO PROVIDE FOR THE PUBLIC DEFENCE.'

I.—As to the Sea.

1. The owners of any vessel intending to sail from a Confederate port with a cargo consisting in whole or in part of cotton, tobacco, military and naval stores, sugar, molasses, or rice, shall, before the lading on board of any of such articles, file with the collector of the port from which the vessel is to sail a copy of her register, with a declaration of the names of the owners and officers thereof, the place of their birth, and of their residence for the preceding year, together with the port or place to which the said vessel proposes to sail. The said declaration shall also set forth the quantity and value, in Confederate currency, of the cargo proposed to be taken out, as also the consent of the said owners, that one-half of the tonnage of the said vessel may be employed by the Confederate Government for its own use, both on the outward and homeward voyage, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned. The collector shall submit a statement as to the owners and officers to the military commandant of the port, and if he shall not object to their loyalty, or to the sailing of the vessel for reasons of military necessity, the collector shall grant a permit for the lading of the said vessel, one-half for account of the owners, and one-half for account of the Confederate States.

2. Before the said lading shall be completed, the owners of the vessel shall execute to the Confederate States a bond in double the value of the vessel, with security deemed adequate by the collector, conditioned that she will pursue the voyage designated, and that she will return with reasonable despatch to a Confederate port after her outward cargo shall be discharged, with a cargo consisting one-half of articles not prohibited by the laws of the Confederate Government, and the other half of such articles as the Government shall offer for shipment from such port, at the rate of freight hereinafter mentioned.

3. Each shipper of any portion of the cargo proposed to be laden on board the said vessel shall, before the lading thereof, make application to the collector for a permit to lade the same, which application shall declare the articles to be shipped, and the quantity and value thereof in Confederate currency, the port of destination, and the name of the consignee. A permit shall then be granted by the collector if the application is deemed satisfactory. The lading shall be had under the inspection of a revenue officer, who shall be charged with the duty of seeing that the goods laden conform to the permit.

4. Before the completion of the lading on board, or the granting a clearance, each shipper of any portion of the cargo shall execute and deliver to the collector a bond to the Confederate States, in double the value of his shipment in Confederate money, with security deemed adequate by the collector, with condition that at least one-half the net proceeds of said shipment shall be invested in goods or articles not prohibited by law, and that the said goods or articles shall be shipped by the same, or some other vessel, to the Confederate States within 60 days from the unlading of said cargo; or that the said half of the net proceeds shall be paid in coin or sterling exchange to the proper agent of the Confederate States, to be reimbursed to the shipper by the delivery to him of cotton at the port of departure in the Confederate States, at the rate of 10*d.* sterling per lb. for middling uplands.

5. The freight to be paid by the Confederate States on all cotton and tobacco shipped from a Confederate port shall be 5*d.* sterling per lb., payable on delivery at the port of destination, in coin or sterling exchange. Return freight shall be at the rate of 25*l.* per ton, payable on its delivery in the Confederate port, in cotton at 10*d.* sterling per lb. for middling uplands, and at a proportionate price for cotton of other qualities. In calculating the ton of freight by weight, 2,240 lbs. shall be allowed; by measure, 40 cubic feet shall be allowed.

6. If the outward-bound vessel shall consent, at the request of the Government, to take two-thirds her cargo for account of the Confederate States, the outward freight shall be 6*d.* sterling per lb.; and whenever the Government is not prepared to fill up any portion of the tonnage reserved for its use at the time at which any vessel may be made ready to sail, the owners may fill up the same on their own account; but no vessel shall, without consent of the Government, sail on her outward voyage until one-third of her cargo shall be laden for the use of the Government.

7. The rates of freight for articles other than cotton and tobacco shall be adjusted at the same relative rate, and be payable in the same way.

8. The Government reserves the right to limit or prohibit the shipment of resin, turpentine, or any manufacture thereof, whenever deemed dangerous to its own shipment.

9. Upon the completion of the lading of the vessel, and before receiving her clearance, there shall be delivered to the collector, in addition to the usual manifest, another, setting forth the names, ages, and description of her officers and crew, and of every passenger intending to sail in her. The said last-mentioned manifest shall be delivered to the commandant of the port, who shall thereupon cause the entire vessel to be searched, and if satisfied that the parties on board are persons who may safely be permitted to leave the Confederacy, and that the passengers have the proper passports, he shall certify the same on the manifest, and return the same to the collector, whereupon, and not before, a clearance shall be granted to the vessel, and she shall be permitted to sail.

10. The owners of each vessel, and of each portion of a cargo sailing from a Confederate port, shall be allowed to take up their respective bonds, by producing to the collector the certificate of the proper agent of the Confederate Government at the port of delivery, setting forth the particulars showing that the said party has complied with the obligation of the said bond, so far as the same was practicable; and the collector, upon being duly satisfied, shall be authorised to surrender the said bonds.

11. Nothing in these regulations shall be so construed as to conflict with the provisions of the law which declares 'that nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the Confederate States, or any of them, from exporting any of the articles herein enumerated on their own account;' nor shall a bond be required of a State in any case.

12. The penalties of all bonds executed in conformity with these regulations shall be recovered in full on proof of breach of the conditions of the bond, and without proof of any damage suffered by the Confederate States in consequence of such breach, and all bonds shall be executed in such force as to give effect to this regulation.

13. Vessels sent into the Confederacy for the purpose of exporting cotton received in payment of any Confederate bond or obligation, shall be subject to these regulations only so far as relates to such portion of the tonnage, if any, as may remain vacant after the lading of the cotton received in payment as aforesaid.

14. The regulations for overland commerce with neutral countries will be issued separately within a few days.

March 7.

AN ACT TO PROHIBIT THE IMPORTATION OF LUXURIES, OR OF ARTICLES NOT NECESSARIES OR OF COMMON USE.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the first day of March next it shall not be lawful to import into the Confederate States any brandy, wines, or other spirits, or any other article specified in schedule A of an act entitled 'An act to provide revenue from commodities imported from foreign countries,' approved May 21, 1861, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, enumerated in schedule B of said act, except the following articles:—All things for medical purposes, camphor refined, pickles, molasses, pepper, pimento, cloves, nutmegs, cinnamon, and all other spices; soap, Castille, Windsor, and all other toilet soaps; sugar of all kinds; syrup of sugar; galloons, laces, knots, stars, tassels, tresses and wings of gold and silver, or imitations thereof, intended for uniforms of officers in the military and naval service.

Sec. 2. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles enumerated in schedule C of said act: Beer, ale, and porter; muffs and tippets, and all other manufactures of fur, or of which fur shall be a component part, except caps and hats; carpets, carpetings, hearth rugs, bedsides, and other portions of carpeting, of any kind or description; carriages and parts of carriages; cider and other beverages not containing alcohol; clocks and parts of clocks; cotton laces, cotton insertings, cotton trimmings, or laces of thread and other material; coral, manufactured; dolls and toys of all kinds: fire crackers, sky rockets, Roman candles and all other similar articles used in pyrotechnics; furniture, cabinet and household; glass, coloured, stained, or painted; India matting of all sorts; jet and manufactures of jet, and imitations thereof; jewellery, or imitations thereof; manufactures and articles of marble, marble paving tiles, slabs, or blocks, and all other marble; matting, China or other floor matting and mats made of flags, jute, or grass; paper hangings, paper for walls, and paper for screens or fire boards; paving and roofing tiles and bricks, and roofing slates and fire bricks; thread lacings and insertings; velvets of all kinds.

Sec. 3. And it shall not be lawful to import the following articles, enumerated in schedule D of said act: Angola, Thibet, and other goats' hair, or mohair, unmanufactured; bananas, cocoa nuts, plantains, and oranges; cabinets of coins, medals, gems, and collections of antiquities; diamonds, mosaics, gems, pearls, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, set in gold or silver or other metals; engravings, bound or unbound; rattans and reeds; paintings and stationery: leaf and unmanufactured tobacco and cigars; or the following articles enumerated in schedule E: Diamonds, cameos, mosaics, pearls, gems, rubies, and other precious stones and imitations thereof, when not set.

Sec. 4. None of the manufactures of metal, designed as either household or personal ornaments, shall be admitted; and in order to confine importations to articles of necessity and of common use, the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe the maximum foreign prices at which and within which importations of goods manufactured wholly or partly of cotton, flax, wool, or of silk, and designed for wearing apparel, and not herein prohibited, may be made, and beyond which importations thereof shall not be made: Provided, That articles herein allowed to be imported shall not be impressed by the Government or its agents after they have reached the Confederate States: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit any importation for the use or account of the Confederate States, or either of them: Provided further, That this act shall not apply to any articles which have been or shall be shipped, without knowledge of the passage of this act, before the first day of March next, but which shall arrive in a Confederate port after that day.

Sec. 5. That whenever any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, after the first day of March next, be imported into the Confederate States, contrary to the true intent and meaning of this act, or shall, after said first day of March next, be put on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, with the intention of importing the same into the Confederate States, all such articles, as well as all other articles on board the same ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, belonging to the owner of such prohibited articles, shall be forfeited, and the owner thereof shall, moreover, forfeit and pay double the value of such articles.

Sec. 6. If any article or articles, the importation of which is prohibited by this act, shall, nevertheless, be on board any ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, arriving after said first day of March next in the Confederate States, and shall be omitted in the manifest, report, or entry of the master, or the person having the charge or command of such ship or vessel, boat, raft, or carriage, or shall be omitted in the entry of the goods owned by the owner, or consigned to the consignee of such articles, or shall be imported or landed, or attempted to be imported or landed, without a permit, the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures shall be incurred, and may be recovered, as in the case of similar omission or omissions, landing, importation, or attempt to land or import, in relation to articles liable to duties on their importation into the Confederate States.

Sec. 7. Every collector, naval officer, surveyor, or other officer of the customs, shall have the like power and authority to seize goods, wares, and merchandise imported contrary to the intent and meaning of this act, to keep the same in custody until it shall have been ascertained whether the same have been forfeited or not, and to enter any ship or vessel, dwelling-house, store, building, or other place, for the purpose of searching for and seizing any such goods, wares, and merchandise subject to duty, and if any person or persons shall conceal or buy any goods, wares, or merchandise, knowing them to be liable to seizure by this act, such person or persons shall, on conviction thereof, forfeit and pay a sum double the amount or value of the goods, wares, and merchandise so concealed or purchased.

Sec. 8. The following additional oath or affirmation shall be taken by masters or persons having charge or command of any ship or vessel arriving at any port of the Confederate States after said first day of March next, viz.: 'I further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, on board [insert the denomination and name of the vessel] any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law; and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover or know of any such goods, wares, or merchandise, on board of the said vessel, or which shall have been imported in the same, I will immediately, and without delay, make due report thereof to the collector of the port of this district.'

Sec. 9. After said first day of March next, importers, consignors, or agents, at the time of entering goods into the Confederate States, shall take the following additional oath, viz.: 'I also swear (or affirm) that there are not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, amongst the said goods, wares, or merchandise, imported or consigned as aforesaid, any goods, wares, or merchandise, the importation of which into the Confederate States is prohibited by law: and I do further swear (or affirm) that if I shall hereafter discover any such goods, wares, or merchandise among the said goods, wares, and merchandise so imported or consigned as aforesaid, I will immediately and without delay report the same to the collector of this district.'

Sec. 10. All penalties and forfeitures arising under this act, may be sued for and recovered, and shall be distributed and accounted for, in the manner prescribed by the act entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage;' and such penalties and forfeitures, mitigated or remitted, in like manner and under the like conditions, regulations, and restrictions as are prescribed, authorised, and directed by the act entitled 'An act to provide for mitigating or remitting the forfeitures, penalties, and disabilities accruing in certain cases therein mentioned.'

Sec. 11. That this act shall expire on the day of the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States.

AN ACT TO LEVY ADDITIONAL TAXES FOR THE COMMON DEFENCE AND SUPPORT OF THE GOVERNMENT.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That, in addition to the taxes levied by the 'act to lay taxes for the common defence, and to carry on the Government of the Confederate States,' approved 24th of April, 1863, there shall be levied from the passage of this act, on the subjects of taxation hereafter mentioned, and collected from every person, copartnership, association or corporation, liable therefor, taxes as follows, to wit:

I. Upon the value of property, real personal and mixed, of every kind and description, not hereinafter exempted or taxed at a different rate, five per cent.: Provided, That from this tax on the value of property, employed in agriculture, shall be deducted the value of the tax in kind derived therefrom, as assessed under the law imposing it, and delivered to the Government: Provided, That no credit shall be allowed beyond five per cent.

II. On the value of gold and silver wares and plate, jewels, jewelry and watches, ten per cent.

III. The value of property taxed under this section shall be assessed on the basis of the market value of the same, or similar property, in the neighbourhood where assessed in the year 1860, except in cases where lands, slaves, cotton or tobacco have been purchased since the 1st day of January, 1862, in which case the said land, slaves, cotton and tobacco, so purchased, shall be assessed at the price actually paid for the same by the owner.

Sec. 2. On the value of all shares or interests held in any bank, banking company, or association, canal, navigation, importing and exporting, insurance, manufacturing, telegraph, express, railroad and dry dock companies, and all other joint stock companies of every kind, whether incorporated or not, five per cent.

The value of property taxed under this section shall be assessed upon the basis of the market value of said property in the neighbourhood where assessed, in such currency as may be in general use there, in the purchase and sale of such property, at the time of assessment.

Sec. 3. I. Upon the amount of all gold and silver coin, gold dust, gold or silver bullion, whether held by banks or other corporations or individuals, five per cent.; and upon all moneys held abroad, or upon the amount of all bills of exchange, drawn therefor on foreign countries, a tax of five per cent.; such tax upon money abroad to be assessed and collected according to the value thereof at the place where the tax is paid.

II. Upon the amount of all solvent credits, and of all bank bills, and all other paper issued as currency, exclusive of non-interest bearing Confederate treasury notes, and not employed in a registered business, the income derived from which is taxed, five per cent.

Sec. 4. Upon profits made in trade and business, as follows:—

I. On all profits made by buying and selling spirituous liquors, flour, wheat, corn, rice, sugar, molasses or syrup, salt, bacon, pork, hogs, beef or beef cattle, sheep, oats, hay, fodder, raw hides, leather, horses, mules, boots, shoes, cotton yarns, wool, woollen, cotton or mixed cloths, hats, wagons, harness, coal, iron, steel or nails, at any time between January 1, 1863, and January 1, 1865, ten per cent., in addition to the tax on such profits as income under the 'act to lay taxes for the common defence, and carry on the Government of the Confederate States,' passed April 24, 1863.

II. On all profits made by buying and selling money, gold, silver, foreign exchange, stocks, notes, debts, credits or obligations of any kind, and on all profits made by property, or effects of any kind not connected with a business taxed by paragraph I. between the [illegible] and the [illegible] and subject to the tax on such profits as income under said act aforesaid.

III. On the amount of profits exceeding twenty-five per cent. made during the year 1863 and 1864, by any bank or banking [illegible] and on profits accruing, importing and exporting [illegible] manufacturing, [illegible] and on the profits of any description, whether [illegible] the [illegible] twenty-five per cent. on such excess.

Sec. 5. The following exemptions from taxation under this act shall be allowed to wit:

I. Property of every kind of a family to the value of five hundred dollars, and [illegible] of the family to the further value of one hundred dollars, and [illegible] actually engaged in the army or navy or who have died or been killed in the military or naval service, and who were members of the family when he entered the service, to the further value of five hundred dollars.

II. Property of the widow of any officer, soldier, sailor, or marine, who may have died or been killed in the military or naval service, or whose there is no widow, then of the family, being minor children, to the value of one thousand dollars.

III. Property of every officer, soldier, sailor, or marine, actually engaged in the military or naval service, or of such as have been disabled in such service, to the value of one thousand dollars: Provided, That the above exemptions shall not apply to any person, whose property, exclusive of household furniture, shall be assessed at a value exceeding one thousand dollars.

IV. That where property has been injured or destroyed by the enemy, or the owner thereof has been temporarily deprived of the use or occupancy thereof, or of the means of cultivating the same, by reason of the presence or proximity of the enemy, the assessment on such property may be reduced, in proportion to the damage sustained by the owner, or the tax assessed thereon may be reduced in the same ratio by the district collector, on satisfactory evidence submitted to him by the owner or assessor.

Sec. 6. That the taxes on property, laid for the year 1864, shall be assessed as on the day of the passage of this act, and be due and collected on the 1st day of June next, or as soon after as practicable, allowing an extension of ninety days west of the Mississippi river. The additional taxes on incomes or profits for the year 1863, levied by this act, shall be assessed and collected forthwith; and the taxes on incomes or profits for the year 1864 shall be assessed and collected according to the provisions of the tax and assessment acts of 1863.

Sec. 7. So much of the tax act of the 24th day of April, 1863, as levies a tax on incomes derived from property or effects, on the amount or value of which a tax is levied by this act, and also the first section of said act, are suspended for the year 1864; and no estimated rent, hire, or interest on property or credits herein taxed ad valorem, shall be assessed or taxed as incomes under the tax act of 1863.

Sec. 8. That the tax imposed by this act on bonds of the Confederate States heretofore issued, shall in no case exceed the interest on the same, and such bonds when held by or for minors or lunatics, shall be exempt from tax in all cases where the interest on the same shall not exceed one thousand dollars.

Approved, Feb. 17, 1864.

AN ACT TO REDUCE THE CURRENCY AND TO AUTHORISE A NEW ISSUE OF NOTES AND BONDS.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That the holders of all treasury notes above the denomination of five dollars, not bearing interest, shall be allowed until the 1st day of April, 1864, east of the Mississippi river, and until the first day of July, 1864, west of the Mississippi river, to fund the same; and until the periods and at the places stated, the holders of all such treasury notes shall be allowed to fund the same in registered bonds, payable twenty years after their date, bearing interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum, payable on the first day of January and July of each year.

Sec. 2. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorised to issue the bonds required for the funding provided for in the preceding section, and until the bonds can be prepared he may issue certificates to answer the purpose. Such bonds and certificates shall be receivable, without interest, in payment of all Government dues payable in the year 1864, except export and import duties.

Sec. 3. That all treasury notes of the denomination of 100 dollars, not bearing interest, which shall not be presented for funding under the provisions of the first section of this act, shall, from and after the first day of April, 1864, east of the Mississippi river, and the first day of July, 1864, west of the Mississippi river, cease to be receivable in the payment of public dues, and said notes, if not so presented at that time, shall, in addition to the tax of thirty-three and one-third cents imposed in the fourth section of this act, be subject to a tax of ten per cent. per month until so presented, which taxes shall attach to said notes wherever circulated, and shall be deducted from the face of said notes whenever presented for payment or for funding, and said notes shall not be exchangeable for the new issue of treasury notes provided for in this act.

Sec. 4. That on all said treasury notes not funded or used in payment of taxes at the dates and places prescribed in the first section of this act, there shall be levied at said dates and places a tax of thirty-three and one-third cents for every dollar promised on the face of said notes. Said tax shall attach to said notes wherever circulated, and shall be collected by deducting the same at the Treasury, its depositories, and by the tax collectors, and by all Government officers receiving the same, whenever presented for payment, or for funding, or in payment of Government dues, or for postage, or in exchange for new notes as hereinafter provided: and said treasury notes shall be fundable in bonds as provided in the first section of this act until the first day of January, 1865, at the rate of sixty-six and two-third cents on the dollar.

And it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, at any time between the first April east, and the 1st July, 1864, west of the Mississippi river, and the 1st January, 1865, to substitute and exchange new treasury notes for the same, at the rate of sixty-six and two-third cents on the dollar: Provided, That notes of the denomination of 100 dollars shall not be entitled to the privilege of said exchange: Provided further,

That the right to fund any of said treasury notes after 1st day of January, 1865, is hereby taken away: And provided further, That upon all such treasury notes which may remain outstanding on the 1st January, 1865, and which may not be exchanged for new treasury notes as herein provided, a tax of one hundred per cent. is hereby imposed.

Sec. 5. That after the 1st day of April next all authority heretofore given to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue treasury notes shall be, and the same is hereby revoked: Provided, The Secretary of the Treasury may, after that time, issue new treasury notes, in such form as he may prescribe, payable two years after the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States, said new issues to be receivable in payment of all public dues except export and import duties, and to be issued in exchange for old notes, at the rate of two dollars of the new for three dollars of the old issues, whether said old notes be surrendered for exchange by the holders thereof, or be received into the Treasury under the provisions of this act; and the holders of the new notes or of the old notes, except those of the denomination of 100 dollars, after they are reduced to sixty-six and two-third cents on the dollar, by the tax aforesaid, may convert the same into call certificates, bearing interest at the rate of four per cent. per annum, and payable two years after the ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States, unless sooner converted into new notes.

Sec. 6. That to pay the expenses of the Government not otherwise provided for, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorised to issue six per cent. bonds to an amount not exceeding 500,000,000 of dollars, the principal and interest whereof shall be free from taxation, and for the payment of the interest thereon the entire nett receipts of any export duty hereafter laid on the value of all cotton, tobacco, and naval stores which shall be exported from the Confederate States, and the nett proceeds of the import duties now laid, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay annually the interest, are hereby specially pledged: Provided, That the duties now laid upon imports, and hereby pledged, shall hereafter be paid in specie, or in sterling exchange, or in the coupons of said bonds.

Sec. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorised, from time to time, as the wants of the Treasury may require it, to sell or hypothecate for treasury notes said bonds, or any part thereof, upon the best terms he can, so as to meet appropriations by Congress, and at the same time reduce and restrict the amount of the circulation in Treasury notes within reasonable and safe limits.

Sec. 8. The bonds authorised by the 6th section of this act may be either registered or coupon bonds, as the parties taking them may elect, and they may be exchanged for each other under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. They shall be for one hundred dollars, or some multiple of one hundred dollars, and shall, together with the coupons thereto attached, be in such form and of such authentication as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. The interest shall be payable half yearly on the 1st January and July in each year—the principal shall be payable not less than thirty years from their date.

Sec. 9. All call certificates shall be fundable, and shall be taxed in all respects, as is provided for the Treasury notes, into which they are convertible. If not converted before the time fixed for taxing the Treasury notes, such certificates shall, from that time, bear interest upon only sixty-six and two-third cents for every dollar promised upon their face, and shall be redeemable only in new Treasury notes at that rate; but after the passage of this act, no call certificates shall be issued until after the 1st day of April, 1864.

Sec. 10. That if any bank of deposit shall give its depositors the bonds authorised by the 1st section of this act in exchange for their deposits, and specify the same on the bonds by some distinctive mark or token, to be agreed upon with the Secretary of the Treasury, then the said depositor shall be entitled to receive the amount of said bonds in Treasury notes bearing no interest, and outstanding at the passage of this act: Provided, The said bonds are presented before the privilege of funding said notes at par shall cease, as herein prescribed.

Sec. 11. That all Treasury notes heretofore issued, of the denomination of five dollars, shall continue to be receivable in payment of public dues, as provided by law, and fundable at par, under the provisions of this act, until the 1st of July, 1864, east, and until the 1st October, 1864, west of the Mississippi river, but after that time they shall be subject to a tax of thirty-three and one-third cents on every dollar promised on the face thereof, said tax to attach to said notes wherever circulated, and said notes to be fundable and exchangeable for new Treasury notes, as herein provided, subject to the deduction of said tax.

Sec. 12. That any State holding Treasury notes, received before the times herein fixed for taxing said notes, shall be allowed until the 1st day of January, 1865, to fund the same in six per cent. bonds of the Confederate States, payable twenty years after date, and the interest payable semi-annually. But all Treasury notes received by any State after the time fixed for taxing the same, as aforesaid, shall be held to have been received, diminished by the amount of said tax. The discrimination between the notes subject to the tax and those not so subject shall be left to the good faith of each State, and the certificate of the Governor thereof shall in each case be conclusive.

Sec. 13. That Treasury notes heretofore issued, bearing interest at the rate of seven dollars and thirty cents on the hundred dollars per annum, shall no longer be received in payment of public dues, but shall be deemed and considered bonds of the Confederate States, payable two years after a ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States, bearing the rate of interest specified on their face, payable on the 1st January in each and every year.

Sec. 14. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby authorised, in case the exigencies of the Government should require it, to pay the demand of any public creditor whose debt may be contracted after the passage of this act, willing to receive the same, in a certificate of indebtedness to be issued by said Secretary in such form as he may deem proper, payable two years after a ratification of a treaty of peace with the United States, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, and transferable only by special endorsement, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and said certificates shall be exempt from taxation in principal and interest.

Sec. 15. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorised to increase the number of depositories so as to meet the requirements of this act, and with that view to employ such of the banks of the several States as he may deem expedient.

Sec. 16. The Secretary of the Treasury shall forthwith advertise this act in such newspapers published in the several States, and by such other means as shall secure immediate publicity, and the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall each cause it to be published in general orders for the information of the army and navy.

Sec. 17. The 42nd section of the act for the assessment and collection of taxes, approved May 1, 1863, is hereby repealed.

Sec. 18. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorised and required, upon the application of the holder of any call certificates—which by the 1st section of the act 'to provide for the funding and further issue of Treasury notes,' approved March 23, 1863, was required to be thereafter deemed to be a bond—to issue to such holder a bond therefor upon the terms provided by said act.

Approved, February 17, 1864.

Address of the Confederate Congress to the People.

In closing the labours of the First Permanent Congress, your Representatives deem it a fit occasion to give some account of their stewardship: to review briefly what, under such embarrassments and adverse circumstances, has been accomplished; to invite attention to the prospect before us and the duties incumbent on every citizen in this crisis; and to address such words of counsel and encouragement as the times demand.

Compelled by a long series of oppressive and tyrannical acts, culminating at last in the selection of a President and Vice-President by a party confessedly sectional and hostile to the South and her institutions, these States withdrew from the former Union, and formed a new Confederate alliance, as an independent Government, based on the proper relations of labour and capital. This step was taken reluctantly, by constraint, and after the exhaustion of every measure that was likely to secure us from interference with our property, equality in the Union, or exemption from submission to an alien government. The Southern States claimed only the unrestricted enjoyment of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution. Finding, by painful and protracted experience, that this was persistently denied, we determined to separate from those enemies, who had manifested the inclination and ability to impoverish and destroy us; we fell back upon the right for which the colonies maintained the war of the revolution, and which our heroic forefathers asserted to be clear and inalienable. The unanimity and zeal with which the separation was undertaken and perfected, finds no parallel in history. The people rose en masse to assert their liberties and protect their menaced rights. There never was before such universality of conviction, among any people, on any question involving so serious and so thorough a change of political and international relations. This grew out of the clearness of the right so to act, and the certainty of the perils of further association with the North. The change was so wonderful, so rapid, so contrary to universal history, that many fail to see that all has been done in the logical sequence of principles, which are the highest testimony to the wisdom of our fathers, and the best illustration of the correctness of those principles. This Government is a child of law instead of sedition, of right instead of violence, of deliberation instead of insurrection. Its early life was attended by no anarchy, no rebellion, no suspension of authority, no social disorders, no lawless disturbances. Sovereignty was not for one moment in abeyance. The utmost conservatism marked every proceeding and public act. The object was 'to do what was necessary, and no more; and to do that with the utmost temperance and prudence.' St. Just, in his report to the Convention of France, in 1798, said, 'A people has but one dangerous enemy, and that is Government.' We adopted no such absurdity. In nearly every instance, the first steps were taken legally, in accordance with the will and prescribed direction of the constituted authorities of the seceding States. We were not remitted to brute force, or natural law, or the instincts of reason. The charters of freedom were scrupulously preserved. As in the English Revolution of 1688, and ours of 1776, there was no material alteration in the laws beyond what was necessary to redress the abuses that provoked the struggle. No attempt was made to build on speculative principles. The effort was confined within the narrowest limits of historical and constitutional right. The controversy turned on the records and muniments of the past. We merely resisted innovation and tyranny, and contended for our birthrights and the covenanted principles of our race. We have had our Governors, General Assemblies, and Courts; the same electors, the same corporations, 'the same rules for property, the same subordinations, the same order in the law and in the magistracy.' When the sovereign States met in council, they, in truth and substance, and in a constitutional light, did not make, but prevented, a revolution.

Commencing our new national life under such circumstances, we had a right to expect that we would be permitted, without molestation, to cultivate the arts of peace, and vindicate, on our chosen arena and with the selected type of social characteristics, our claims to civilisation. It was thought, too, by many that war would not be resorted to by an enlightened country, except on the direst necessity. That a people professing to be animated by Christian sentiment, and who had regarded our peculiar institution as a blot and blur upon the fair escutcheon of their common Christianity, should make war upon the South for doing what they had a perfect right to do, and for relieving them of the incubus which, they professed, rested upon them by the association, was deemed almost beyond belief by many of our wisest minds. It was hoped, too, that the obvious interest of the two sections would restrain the wild frenzy of excitement, and turn into peaceful channels the thoughts of those who had but recently been invested with power in the United States.

These reasonable anticipations were doomed to disappointment. The red glare of battle, kindled at Sumter, dissipated all hopes of peace, and the two Governments were arrayed in hostility against each other. We charge the responsibility of this war upon the United States. They are accountable for the blood and havoc and ruin it has caused. For such a war we were not prepared. The difference in military resources between our enemies and ourselves; the immense advantages possessed in the organised machinery of an established government; a powerful navy; the nucleus of an army; credit abroad and illimitable facilities in mechanical and manufacturing power, placed them on 'the vantage ground.' In our infancy we were without a seaman or soldier, without revenue, without gold and silver, without a recognised place in the family of nations, without external commerce, without foreign credit, with the prejudices of the world against us. While we were without manufacturing facilities to supply our wants, our ports were blockaded; we had to grapple with a giant adversary, defend 2,000 miles of sea-coast, and an inland frontier of equal extent. If we had succeeded in preventing any successes on the part of our enemy, it would have been a miracle. What we have accomplished, with a population so inferior in numbers and means so vastly disproportionate, has excited the astonishment and admiration of the world.

The war in which we are engaged was wickedly, and against all our protests and the most earnest efforts to the contrary, forced upon us. South Carolina sent a commission to Washington to adjust all questions of dispute between her and the United States. One of the first acts of the Provisional Government was to accredit agents to visit Washington, and use all honourable means to obtain a satisfactory settlement of all questions of dispute with that Government. Both efforts failed. Commissioners were deceived and rejected, and clandestine but vigorous preparations were made for war. In proportion to our perseverance and anxiety have been the obstinacy and arrogance in spurning offers of peace. It seems we can be indebted for nothing to the virtues of our enemies. We are obliged to his vices, which have enured to our strength. We owe as much to his insolence and blindness as to our precaution.

The wager of battle having been tendered, it was accepted. The alacrity with which our people flew to arms is worthy of all praise. Their deeds of heroic daring, patient endurance, ready submission to discipline, and numerous victories, are in keeping with the fervent patriotism that prompted their early volunteering. Quite recently, scores of regiments have enlisted for the war, testifying their determination to fight until their liberties were achieved. Coupled with and contributing greatly to this enthusiastic ardour, was the lofty courage, the indomitable resolve, the self-denying spirit of our noble women, who, by their labours of love, their patience of hope, their unflinching constancy, their uncomplaining submission to the privations of the war, have shed an immortal lustre upon their sex and country.

Our army is no hireling soldiery. It comes not from paupers, criminals, or emigrants. It was originally raised by the free, unconstrained, unpurchaseable assent of the men. All vocations and classes contributed to the swelling numbers. Abandoning luxuries and comforts to which they had been accustomed, they submitted cheerfully to the scanty fare and exactive service of the camps. Their services above price, the only remuneration they have sought is the protection of their altars, firesides, and liberty. In the Norwegian wars the actors were, every one of them, named and patronymically described as the King's friend and companion. The same wonderful individuality has been seen in this war. Our soldiers are not a consolidated mass, an unthinking machine, but an army of intelligent units. To designate all who have distinguished themselves by special valour, would be to enumerate nearly all in the army. The generous rivalry between the troops from different States has prevented any special preeminence, and hereafter, for centuries to come, the gallant bearing and unconquerable devotion of Confederate soldiers will inspire the hearts, and encourage the hopes, and strengthen the faith, of all who labour to obtain their freedom.

For three years this cruel war has been waged against us, and its continuance has been seized upon as a pretext by some discontented persons to excite hostility to the Government. Recent and public as have been the occurrences, it is strange that a misapprehension exists as to the conduct of the two Governments in reference to peace. Allusion has been made to the unsuccessful efforts when separation took place to procure an amicable adjustment of all matters in dispute. These attempts at negotiation do not comprise all that has been done. In every form in which expression could be given to the sentiment—in public meetings, through the press, by legislative resolves—the desire of this people for peace, for the uninterrupted enjoyment of their rights and property, has been made known. The President, more authoritatively, in several of his messages, while protesting the utter absence of all desire to interfere with the United States, or acquire any of their territory, has avowed that the 'advent of peace will be hailed with joy. Our desire for it has never been concealed. Our efforts to avoid the war, forced on us as it was by the lust of conquest and the insane passions of our foes, are known to mankind.'

The course of the Federal Government has proved that it did not desire peace, and would not consent to it on any terms that we could possibly concede. In proof of this, we refer to the repeated rejection of all terms of conciliation and compromise, to their recent contemptuous refusal to receive the Vice-President, who was sent to negotiate for softening the asperities of war, and their scornful rejection of the offer of a neutral Power to mediate between the contending parties. If cumulative evidence be needed, it can be found in the following resolution, recently adopted by the House of Representatives in Washington:

'Resolved: That as our country and the very existence of the best Government ever instituted by man are imperilled by the most causeless and wicked rebellion that the world has seen, and believing, as we do, that the only hope of saving this country and preserving this Government is by the power of the sword, we are for the most vigorous prosecution of the war until the Constitution and the laws shall be enforced and obeyed in all parts of the United States; and to that end we oppose any armistice, or intervention, or mediation, or proposition for peace, from any quarter, so long as there shall be found a rebel in arms against the Government; and we ignore all party names, lines, and issues, and recognise but two parties in this war—patriots and traitors.'

The motive of such strange conduct is obvious. The Republican party was founded to destroy slavery and the equality of the States, and Lincoln was selected as the instrument to accomplish this object. The Union was a barrier to the consummation of this policy, because the Constitution, which was its bond, recognised and protected slavery and the sovereignty of the States. The Union must, therefore, be sacrificed, and, to insure its destruction, war was determined on.

The mass of the Northern people were not privy to, and sympathised in no such design. They loved the Union and wished to preserve it. To rally the people to the support of the war, its object was proclaimed to be 'a restoration of the Union,' as if that which implied voluntary assent, of which agreement was an indispensable element and condition, could be preserved by coercion. It is absurd to pretend that a Government, really desirous of restoring the Union, would adopt such measures as the confiscation of private property, the emancipation of slaves, systematic efforts to incite them to insurrection, the division of a sovereign State without its consent, and a proclamation that one-tenth of the population of a State, and that tenth under military rule, should control the will of the remaining nine-tenths. The only relation possible between the two sections, under such a policy, is that of conqueror and conquered, superior and dependent. Rest assured, fellow-citizens, that although restoration may still be used as a war-cry by the Northern Government, it is only to delude and betray. Fanaticism has summoned to its aid cupidity and vengeance; and nothing short of your utter subjugation, the destruction of your State Governments, the overthrow of your social and political fabric, your personal and public degradation and ruin, will satisfy the demands of the North. Can there be a man so vile, so debased, so unworthy of liberty, as to accept peace on such humiliating terms?

It would hardly be fair to assert that all the Northern people participate in these designs. On the contrary, there exists a powerful political party, which openly condemns them. The Administration has, however, been able thus far, by its enormous patronage and its lavish expenditures to seduce, or by its legions of 'Hessian' mercenaries to overawe the masses, to control the elections, and to establish an arbitrary despotism. It cannot be possible that this state of things can continue. The people of the United States, accustomed to freedom, cannot consent to be ruined and enslaved in order to ruin and enslave us. Moral, like physical epidemics, have their allotted periods, and must sooner or later be exhausted and disappear. When reason returns, our enemies will probably reflect, that a people like ours, who have exhibited such capabilities, and extemporised such resources, can never be subdued; that a vast expanse of territory, with such a population, cannot be governed as an obedient colony. Victory would not be conquest. The inextinguishable quarrel would be transmitted 'from bleeding sire to son,' and the struggle would be renewed between generations yet unborn. To impoverish us would only be to dry up some of the springs of Northern prosperity—to destroy Southern wealth is to reduce Northern profits, while the restoration of peace would necessarily re-establish some commercial intercourse. It may not be amiss, in this connection, to say that at one time it was the wish and expectation of many at the South to form a treaty of amity and friendship with the Northern States, by which both peoples might derive the benefits of commercial intercourse, and move on side by side in the arts of peace and civilisation. History has confirmed the lesson taught by Divine authority, that each nation as well as each individual should seek their happiness in the prosperity of others, and not in the injury or ruin of a neighbour. The general welfare of all is the highest dictate of moral duty and economic policy, while a heritage of triumphant wrong is the greatest curse that can befall a nation.

Until some evidence is given of a change of policy on the part of the Government, and some assurance is received that efforts at negotiation will not be spurned, the Congress are of opinion that any direct overtures for peace would compromise our self-respect, be fruitless of good, and interpreted by the enemy as an indication of weakness. We can only repeat the desire of the people for peace, and our readiness to accept terms consistent with the honour and integrity and independence of the States, and compatible with the safety of our domestic institutions.

Not content with rejecting all proposals for a peaceful settlement of the controversy, a cruel war of invasion was commenced, which, in its progress, has been marked by a brutality and disregard of the rules of civilised warfare, that stand out as unexampled barbarity in the history of modern wars. Accompanied by every act of cruelty and rapine, the conduct of the enemy has been destitute of that forbearance and magnanimity which civilisation and Christianity have introduced to mitigate the asperities of war. The atrocities are too incredible for narration. Instead of a regular war, our resistance of the unholy efforts to crush out our national existence is treated as a rebellion, and the settled international rules between belligerents are ignored. Instead of conducting the war as betwixt two military and political organisations, it is a war against the whole population. Houses are pillaged and burned. Churches are defaced. Towns are ransacked. Clothing of women and infants is stripped from their persons. Jewellery and mementoes of the dead are stolen. Mills and implements of agriculture are destroyed. Private salt-works are broken up. The introduction of medicines is forbidden. Means of subsistence are wantonly wasted to produce beggary. Prisoners are returned with contagious diseases. The last morsel of food has been taken from families, who were not allowed to carry on a trade or branch of industry. A rigid and offensive espionage has been introduced to ferret out 'disloyalty.' Persons have been forced to choose between starvation of helpless children and taking the oath of allegiance to a hated government. The cartel for exchange of prisoners has been suspended, and our unfortunate soldiers subjected to the grossest indignities. The wounded at Gettysburg were deprived of their nurses, and inhumanly left to perish on the field. Helpless women have been exposed to the most cruel outrages, and to that dishonour which is infinitely worse than death. Citizens have been murdered by the Butlers and M'Neils and Milroys, who are favourite generals of our enemies. Refined and delicate ladies have been seized, bound with cords, imprisoned, guarded by negroes, and held as hostages for the return of recaptured slaves. Unoffending non-combatants have been banished or dragged from their quiet homes to be immured in filthy gaols. Preaching the Gospel has been refused, except on condition of taking the oath of allegiance. Parents have been forbidden to name their children in honour of 'rebel' chiefs. Property has been confiscated. Military governors have been appointed for States, satraps for provinces, and Haynaus for cities.

These cruelties and atrocities of the enemy have been exceeded by their malicious and bloodthirsty purposes and machinations in reference to the slaves. Early in this war, President Lincoln averred his constitutional inability and personal unwillingness to interfere with the domestic institutions of the States and the relation between master and servant. Prudential considerations may have been veiled under conscientious scruples, for Seward, in a confidential instruction to Mr. Adams, the Minister to Great Britain, on March 10, 1862, said: 'If the Government of the United States should precipitately decree the immediate abolition of slavery, it would reinvigorate the declining insurrection in every part of the South.' Subsequent reverses and the refractory rebelliousness of the seceded States caused a change of policy, and Mr. Lincoln issued his celebrated proclamation, a mere brutum fulmen, liberating the slaves in the 'insurrectionary districts.' On June 24, 1776, one of the reasons assigned by Pennsylvania for her separation from the mother country was that, in her sister colonies, the 'King had excited the negroes to revolt,' and to imbrue their hands in the blood of their masters, in a manner unpractised by civilised nations. This, probably, had reference to the proclamation of Dunmore, the last royal Governor of Virginia, in 1775, declaring freedom to all servants or negroes if they would join 'for the reducing the colony to a proper sense of its duty.' This invitation to the slaves to rise against their masters, this suggested insurrection, caused, says Bancroft, 'a thrill of indignation to run through Virginia, effacing all differences of party, and rousing one strong, impassioned purpose to drive away the insolent power by which it had been put forth.' A contemporary annalist, adverting to the same proclamation, said, 'it was received with the greatest horror in all the colonies.'

'The policy adopted by Dunmore,' says Lawrence in his notes on Wheaton, 'of arming the slaves against their masters, was not pursued during the war of the Revolution; and when negroes were taken by the English, they were not considered otherwise than as property and plunder.' Emancipation of slaves as a war measure has been severely condemned and denounced by the most eminent publicists in Europe and the United States. The United States, 'in their diplomatic relations, have ever maintained,' says the Northern authority just quoted, 'that slaves were private property, and for them, as such, they have repeatedly received compensation from England.' Napoleon I. was never induced to issue a proclamation for the emancipation of the serfs in his war with Russia. He said: 'I could have armed against her a part of her population, by proclaiming the liberty of the serfs. A great number of villages asked it of me, but I refused to avail myself of a measure which would have devoted to death thousands of families.' In the discussions growing out of the treaty of peace of 1814, and the proffered mediation of Russia, the principle was maintained by the United States that 'the emancipation of an enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate warfare.' In the instructions from John Quincy Adams, as Secretary of State, to Mr. Middleton, at St. Petersburg, October 18, 1820, it is said: 'The British have broadly asserted the right of emancipating slaves (private property) as a legitimate right of war. No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners, in cold blood and without special cause, might as well be pretended to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons, or to assassinate.'

Disregarding the teachings of the approved writers on international law, and the practice and claims of his own Government in its purer days, President Lincoln has sought to convert the South into a St. Domingo, by appealing to the cupidity, lusts, ambition, and ferocity of the slave. Abraham Lincoln is but the lineal descendant of Dunmore, and the impotent malice of each was foiled by the fidelity of those who, by the meanness of the conspirators, would only, if successful, have been seduced into idleness, filth, vice, beggary, and death.

But we tire of these indignities and enormities. They are too sickening for recital. History will hereafter pillory those who committed and encouraged such crimes in immortal infamy.

General Robert E. Lee, in a recent battle-order, stated to his invincible legions, that the 'cruel foe seeks to reduce our fathers and mothers, our wives and children, to abject slavery.' He does not paint too strongly the purposes of the enemy or the consequences of subjugation. What has been done in certain districts is but the prologue of the bloody drama that will be enacted. It is well that every man and woman should have some just conception of the horrors of conquest. The fate of Ireland at the period of its conquest, and of Poland, distinctly foreshadows what would await us. The guillotine, in its ceaseless work of blood, would be revived for the execution of the 'rebel leaders.' The heroes of our contest would be required to lay down their proud ensigns, on which are recorded the battle-fields of their glory, to stack their arms, lower their heads in humiliation and dishonour, and pass under the yoke of Abolition misrule and tyranny. A hateful inquisition, made atrocious by spies and informers; star-chamber courts, enforcing their decisions by confiscations, imprisonments, banishments, and death; a band of detectives, ferreting out secrets, lurking in every family, existing in every conveyance; the suppression of free speech; the deprivation of arms and franchises; and the ever-present sense of inferiority would make our condition abject and miserable beyond what freemen can imagine. Subjugation involves everything that the torturing malice and devilish ingenuity of our foes can suggest—the destruction of our nationality, the equalisation of whites and blacks, the obliteration of State lines, degradation to colonial vassalage, and the reduction of many of our citizens to dreary, hopeless, remediless bondage. A hostile police would keep 'order' in every town and city. Judges, like Busteed, would hold our courts, protected by Yankee soldiers. Churches would be filled by Yankee preachers. Every office would be bestowed on aliens. Absenteeism would curse us with all its vices. Superadded to these, sinking us into a lower abyss of degradation, we should be made the slaves of our slaves, hewers of wood and drawers of water for those upon whom God has stamped indelibly the marks of physical and intellectual inferiority. The past or foreign countries need not be searched to furnish illustrations of the heritage of shame that subjugation would entail. Baltimore, St. Louis, Nashville, Knoxville, New Orleans, Vicksburg, Huntsville, Norfolk, Newburn, Louisville, and Fredericksburg are the first fruits of the ignominy and poverty of Yankee domination.

The sad story of the wrongs and indignities endured by those States which have been in the complete or partial possession of the enemy, will give the best evidence of the consequences of subjugation. Missouri, a magnificent empire of agricultural and mineral wealth, is to-day a smoking ruin and the theatre of the most revolting cruelties and barbarisms. The minions of tyranny consume her substance, plunder her citizens, and destroy her peace. The sacred rights of freemen are struck down, and the blood of her children, her maidens and her old men, is made to flow, out of mere wantonness and recklessness. No whispers of freedom go unpunished, and the very instincts of self-preservation are outlawed. The worship of God and the rights of sepulture have been shamefully interrupted, and, in many instances, the cultivation of the soil is prohibited to her own citizens. These facts are attested by many witnesses; and it is but a just tribute to that noble and chivalrous people, that, amid barbarities almost unparalleled, they still maintain a proud and defiant spirit towards their enemies.

In Maryland, the judiciary, made subservient to executive absolutism, furnishes no security for individual rights or personal freedom; members of the Legislature are arrested and imprisoned without process of law or assignment of cause, and the whole land groaneth under the oppressions of a merciless tyranny.

In Kentucky, the ballot-box has been overthrown, free speech is suppressed, the most vexatious annoyances harass and embitter the unhappy people, and all the arts and appliances of an unscrupulous despotism are freely used to prevent the uprising of the noble patriots. Notes of gladness, assurances of a brighter and better day, reach us, and the exiles may take courage and hope for the future.

In Virginia, the model of all that illustrates human heroism and self-denying patriotism, although the tempest of desolation has swept over her fair domains, no sign of repentance for her separation from the North can be found. Her old homesteads dismantled, her ancestral relics destroyed, her people impoverished, her territory made the battle-ground for the rude shocks of contending hosts, and then divided, with hireling parasites mockingly claiming jurisdiction and authority, the Old Dominion still stands with proud crest and defiant mien, ready to trample beneath her heel every usurper and tyrant, and to illustrate afresh her sic semper tyrannis, the 'proudest motto that ever blazed on a nation's shield or a warrior's arms.'

To prevent such effects our people are now prosecuting this struggle. It is no mere war of calculation, no contest for a particular kind of property, no barter of precious blood for filthy lucre. Everything involved in manhood civilisation, religion, law, property, country, home—is at stake. We fight not for plunder, spoils, pillage, territorial conquest. The Government tempts by no prizes of 'beauty or booty,' to be drawn in the lottery of this war. We seek to preserve civil freedom, honour, equality, firesides; and blood is well shed, when 'shed for our family, for our friends, for our kind, for our country, for our God.' Burke said, 'A State resolved to hazard its existence rather than abandon its object, must have an infinite advantage over that which is resolved to yield rather than carry its resistance beyond a certain point.' It is better to be conquered by any other nation than by the United States. It is better to be a dependency of any other power than of that. By the condition of its existence and essential constitution, as now governed, it must be in perpetual hostility to us. As the Spanish invader burned his ships to make retreat impossible, so we cannot afford to take steps backward. Retreat is more dangerous than advance. Behind us are inferiority and degradation. Before us is everything enticing to a patriot.

Our bitter and implacable foes are preparing vigorously for the coming campaign. Corresponding efforts should be made on our part. Without murmuring our people should respond to the laws which the exigency demands. Every one capable of bearing arms should be connected with some effective military organisation. The utmost energies of the whole population should be taxed to produce food and clothing, and a spirit of cheerfulness and trust in an allwise and overruling Providence should be cultivated.

The history of the past three years has much to animate us to renewed effort and a firmer and more assured hope. A whole people have given their hearts and bodies to repel the invader, and costly sacrifices have been made on the altar of our country. No similar instance is to be found of such spontaneous uprising and volunteering. Inspired by a holy patriotism, again and again have our brave soldiers, with the aid of Heaven, baffled the efforts of our foes. It is in no arrogant spirit that we refer to successes that have cost us so much blood, and brought sorrow to so many hearts. We may find in all this an earnest of what, with determined and resolute exertion, we can do to avert subjugation and slavery; and we cannot fail to discern in our deliverance from so many and so great perils, the interposition of that Being who will not forsake us in the trials that are to come. Let us, then, looking upon the bodies of our loved and honoured dead, catch inspiration from their example, and gather renewed confidence and a firmer resolve to tread, with unfaltering trust, the path that leads to honour and peace, although it lead through tears and suffering and blood.

We have no alternative but to do our duty. We combat for property, homes, the honour of our wives, the future of our children, the preservation of our fair land from pollution, and to avert a doom which we can read both in the threats of our enemies and the acts of oppression we have alluded to in this address.

The situation is grave, but furnishes no just excuse for despondence. Instead of harsh criticisms on the Government and our generals—instead of bewailing the failure to accomplish impossibilities, we should rather be grateful, humbly and profoundly, to a benignant Providence for the results that have rewarded our labours. Remembering the disproportion in population, in military and naval resources, and the deficiency of skilled labour in the South, our accomplishments have surpassed those recorded of any people in the annals of the world. There is no just reason for hopelessness or fear. Since the outbreak of the war the South has lost the nominal possession of the Mississippi river and fragments of her territory; but Federal occupancy is not conquest. The fires of patriotism still burn unquenchably in the breasts of those who are subject to foreign domination. We yet have in our uninterrupted control a territory which, according to past progress, will require the enemy ten years to overrun.

The enemy is not free from difficulties. With an enormous debt, the financial convulsion, long postponed, is surely coming. The short crops in the United States and abundant harvests in Europe will hasten what was otherwise inevitable. Many sagacious persons at the North discover in the usurpations of their Government the certain overthrow of their liberties. A large number revolt from the unjust war waged upon the South, and would gladly bring it to an end. Others look with alarm upon the complete subversion of constitutional freedom by Abraham Lincoln, and feel in their own persons the bitterness of the slavery which three years of war have failed to inflict on the South. Brave and earnest men at the North have spoken out against the usurpation and cruelties daily practised. The success of these men over the radical and despotic faction which now rules the North may open the way to peaceful negotiation and a cessation of this bloody and unnecessary war.

In conclusion, we exhort our fellow-citizens to be of good cheer and spare no labour, no sacrifices, that may be necessary to enable us to win the campaign upon which we have just entered. We have passed through great trials of affliction, but suffering and humiliation are the schoolmasters that lead nations to self-reliance and independence. These disciplinary providences but mature and develope and solidify our people. We beg that the supplies and resources of the country, which are ample, may be sold to the Government to support and equip its armies. Let all spirit of faction and past party differences be forgotten in the presence of our cruel foe. We should not despond. We should be self-denying. We should labour to extend to the utmost the productive resources of the country. We should economise. The families of soldiers should be cared for and liberally supplied. We entreat from all a generous and hearty cooperation with the Government in all branches of its administration, and with the agents, civil or military, in the performance of their duties. Moral aid has the 'power of the incommunicable,' and by united efforts, by an all-comprehending and self-sacrificing patriotism, we can, with the blessing of God, avert the perils which environ us, and achieve for ourselves and children peace and freedom. Hitherto, the Lord has interposed graciously to bring us victory, and in His hand there is present power to prevent this great multitude which come against us from casting us out of the possession which He has given us to inherit.

THE MAGAZINES.

Blackwood's Magazine sustains its high political reputation by a remarkably able article on the debate provoked by the seizure of Messrs. Laird's steam-rams. Of all the papers we have read on this much-vexed question, this seems to us the most cogently and closely reasoned. The writer points out at the beginning under what circumstances that debate arose. Three days before he seized the rams, Lord Russell had formally declared to Mr. Adams that he could not seize them; and it did not appear that any evidence to justify that step had been produced in the meantime. There arose, therefore, a strong suspicion that Lord Russell had yielded to the menaces of Mr. Adams, and had done an act legally indefensible at the instigation of a foreign Government. This was the argument of the Opposition; and the writer in Blackwood shows, by a careful analysis of the debate, that it was not answered by the Government. They alleged that fresh evidence had, in the interval between the refusal to seize and the seizure, come into their hands. But they produced no such evidence before the House: and the language of the Attorney-General, who admitted that the Government had acted 'on their own responsibility'—that is, had transgressed the law—implies that it was not of a character to afford them a legal justification. It stood confessed, then, that the law of England had been broken, not by Messrs. Laird, but by the Ministry. The task of justifying this violation of law was undertaken by the Solicitor-General, after the magnificent speech of Sir Hugh Cairns had placed the fact of such violation beyond question. The Minister affirmed that international law bound us to such a step, because we had always insisted that neutrals had no right to supply ships to belligerents. That this is not true is a matter of notoriety; and the writer of the article before us quotes in reply to it the declaration of the Attorney-General in the Alexandra case, that international law permits the sale of armed ships by neutrals to belligerents, and that such a transaction would not, on merely international grounds, give the Americans any cause of complaint against us. It results from the debate as is clearly shown in this essay—that the Government did break the law of England in order to satisfy the demands of the envoy of the United States: that they were guilty of the charge brought against them. Whether that guilt were venial or not seems to depend upon the further question, how far the Federal demands were well-founded. Into this question, accordingly, the writer next enters. He establishes clearly, first, the right according to international law to build ships for a foreign Power: secondly, the duration of this right, unaltered by the intervention of war. He goes on to remark that as there is no law which requires the seller of a ship to deliver it at a port of the purchaser's Government, therefore the existence of a blockade of all the ports of a foreign Power does not supersede the right of neutrals to sell ships to that Power; and concludes that 'international law the only law of which a foreign Government has a right to demand the execution does not prevent the bonâ fide sale of a ship of war to a belligerent;' and further, that the object of the Foreign Enlistment Act was not to prevent trade in ships, but to put a stop to acts of private war under a foreign flag. The partisans of the Ministry have gone up and down proclaiming that these ships were justly seized because they were intended for the South: while it remains unproved that the South has not a perfect right to buy ships from us, provided she do not take them out of our ports armed, manned, and in fighting trim. This is highly reprehensible; and more reprehensible still is the abuse which has been lavished on those who do not take that peculiar view of neutrality some time since enunciated by Mr. Bright, and now adopted by the Administration. 'Mr. Laird is gravely lectured on the enormity of wishing to forward his own commercial interests at the risk of involving his country in war—that is, he is pronounced culpable because he did not cease his customary trade, not at the dictation of the law, but in accordance with the opinions of a certain party; those opinions being based on the absurd assumption that the Federal Government has a right to dictate the terms of our municipal law under penalty of war.' It is admitted that there is no municipal law which will justify the acts of the Government; and the correspondence of the Government with Messrs. Laird proves that those acts were not necessary in order to prevent the evasion of the rams pendente lite: therefore the Ministry has clearly done wrong. It seems that there is no municipal law forbidding distinctly the building and sale of ships of war for a belligerent Power; therefore Mr. Laird has been wronged, both by the censures of Ministerial partisans and by the acts of the Ministry. It is clear that there is no international law which forbids the South to buy ships in Liverpool: therefore, in seizing ships on the ground that they were so bought, we have done a grievous wrong to the South.

Having disposed of the question of law, the writer takes up that of interest, and his remarks on this subject well deserve attention.

We have a right to take sides with either party, as our feelings or our interests lead us. But to do so is not to be neutral. If our interests lead us to favour the North, as is affirmed by the only independent reasoners who have ventured to defend the course of the Administration, we have a right to favour the North, but we have not a right to call such favour neutrality. Those who argue that we ought to concede the demands of the North, because our interests as a paramount maritime Power lie in the same direction, argue in fact that we ought not to be honestly neutral. What, then, is our interest?

1st. It is said that it is our interest to keep the peace: and that if we let the rams go, we shall have war. Well, and if we have? War will give us cotton, and open to us the Southern markets. War will sweep American cruisers and American commerce from the seas. War will put an end to those dangers which menace us if the South should be conquered. And, grant that war be never so terrible, can it be averted by concession? Will not our unworthy yielding to unjust demands make the Northerners more insolent, more aggressive, and more bellicose? No one who knows them doubts it.

2nd. It is said to be our interest, as a great maritime Power, to prevent the neutralisation of our maritime supremacy by cruisers issuing from the ports of Powers with whom we are at peace, under the flag of those with whom we may be at war. But the fact is, that no country except America could turn out ships dangerous to us, or else the South would have gone to that country to buy the ships which we refuse her. Now America is pretty sure to be our enemy whenever we do go to war, with whomsoever we may be engaged, and it is vain to make sacrifices to avert her inevitable hostility. And no other Power will consent to be bound by precedents which we have established, ex hypothesi, solely from regard to our own interests as the greatest of naval Powers. We need hardly trouble ourselves to prove, by her past course and her present demands, how little respect the American Government entertains even for precedents of its own making. And we may be sure that our seizing or releasing these rams will neither cause other nations to refrain from sending forth Alabamas from neutral ports when we shall be at war, nor offer them additional inducement to do so. Their conduct then will depend on their then convenience, not on our present example. It is not then our policy to depart from neutrality in favour of the North: and the advances which we have made in that direction involve as great a sacrifice of interest as of honour. Such is the final conclusion of one of the clearest and most exhaustive essays which it has been for some time past our fortune to read.

The rest of the magazine is quite up to the usual level: and there is an entertaining account of the successes and final defeat of a notorious advertising swindler, contributed by 'Cornelius O'Dowd,' which ought not to pass unnoticed. The article of greatest importance, next to that on 'Our Neutrality,' is a 'Letter from Schleswig Holstein,' written by a violent partisan of the ultra-German faction, as hostile to Austria and Prussia as to Denmark. Apart from the writer's opinions, the paper seems a good and sensible one, but its contents are not of very great value. 'Past and Present Troubles in Herat and Afghanistan' is not full or explanatory enough to render the importance of the subject fully intelligible to uninformed readers. To do this would have required a hundred pages; and only twelve were at the writer's disposal. 'Annie and her Master' is a tale of maiden shyness and lovers' misunderstandings, pretty, but not very sensible. We wonder what the fair readers of Blackwood will say to the final scene, in which the heroine lays her head on her lover's feet, and kisses his boots, to the great satisfaction of his mother. Does the kind of relation so indicated really subsist between German wives and husbands; or does the action only convey the author's idea of what ought to be?

The pièce de résistance in Fraser is an article on Russia and her dependencies, which deals chiefly with the Caucasus. Its tone is rational and moderate, neither exaggerating nor unduly depreciating the dangerous ambition and aggressive designs of Russia; but the impression left on the reader is one of disappointment. Much more might have been made, and ought to have been made, out of a subject so vast, so important, and so suggestive. We learn little or nothing of the force of Russia, of her method of administration, or of her relations with the subject populations of Turkey, or of her alleged encroachments on Persia and China: and these are the questions in which Europe, and especially England, is most interested. The article is therefore dull. That which concludes the number—'How may a Peace Income-tax be supplanted?'—is decidedly better. The author's preference is for a house-tax, extending to houses of 16*l.* in value, exempting 8*l.* of the rental, or even 12*l.*, and levied at the rate of half-a-crown or three shillings in the pound—less than the local taxation of many urban parishes. This, he conceives, would enable us to reduce the income-tax to 2*d.* or 3*d.* in time of peace, leaving us with a large financial margin for times of war. The suggestion is not new, but it deserves consideration. The writer meets many of the obvious objections to his scheme with great skill and clearness; but he unfortunately omits to give us the statistical evidence which alone could justify it.

The Cornhill contains two more chapters of 'Denis Duval,' a continuation of 'Margaret Denzil,' and the conclusion of Mr. Trollope's story. Several of the minor articles are readable—the most thoughtful being one on 'Pagan and Christian Religious Sentiment,' and the poorest that 'On Words best left Unsaid,' which in no other respect answers to its title than that it had best been left unwritten.

Macmillan contains several good articles. There is an 'Inaugural Lecture on Political Economy,' by the Professor of that science at Cambridge, Mr. Fawcett, which is sound and sensible. 'Subscription no Security,' by the Dean of Christ Church College, Oxford, is intended to pave the way for a movement against the Articles, leaving them still as the law of the Church, but removing the obligation of signature. The effect of this would be that the disciples of Jowett and Colenso might swarm into our pulpits and places of ecclesiastical dignity, unchecked by any necessity of professing their belief in the Church's doctrines, and use their position and revenues, derived from the Church, to undermine the faith she teaches. The only way of getting rid of them would be by prosecution, which they would denounce as persecution, and which would create scandals and heart-burnings without end. Surely it is better to keep the wolves out of the fold than to let them in with the view of turning them out, if possible, as soon as they fall upon the sheep. The 'Competition Wallah' furnishes a letter on Christianity in India, which does not throw any new light on the subject. It contains, however, two sensible remarks:—First, that secular education has hitherto succeeded in disabusing Hindoos of their Hindoo superstitions, but has not tended in any degree to Christianise them. Instructed in classics and mathematics, in science, literature, and law, the Hindoo youth becomes, not a Christian gentleman, but an obstinate and self-satisfied infidel. Secondly, that the very un-Christian life and spirit of a large proportion of English planters, merchants, and journalists in India offer a continual and very effective contradiction to the preaching of the missionaries. The article on 'Sleep and Dreams,' by the Rev. Dr. Cunningham, is interesting and readable, dealing with the question whether we ever become absolutely unconscious in sleep, or whether the absence of any recollection of dreams, when we wake, is due simply to the discontinuance of memory.

London Society is as trivial, pleasant, and amusing as ever, affording little ground for notice and none for censure. There is no better reading for a tired man, who has been overworked all day, and is compelled to find his recreation at night in the company of books rather than of friends, than this lively and well-named magazine affords. True, we never remember anything it contains for a week, any more than we remember the conversation of a ball-room; but it always gives us pleasure at the time, and leaves behind an impression of moments agreeably if not profitably bestowed.

Good Words contains several articles of a distinctly religious type, an instalment of a good story, and a paper on coal-mines, giving an interesting account of a new coal-mining machine, worked by means of compressed air, which promises to do the hardest and most perilous part of the miner's work. The article might, with advantage, have been longer and more explicit, seeing how few of us understand anything about the internal appearance and arrangements of a coal-mine. There is also an interesting paper on 'Stenography,' by a Parliamentary reporter.

Married.—At the residence of the bride's mother, on the evening of the 18th inst., by the Rt. Rev. Bishop Quinlan, of Mobile, Miss Electra Louisa, eldest daughter of Commodore and Mrs. Raphael Semmes, C. S. Navy, to Pendleton Colston, Esq., Judge-Advocate of the Navy.—Mobile Register.

A QUERY.

To the Editor of The Index.

Sir,—Whatever may be Earl Russell's faults as a statesman or as a diplomatist, he has at least had the manliness to profit voluntarily by the very first opportunity for exposing the trick practised on him by the forged Mallory 'Report.' Will you permit me to ask through your columns when Sir Roundell Palmer, who quoted at length from that document in his place in Parliament, will make the amend which he owes in an even greater degree than Earl Russell?—Respectfully,

An Enquirer.

The Morning Post of to-day, commenting upon the Federal practice of foisting forged documents on Her Majesty's Government, concludes its article with the following gentle but significant warning:—'For the second time this species of fraud has been successfully practised upon English officials, the effect of which, both upon the Government and people of Great Britain, must be to cast a grave shadow of doubt over communications of a similar character which may be hereafter made by the United States Government. International courtesy may require that statements made with so much gravity should be respectfully considered, but the too frequent use of such means as were employed in the two cases referred to, to stimulate the British Government to act upon evidence furnished by forged papers, is well calculated to create a distrust and a reserve which cannot fail in the end to produce unpleasant, if not more serious, consequences.'

The Prospects of the North.—The Army and Navy Gazette of April 9 says: 'We have through good and evil held to the faith that the North must succeed. But ignorance and incapacity, faction and corruption, may counterbalance all the influences which should operate in producing a natural result. The Union, let us say it for the twentieth time, can never be restored. It begins to be doubtful at last if the means which the Northerners employ to subjugate the South are equal to the work.'

A Confederate Wedding.—The Mémorial Diplomatique gives the following account of a recent marriage in Paris, which will be interesting to a circle of friends of the parties in the Confederate States:—'A touching ceremony has lately been celebrated in Paris—a marriage between two citizens of the Confederate States of America. The lady is the daughter of an eminent surgeon, one of those creations of nature in her gayest and most indulgent moments; for two years she had been engaged to a young surgeon of the Confederate army, who had been taken prisoner, but being put on parole had seized the opportunity to join his lady-love in Paris. After some months of bliss the young man was exchanged; duty recalled him to his country. What was he to do? He could not ask a young lady to undergo all the dangers and fatigues of a campaign. But to return without being married was too terrible! The young people had not the courage to decide for themselves, when the lady's father solved the difficulty; marriage was decided on. The bridegroom was on the eve of departure; the very next day at eleven o'clock the ceremony was performed by a Protestant minister. The lady wore a simple muslin dress; a veil of "tulle illusion," thrown negligently over her head, scarcely hid the beauty and sadness of her countenance; a small bouquet of natural orange flowers was her only other ornament. The bridegroom, a handsome young man, full of courage and noble sentiments, wore his uniform with as much grace as dignity. None were present at this touching ceremony save the family and their most intimate friends. The same evening this husband of a few hours old was on his way to obey his country's call, leaving his young bride under her father's roof.'

A Horrible Narrative.—A shocking crime has been committed by a band of negroes at Port-au-Prince (Hayti). The following are the details of this most revolting murder as reported in the Gazette des Tribunaux. Towards the middle of December last, a negro of the name of Congo, finding himself reduced to the last stage of necessity, had recourse to the oracle of the negro god Veaudou to discover how he might better himself; the god commanded him to offer a human sacrifice; he communicated the command to his sister, Jeanne Pellé, also a believer in negro 'spiritualism.' At that time a child called Claircine, of the age of eight years, a niece of Jeanne Pellé, was residing with her aunt; she was fixed upon by the brother and sister as the destined sacrifice. On the morning of December 28, the child Claircine was induced by the arts of Congo and his sister to commit herself to their protection during the absence of her mother, who resided near the spot. When in her uncle's hut, she was ordered by him to go to the dwelling of Julien, another accomplice, in whose house the crime was to be perpetrated. The poor child started, but, as if foreseeing her destruction, soon returned, saying that she had missed her road; the bloodthirsty ruffian was not to be baulked of his prey; he took her by the hand, led her to the house, and delivered her up to Julien in the presence of three other negroes of the names of Floréal, Guerrier, and Beya. They seized on their victim, gagged and bound her, and deposited her in a mysterious spot dedicated to the god Veaudou, and called by his votaries 'humfort.' Neréine, the wife of Floréal, having seen the child in this pitiable state, was admitted by her husband into the secret. For four days did the wretched child linger in this condition, while Congo and his sister Jeanne were unceasing in their pretended searches after her; the unfortunate mother was told that a 'pana' or soothsayer of the name of Dago had been consulted, and had declared that the child had been carried off by spirits. At the end of the four days the infernal crew, believing that their clumsy stratagem had lulled to rest all suspicion, proceeded to complete their crime; they met on December 30, at 10 P.M., eight in number, Floréal, Jeanne, Congo, Guerrier, Neréine, Rosécide, Julien, and Beya, all votaries of the god Veaudou, a divinity whose followers are only remarkable for their abject ignorance, their brutish laziness, and their diabolical malice. The poor child was brought in, already, we trust, half dead under the exposure and privations of the last four days; from the arms of Congo she was delivered to the hands of Jeanne, a creature of her own race, of her own sex, of her own blood; the fiend clutched her round the throat, while Floréal held her sides, and Guerrier restrained the weak and convulsive struggles of her lower limbs. A few moments and a short spasmodic agony, and the little life was departed. Then began a butchery and a cannibalism more revolting than was ever conceived in the brain of man; the head was cut off, and the eight wolves, or worse than wolves, threw themselves on the mutilated trunk, tearing it limb from limb. The remaining story is too horrible; suffice it to say that orgies at which a cannibal would turn faint, feasts from which the most degraded of brutes would revolt, were celebrated that night in the cabin of Jeanne Pellé. The head was carried off and boiled with yams; it was then placed on an altar, and a procession formed round it, accompanied by some mysterious invocation to their god. A second feast was then made, the head having apparently been reserved as the choicest item in this feast of devils. The blood, bones, and other remains of the poor little victim were reduced to powder and buried at a little distance. On the completion of the rite the party separated intoxicated with blood, and promising to meet again on January 12 for a similar sacrifice, for which another child was designated. Thank God that such crimes do not long fester in concealment; the eight cannibals were arrested and charged with the crime. They confessed it in the most unconcerned manner, trusting entirely to the protection of the god Veaudon, so fearfully propitiated. After a verification of the facts they were all condemned to death, and the sentence appointed to be executed on the open space attached to the town cemetery, in full sight, we earnestly hope, of all their fellows and compatriots.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKET.

WEDNESDAY EVENING.

THERE is very little change in the state of the Money Market, but if anything there is a tendency to rather more ease. For legitimate mercantile purposes the demand for accommodation has not been beyond the general average, but occasional pressure has been experienced in consequence of the repayment of advances to the Bank; but, on the other hand, the disbursement of the dividends has to a great extent eased the market; still available capital is not anywhere abundant. The present very fine weather has caused a better feeling to prevail, and should it continue, a further improvement may be looked for, unless an increased demand for money should be stimulated by the continued introduction of new joint-stock projects. Out of doors the terms demanded for accommodation are from 5⅞ to 6 per cent., and the joint-stock banks are obtaining 5⅞ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money has been in considerable request in connection with the account, and very high rates indeed have been paid for carrying over. Short loans on Government Securities, however, are now negotiated at from 4½ to 5½ per cent.

HOME AND FOREIGN SECURITIES.

The English Stock Market has been steady throughout the week, and business has been tolerably active, nothing of a political character having occurred to cause any retrograde movement, although occasionally a slightly declining tendency has been exhibited, through the bullion movements continuing rather of an adverse tendency. The dealers, notwithstanding, appear to transact business with far more freedom, which in a great measure tends to support prices. Consols closed this evening at 91½ to 91⅝ for money and 91¾ to 91⅞ for the account, which, as compared with this day week, is an improvement of about ⅛ per cent. Exchequer Bills are not quite so good, having receded to 7s. to 2s. dis. A good business has also been transacted in the Foreign Stock Market, but the chief operations have been in Mexican, which have considerably advanced in consequence of the announcement of the immediate intended departure of the Emperor Maximilian for Mexico, and the more satisfactory arrangement with regard to the position of the existing bondholders. Greek stock has also been extensively dealt in, and has advanced from ¾ to 1 per cent. Spanish securities remain steady, but Turkish descriptions have declined from 1 to 3 per cent. The closing prices this evening were: Greek, 25¾ to 26¼: Mexican, 46⅞ to 47⅛; Spanish Passives, 35⅛ to 35⅜; do. Certificates, 13 to 13¼; Turkish six per cents. (1854), 90 to 90¼; and do. do. (1862) 71 to 71¼.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market has been steady all the week, the price advancing again to 54 to 56. We close 53 to 55, with a fair market.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

On the whole, a fair average business has been transacted in American Government and Railway Securities; but still there is very little disposition to press business in this class of securities in face of the continued accounts of the satisfactory progress made by the Confederate troops. With one or two trifling exceptions prices exhibit a further tendency to depression, and there does not appear, at present, much prospect of any improvement. The dealings recorded are in Atlantic and Great Western, New York section, at 79; ditto Pennsylvania section, 77, 78, 76, 77, 76, 76½ and 76; Erie, $100 shares all paid, 68; Illinois Central 7 per cents. 66½; ditto $100 shares, $90 paid, 15½ discount; ditto all paid, 71¼ and 73; Michigan Central, 68 and 69¼; and Panama Railway, second mortgage, 105 and 104.

THE MEXICAN DEBT.

A meeting of the Mexican bondholders was held on Monday, Mr. Capel in the chair, for the purpose of considering the terms to be insisted upon by the creditors under the old debt, in the issuing of the proposed new loan. The terms now offered are, in effect, to capitalise the bonded coupons representing the arrears, with the exception of 1*l*. 10*s*., to be paid in cash within two months from March, and 1*l*. 10*s*. in July. For the remainder, 47*l*. 10*s*., bonds will be issued, bearing 3 per cent. interest, so that each existing 100*l*. stock will stand at 147*l*. 10*s*., and of the loan about to be issued, sufficient is to be retained to pay two years' interest. In the course of a lengthened conversation, it was explained that the old and the new debt would stand on precisely the same footing in regard to their claims upon the customs and other duties liable for the interest. It was eventually agreed unanimously to accept the terms offered.

NEW SWEDISH LOAN.

A new loan for the Swedish Government has just been announced by Messrs. J. H. Schröder and Co. The amount is to be 2,223,000*l*., in a four and a half per cent. loan, at 92½, 5 per cent. being payable on application, and 15 per cent. on allotment, with three subsequent instalments of 20 per cent., and one of 12½ per cent. The bonds will be issued in sums of 1,000*l*., 500*l*., 200*l*., 100*l*., with coupons payable in sterling half-yearly in London, viz., on April 15 and October 15. Through a sinking fund the loan will be redeemed at par in the course of 54 years by half-yearly drawings, the first of which will take effect on the 15th October next. The Swedish Government, however, reserves to itself the right to repay the whole loan at par after the expiration of 15 years from this time.

LIVERPOOL: Wednesday, April 13.

There has again been a reaction in our cotton market. The transactions in all quarters have greatly increased within the last few days, and prices exhibit an upward tendency. The sales this week have reached 69,000 bales, of which 31,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year down to the present time have been 538,240 bales, whilst for the corresponding period in 1863 they were 489,770 bales. The total imports this year have been 492.276 bales, and to the like period last year 320,757 bales. There have been exported this year 89,810 bales, whilst to the same period in 1863 the exports were 88,567 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 374,100 bales, whilst last year they were 261,100 bales: 122,270 bales have been taken on speculation this year against 125,400 bales in 1863. The quantity of cotton at present arriving from India and China is very large. Since Saturday nearly 100,000 bales have reached Liverpool from Bombay and the China ports. There have also been several arrivals from Matamoras, Nassau, and Bermuda, all laden with 'blockade-run' cotton. The latest official quotations are, American descriptions, 23*d*. to 27½*d*.: Pernambuco, 25½*d*. to 27½*d*.; Maranhams, 27½*d*. to 28*d*.; Maceio, 25½*d*. to 27½*d*.; Bahia, 25¾*d*. to 27¾*d*.; Egyptian, 27*d*. to 30*d*.; Smyrna, 22½*d*. to 26¼*d*.; Surats, 12½*d*. to 22½*d*.; and China, 17½*d*. to 18½*d*.

Notwithstanding the general improvement in the Liverpool market, there has not been a corresponding improvement at Manchester. Although it has to a slight extent told upon yarns, it has not had the effect of causing increased enquiries either for cloths or yarns. Manufacturers, it is true, have rather more to pay for cotton now, which disposes them to be firm as regards prices, and to ask somewhat higher for anything they have to make. The cloth market, in fact, presents few characteristics differing from that of last week, the operations being few, and the demand slight. Quotations for cloth in stock remain without alteration, but sellers are not more able to effect sales and certainly not more able to realise any advance upon them than last week. The yarn market has been more immediately affected by the improvement in cotton, and some considerable sales have been made to shippers at very full prices, chiefly for India and the Mediterranean. Dealers in home trade yarns report a better market generally, and prices are about ½*d*. per lb. above the rates of last week, the finer counts of yarn being the dearer of the two, a moderate business having been done in the latter, and the market for all kinds of yarn closes very strong, with an upward tendency. The chief reason why cloth has not responded to the advance at Liverpool to the same extent as yarn, is, that merchants appear to have but few orders in hand, while speculators are deterred from operating by the large and increasing arrivals of cotton, which must at no distant period have the effect of permanently reducing prices.

THERE are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. ASHBRIDGE, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by HENRY HOTZE, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. BREWER, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and DANIEL HUBBARD, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

BUST OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

THE only Bust extant of the President of the Confederate States, modelled by Volk, at Richmond, and the most faithful Likeness of this eminent Statesman, has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund of Liverpool. In conformity with the intentions of the donor, the Bust has been registered under the Designs Act, and a number of casts (quarter size), limited to 500, are offered to the public at the following rates:—

Plaster . . . . . . 5*s*. 0*d*.
Ditto Enameled . . . . . 7*s*. 6*d*.
A l'Ivoire (composition of Wax and Plaster) . 10*s*. 6*d*.
} Carriage free to all parts of the United Kingdom.

The Bust may be seen at the studio of JAMES REDFERN, Esq., 29 Clipstone Street, Fitzroy Square, W., who will also receive orders to execute it in marble; and at the INDEX OFFICE, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The proceeds of the sale of the 500 casts being for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, all orders must be addressed, and money orders made payable, to Mr. HENRY HOTZE, 17 Savile Row, W.

GENERAL THOMAS J. STONEWALL JACKSON.

TWO Continents, both friend and foe, combine to mourn the premature death of General Jackson, hero and Christian. Two years have been sufficient to create a fame which has won the kindly respect of enemies and the admiration of the Old World, which twenty-four months since was ignorant of his existence.

It has been suggested that some general recognition from Great Britain of the worth of such a man, by name, by race, and by character related to us, although the citizen of another land, would be a graceful token of friendly feeling from the old country to our kinsmen across the Atlantic.

The eminent sculptor, J. H. Foley, Esq., R.A., has undertaken to execute a Marble Statue, heroic size, of the General, for 1,000*l.*, while 500*l.* may be required for pedestal, inscription, and other extras. Accordingly, for 1,500*l.* a complete Statue of 'Stonewall' Jackson, by one of our most distinguished sculptors, may be prepared for transmission to his native country when the unhappy war shall have ceased. Towards raising this sum, the Subscriptions of our countrymen and countrywomen are earnestly solicited. Central and Local Committees, with auxiliary Ladies' Committees, are being formed to collect the necessary funds.

The undersigned will gladly receive Subscriptions until the final arrangements are made, and an account has been opened for 'General Jackson's Statue,' at Messrs. Coutts & Co.'s, Strand, London, W.C.

N.B.—It is not at all intended that Subscriptions to the Statue should imply any opinion on the merits of the American struggle. They will be taken solely and simply as a recognition of the rare personal merit of General Jackson.

AMERICA.

THE China, which arrived at Queenstown April 17th, brought New York dates to the 6th. Heavy rains have suspended all military operations in Virginia. It was estimated that it would require a month to enable the army to move. The reorganisation of the army had produced disaffection and several arrests. The Confederate Commissioner Ould had visited Fortress Monroe and settled the conditions of exchange of prisoners. It is stated in several New York papers that Mrs. Todd White, a sister of Mrs. Lincoln, and a Confederate spy and sympathiser, had passed into the Confederate lines via Fortress Monroe, with her trunks filled with contraband articles and papers, protected from search by an autograph pass from President Lincoln.

The attack on Mobile was suspended, Admiral Farragut having sailed to Pensacola. The Red River expedition had advanced thirty-three miles above Alexandria, and captured some cotton, but a much larger quantity had been burnt.

Generals Forrest and Chalmers, with forces estimated at 7,000 or 8,000, were in West Tennessee. Colonel Marsh, with 600 Federal cavalry, had been defeated. The riots in Illinois are reported quelled. The Governor of Indiana is calling out State troops to guard against invasion. The Confederates occupy Hickman, an important town in Kentucky.

Brownsville, the Rio Grande, and probably all Texas, it is said, will be evacuated by the Federals, the expedition to that State having entirely failed in its objects.

An apprehended raid by the Confederate ram Merrimac No. 2, in the waters of Hampton roads, had caused the hurried departure of the two-turreted monitor Onondaga.

No movements are reported near Chattanooga, but the army of General Johnston was believed to be largely increased.

THE reaffirmation of the Monroe Doctrine by the Federal House of Representatives, and the unanimous passage of a resolution against the recognition of the Mexican Empire, are the most significant items of news brought by late arrivals from America. They are for present political capital, and to be carried out or not, according to circumstances. If the North succeed in subjugating the South, they are to be adhered to, and the conquest of Mexico will be the next work of the victorious Northern armies. If they cannot conquer the South, of course they cannot enter upon more difficult and distant operations, involving also a war with one or more of the greatest powers of Europe. The safety of Mexico from, at least, an effort to overthrow the new Empire rests upon the success of the Southern cause. That and that alone will prevent the attempt to once more plant the 'old flag' upon 'the Halls of the Montezumas.'

IT is a curious fact, and most suggestive of the true mode of dealing with the Yankees, that at this very moment, when Congress is fulminating against monarchy in Mexico, a Bill is passing through its last stages to appropriate five millions of dollars to the extinguishment of certain claims of French citizens on the United States Government, which have been pending for years. These claims are familiar to all acquainted with Congressional history as the 'French spoliation claims.' Truly this is holding the thunderbolts of war in one hand and the olive branch in the other.

KENTUCKY, to all appearance, is destined before long to bear the brunt of war, and to become once more 'the dark and bloody ground,' which its name signifies. In Kentucky, the contest is a civil war, with divided populations, with one Congressional delegation at Richmond and another at Washington, and with thousands of her citizens in both the Federal and Confederate armies. General Forrest, after his bold and successful dash upon Paducah, appears to have fallen back to Western Tennessee, where he has been reinforced by other Confederate chieftains. We have a report that General Jones, with a small cavalry force, had entered the State by Fulkerson's Gap, and it is believed in the North that these expeditions are only preparatory to a formidable invasion by Generals Longstreet, Buckner, and Breckenridge. It is said that the whole Confederate Congressional delegation was engaged in preparing the people for the arrival of the Confederate army. The report from Chattanooga is, that while General Longstreet occupies Kentucky with 26,000 men, General Johnston, with 50,000, is prepared to capture Chattanooga, and occupy Tennessee.

Kentucky, though represented at Washington and in the Federal army, and long occupied by Northern troops, is Southern in heart, and, with a fair opportunity, will throw herself with enthusiasm into the Confederate cause. Her people are disgusted with Federal proclamations, legislative corruption, and rapacity.

If the programme we have indicated be carried out, General Lee will remain quietly on the defensive in Virginia, awaiting that tremendous concentration of troops under Lieutenant-General Grant of which we hear so much, and with which the last stake of the war is to be played by another move on Richmond.

THE progress of the Presidential campaign tends perceptibly to divide the people of the Federal States into discordant factions. The opposition to Mr. Lincoln by war democrats, peace democrats, and the partisans of Fremont, Grant, Chase, and other Republican aspirants, grows every day more violent, and their criticisms of his policy more damaging. All the terrible losses and misfortunes of the war are charged upon the imbecility or corruption of the Administration, and the man who was a short time ago held up as a model of honesty, is now denounced as a traitor. M'Clellan, Rosecrans, every general who has been defeated, charges his defeat upon the Government; while the country holds it responsible for a million of lives lost, and two thousand millions of debt incurred—lives vainly lost, and debt vainly incurred. Under the pretext of political discussion, thousands of newspapers, and thousands of speakers discuss the origin, motives, conduct, and results of the war, and there is considerable probability that before the election in November next, the chief fighting will be between the rival factions of the Northern States.

GENERAL PRESTON, formerly U. S. Minister to Spain, accompanied by General the Prince Polignac, has passed through Texas, en route to the city of Mexico, on a mission to the Imperial Government. The best understanding exists between the Governor of the Mexican States of New Leon and Tamaulipas and the Confederate authorities of Texas, and a large trade has sprung up across the Rio Grande, in which supplies of all kinds are exchanged for cotton.

THE Federal Congress has been four months in session, and has done nothing, as the Tribune complains, 'to replenish the Treasury, fortify the national credit, and shore up our sinking currency.' For a sufficient reason. Not a man of them dare vote the necessary taxation, and then go home and face his constituents. The Confederate Congress passed the most sweeping laws relating to taxes, finance, and conscription, with the assurance that public opinion would sustain and reward them.

'WE are marching on with a tread that is shaking the very foundation of things,' says the New York Examiner, the organ of the Northern Baptists. The cause of this triumphant ejaculation is an order from the Federal Secretary of War, Stanton, authorising the New York Baptist Home Mission Board to take possession of every Baptist chapel in the rebel States. Northern and loyal Baptist ministers, protected by Federal cannon, and escorted by such Generals as Butler and Turchin, are to march down South and enter the promised land as soon as a few slight obstacles — such as the armies of Lee, Johnston, Beauregard, &c. — are removed. There may have been sometime and somewhere acts of religious confiscation and despotism as atrocious as this, but we do not remember them.

PRESIDENT LINCOLN does not lose sight of that war with England which the loyal North looks forward to as the climax of its military enterprises. On March 29th he communicated to Congress the report of Charles B. Stewart, consulting engineer, on the cost of enlarging the canals of New York and Illinois, and making a canal around the Falls of Niagara, to admit Federal gunboats to pass from the Atlantic, through the great lakes, to the Mississippi. The cost will be about fifty millions of dollars — a mere trifle, considering the importance of the undertaking.

WHILE the Federal armies are waiting for recruits, and the Government shrinks from ordering a draft, we learn from a report of the Secretary of the Navy, that thirty-five vessels of war are awaiting their complement of men, while many of the seamen in service are detained, notwithstanding their time has expired, and that but for this forced service, the blockading ships could not be kept on their stations. It appears that no transfer of seamen from the army to the navy has been effected.

IT is not easy to ascertain the losses of the Federal army from any cause, or all causes combined, but we can form some general estimate from particular facts. The New York Times, in speaking of the reorganisation of the army of the Potomac, says all the corps have become greatly reduced in numbers by losses in battle and by disease: the second corps, for example, having lost twenty-five thousand men, or five-eighths of its full number; and others had lost three-quarters. The losses in this army are probably less than an average of the whole, and this would give a loss of 750,000 men. The losses of the present year will probably raise the number to a full million!

A million of men, not reckoning Confederate losses, sacrificed to the Moloch of Northern ambition and greed, and the object of the war very much farther off than when it began!

THE war in the Confederate States is not without its pleasing and romantic incidents. We recorded in our last the marriage of a daughter of Commander Semmes, of the Alabama, to a surgeon of the Confederate army. The gallant General Hood, who has lost a leg and had an arm shattered, is about to wed 'one of South Carolina's fairest daughters.' General Kirby Smith, wounded at the battle of Bull Run, was taken to the residence of a wealthy Virginian, and nursed by his fair daughter, who has since become his wife.

Religious rites are not neglected amid the turmoils of war. Officers and soldiers near Richmond are notified through the press of opportunities for confirmation, and we find in one of our exchanges a notice of the baptism and confirmation of no less distinguished a personage than General Braxton Bragg, by the Bishop of the Episcopal Church of Virginia.

THE strength of the Southern army is not wholly in its numbers, since it has often defeated the Federals with the odds of three to one against it. It is not probable that the Confederate forces in the field have been at any time more than half the number of the Federals. An estimate before us, by a correspondent of the New York World, gives 130,000 under the orders of General Lee in the Department of Virginia, 75,000 under Generals Polk and Johnston in the South-west, 20,000 under General Longstreet, 35,000 at Charleston, Savannah, and Mobile, and 15,000 west of the Mississippi. These items give a total of 275,000 troops; but these, it must be remembered, are disciplined veterans—men who enlisted for three years, and have now renewed their enlistments for the war. To these must be added 150,000 or 200,000 new levies, which will bring the armies up to the necessary numbers. These levies will be used as railway guards, garrisons, &c., so that a force of 300,000 veteran and effective troops will be ready to meet any combination or concentration that can be brought against them.

'THE siege of Charleston,' standing as a permanent heading of the columns of the Courier and Mercury, reminds us of the bills of the London theatres. 'The two hundredth and fifteenth day,' reads like the announcement of the appearances of Miss Bateman or Lord Dundreary. The number of shells thrown for the past twenty-four hours is chronicled, and the mischief done, if any, which is rare, recorded. The boys who watch the descending shells, and dig them out of the ground, in which they burrow to the depth of six or seven feet, with spades and shovels, are cautioned against accidents, while Mrs. Brown informs the public that her boarding-house is removed to a safe and pleasant locality. The fleet refuses to enter the harbour because 'three or four iron-clads would be sure to be disabled, and must be left inside.' The army has got as far as it can, unless the fleet can silence the interior fortifications. Moreover, there are rebel iron-clads in Charleston Harbour, and a new one lately launched, which may sally forth, attack the Federal fleet, break the blockade, cut off the Federal army on the coast, and, perhaps, attack Northern cities. The Federals at Charleston are like the man who caught the wolf by the ears. It is dangerous to hold on and death to let go.

'The crisis of the war is upon us,' shouts the New York Herald. Three hundred thousand veteran and well-disciplined troops in the hands of the ablest and most experienced Confederate generals are skilfully disposed for defensive or aggressive operations. 'They will fight with the stubbornness of despair, and their subjugation, if they are subdued, will be achieved through a series of the most sanguinary battles of any campaign of modern or ancient times.' There is much virtue in an if, but as to the despair, we do not see it. In our Southern files we find plenty of determination, enthusiasm, and devotion, but no appearance of despair. The gloom and desperation are seen more in the press of New York and Boston than in that of Richmond and Charleston.

'Opening day in New York; spring and summer fashions fully described; the modistes in their glory; loves of bonnets, laces, and lingerie; Flora M'Flimsey in full feather; new things in millinery, dress goods, headdresses, jewellery, gems, perfumery,' &c. These are the headings of a description of the spring carnival of the New York milliners, which fills more than four columns of a daily newspaper. Another page contains an appeal for the oppressed and starving needlewomen, with battles, raids, and insurrections, forming very curious material for the future historian.

The spirit of the war, as waged by the North against the South, illustrated by Butler, M'Neil, Turchin, Dahlgren, Sherman, and more than we care to name, was concentrated by Parson Brownlow into a pithy and, at the North, popular apothegm: 'Greek fire for the masses: hell fire for the leaders!'—the first portion of which General Gilmore did his worst to carry into effect at Charleston. The reverend rival of Beecher has expanded his idea in the following pious thought, in his paper, the Knoxville Whig and Rebel Ventilator:—'Had we our wish, we would throw hell wide open, and place all such beast-like officers and men upon an inclined plane, at an angle of forty-five degrees, grease the plank with hog's-lard six inches thick, with a wicket at the bottom, and send them, as one stream of traitors, robbers, and assassins, into the hottest part of the infernal regions.' It would not be just to say that this man is a fair sample of Northern preachers and editors: but it is true that he was not long since listened to by crowds in many of the Northern cities.

Mr. Horace Greeley, engaged in writing one of the thirty odd histories of the war, now in course of publication in the Federal States—and very odd histories many of them are—gives us now and then the benefit of his researches in Tribune leaders. In a recent one on the Richmond campaign, he asserts that the defeats and disasters which have attended every successive 'On to Richmond!' have been caused by the 'stupendous blunders of incapable generals.' M'Dowell was defeated at Bull Run by his own incompetency and the treachery of Patterson. M'Clellan, with 168,000 men, was stopped a month at Yorktown by 7,500, and then lost five opportunities of taking Richmond by his 'sluggishness and timidity.' General Burnside 'was defeated by generals who refused to obey his orders.' General Hooker began his campaign with 123,000 fighting men, present for duty. The 'shock of battle found him incompetent to wield the vast force placed in his hands; and Lee, with 49,700 men, beat him and drove him back across the Rappahannock. He retreated before an enemy whose forces he outnumbered two to one: retreated because he was physically and mentally exhausted, and because one corps commander, [name!, paramount in personal influence, overpersuaded his weakness.' A round about way of charging that he was, in the terser language of our police returns, 'drunk and incapable.' 'Nothing could be plainer, Mr. Greeley concludes, 'than that we have been the victims of incapacity—and of worse qualities—in commanders.' And where is the security that it will not be the same to the end of the chapter?

Senator Wilson stated in Congress lately that there were 40,000 deserters from the Federal army. The common estimate was double this number, or 80,000. By great activity in the Provost-Marshal's department, 28,000 had been returned. 10,000 or 15,000 were supposed to be in Canada.

Gold, which had reached 170, closed April 5, at 169.

ENGLAND.

We have to report further changes of considerable importance in the English Ministry. The Lordship of the Admiralty, rendered vacant by the retirement of Mr. Stansfeld, was offered to Mr. Baxter, M.P. for Montrose, but was declined by him in consequence of his numerous private engagements. The office was subsequently accepted by Mr. Childers, M.P. for Pontefract. The Right Honourable Robert Lowe, M.P., has resigned his office as Vice-President of the Council in deference to the vote of the House of Commons passed on April 12, on the motion of Lord Robert Cecil, with reference to the alleged mutilation of the Educational Reports. The terms of the motion are given in our Parliamentary Notes. Mr. H. A. Bruce, M.P. for Merthyr Tydvil, late Under-Secretary for the Home Department, succeeds Mr. Lowe at the Council.

The Craven Meeting at Newmarket commenced on Monday, April 11, and continued during the four following days. There was a fair muster of visitors, the weather was extremely beautiful, and many of the races were of considerable interest both in relation to the past and the future. The proceedings of the first day began with the Craven Plate, which was won in excellent style by Bathilde the daughter of Stockwell, who, it may be remembered, carried off for her noble owner the Earl of Chesterfield the Cambridgeshire Stakes in 1862. A match for 200*l*. between Catch-'em-Alive, the winner of the Cambridgeshire in 1863, and Lord Glasgow's Clarissimus, excited much attention; the son of Flatcatcher, however, defeated his Lordship's 'most illustrious' animal with much ease. A three-year-old colt named Planet subsequently won a sweepstakes for Mr. Craven, and on the strength of that effort was backed for the Epsom Derby at 1,000 to 8. On Tuesday the Newmarket Handicap was run, for which twelve horses came to the post. The distance to be traversed was one mile and six furlongs, but the configuration of the ground marked the course as one of the most formidable in England. Mr. Savile's Guerilla, the son of Skirmisher, who carried but 5 st. 7 lbs., was made the favourite, while the glorious Asteroid found a host of supporters at 6 to 1. This noble son of Stockwell and Teetotum, now six years old, whose grandeur of shape and immense success have justified Sir Joseph Hawley in boasting the possession of one of the best of race-horses, was in blooming health, and inspired great hopes of victory in spite of the crushing weight of 9 st. 6 lbs. which the handicapper had thought fit to put upon him. The steep hill, however, was too great a trial, and Guerilla achieved an easy victory, the Wandering Minstrel being second and Outlaw third. The only remarkable feature in the sport on Wednesday was the accident to Mr. Nayler's admirable horse Carnival, who, having been made the favourite for the Derby Trial Stakes, broke down in the off hind-leg at the distance, and brought his racing career to a termination. His half-brother Macaroni (for both are sons of Sweetmeat), the winner of the Derby of last year, has also, it is said, retired from the struggles of the turf. So also the mighty Tim Whiffler, victorious at Chester, Epsom, and Doncaster—the most enduring, most sound, and best tempered of racehorses—is destined for the stud: and inasmuch as 'Est in equis patrum virtus,' we may look for no deterioration in the English horse while such sires exist as the stout Tim Whiffler or the excellent son of Sweetmeat. Thursday at Newmarket was marked by an event of striking interest. The great Lord Clifden, whose appearance and qualities have more than once formed a theme of unbounded praise in our columns, came upon the scene of action. This horse, now four years old, the son of Newminster and grandson of Touchstone, has pursued a glorious but chequered career on the turf. As a two-year-old he was never defeated. Last year he was first favourite for the Derby and lost the race by a head to Macaroni, the whole blame of his defeat being, as we at the time intimated, attributable to the injudicious conduct of his rider. Then he was most unfairly raced at the same Epsom meeting, next transported to France, and in an unfit state contested unsuccessfully the Grand Prix at Paris. People shook their heads; some said that Lord Clifden was a mistake, some declared him to be no better than a 'clothes-horse;' others persisted that he was the best horse in the world, and so on the plain of Doncaster he proved himself to be, for he won the St. Leger as no horse ever won a great race before, and now he came to Newmarket to gallop away with the Claret Stakes, and men looked at him, and hailed with an enthusiasm, which even the mere money-seeker felt, his glorious sweeping stride, his coat that shone like burnished copper, and his gallant bearing. But some thought that it was the old story over again, that the trainer had spared his favourite from that severity of toil which alone can ensure victory, that Lord Clifden was the more splendid, precisely because he was the less fit to race; and then these prudent men looked at his antagonist the Rapid Rhone, Lord Glasgow's colt, the son of young Melbourne: and though they scarcely trusted his excess of bone, his conformation not dissimilar from that of the old English coach-horse, yet they perceived that every muscle was visible, that he was the very picture of health and endurance, and they reflected that at Epsom last year the Rapid Rhone was but half a length behind Lord Clifden at the final struggle. The chance was tempting: 2,000*l*. to 500*l*. was laid on Lord Clifden. It was taken by one whose sagacity is a proverb. The race was run, a terrific contest over more than two miles of ground, the last mile on a regular ascent. The rider of Rapid Rhone made furious running, in order, as the phrase goes, to 'cut the favourite down'; and he succeeded. The hill was too severe, Lord Clifden was too sleek, and the colours of the great winner of the St. Leger were struck in defeat. The Rapid Rhone passed the post ten lengths ahead of his antagonist. The course (2 miles 119 yards) was traversed in the short space of 3 minutes 53 seconds. Each horse carried 8 st. 10 lbs. We shall not stay to dilate on the racing of Friday; its most noticeable feature was the success of Baron Rothschild, who carried off the prize in four races, and ran second for a fifth.

Newmarket will again welcome the public on Monday, April 25, on the following day the great Two Thousand Guineas Stakes will be run. For this race Fille de l'Air, the property of Count de Lagrange, is first favourite; but the French stable has but rarely fulfilled sanguine expectations, and the sudden collapse of Hospodar and Stradella may find an antitype. Mr. R. Ten Broeck may glorify the State of Tennessee by a victory with his clever horse Paris; but John Bull has no mean chance with General Peel, Sir Roger, and the champions of Lord Glasgow.

We must not omit to state that on Wednesday, April 13, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales was elected a member of the Jockney Club, on the motion of Lord Coventry, seconded by Admiral Rous. The event will be hailed with delight by all lovers of the national sport.

General Garibaldi will leave London to-morrow morning on his return to Caprera. He will go to Cornwall for a few days, and afterwards will make the trip home on board the Duke of Sutherland's yacht, accompanied by his noble host. Rumour was busy in London on Tuesday inventing reasons for this sudden departure, and all kinds of stories of Government interference at the instigation of the Emperor of the French found credence. It is on the other hand stated, that what with receptions, shows, levees, shouts, and shaking of hands, we have fairly worn out the hero. Much more of this was in store for him in the provinces, and consequently it was thought best to cut away entirely that part of the programme. The Premier in his place in Parliament declared in favour of the latter theory. A meeting has been held at Stafford House, at which it was resolved to open a public subscription to secure for ever from care the General and his family. It is well known that Garibaldi's pecuniary affairs have been embarrassed by his necessary neglect of them for greater objects, and that he has throughout life depended on his personal exertions for his few and simple requirements. Beyond doubt the subscription will amount to a very considerable sum.

We gave our readers last week a cursory glance at the doings of General Garibaldi up to Wednesday, April 13. On the following day Garibaldi received a deputation from the city of Manchester, consisting of the mayor and other authorities charged to present an address from the corporation: afterwards a deputation from the fire brigade, an institution in which the Duke of Sutherland takes the deepest interest, was introduced. The afternoon was consumed in paying visits. In the evening the General, accompanied by a very large party of friends, visited the Royal Italian Opera to witness the performance of 'Norma' and 'Massaniello.' The theatre was crammed to excess with a most fashionable audience, and the General was received with much applause. The part of Norma was played by Mdlle. Emilia Lagrua, and that of Ororeso by Mr. Schmid, from the Imperial Opera of Vienna. The patriotic duet between Massaniello and Pietro was sung by Signors Mario and Graziani with immense éclat. The curtain did not fall till past midnight, and then the audience rose to their feet and cheered loudly, while flowers fell from the boxes on the head of the General as he bent forward to acknowledge the applause of the company. On Friday morning the General left town early by the Great Northern Railway, and proceeded to Bedford. The train conveyed him to the famous Britannia Works of Messrs. Howard, the agricultural engineers. After an inspection of the works, the General with his party visited the Mayor of Bedford, and took luncheon with him. The whole population had turned out and received Garibaldi with waving of flags and shouts of applause. Thence the party drove through the principal street of the town, and beneath a triumphal arch, where the address of the corporation was presented. Afterwards a visit was paid to the farm of Messrs. Howard, where the method of steam-ploughing was exhibited and explained. Garibaldi returned to town in the evening, and dined with Mr. Panizzi, the curator of the British Museum. The Earl of Shaftesbury, Lord Wodehouse, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the Master of the Rolls were invited to the party. On Saturday morning the General visited the brewery of Messrs. Barclay & Perkins, received a deputation from Salford, and then drove to Sydenham to visit the Crystal Palace. He was enthusiastically cheered on his road to the Palace, and on arriving there found a multitude of 24,000 visitors prepared to welcome him. At the Palace the General sat through a concert, saw the splendid fountains play, received, and lunched with, the members of the Italian Committee, and was presented with a sword. In the evening the General dined at Cambridge House with Lord and Lady Palmerston. A distinguished party were invited to dinner, and her Ladyship held a reception in the evening. On Monday morning deputations from the parish of Marylebone, from the Danish residents in London, and from the members of a Polish lodge, waited upon Garibaldi. Then the General drove out and called upon Mr. Karl Blind, M. Ledru Rollin, and M. Louis Blanc. In the afternoon he drove to the Crystal Palace. As on Saturday he had received the welcome of the upper classes, so on Monday was he to receive that of the working classes. Immense preparations had been made, excursion trains had arrived from all parts of England; the weather was most attractive; but, strange to say, there was precisely the same number of visitors on Monday as on Saturday. The General was seated on a dais, and before him innumerable processions of delegates, Freemasons, Odd Fellows, Orange-men, Universal Leaguers, Congregational Dissenters, members of clubs, corporations and associations passed in order. After all these came the Polish and Swiss nationalities. At the sight of the deputation of Poles, Garibaldi rose from his seat, walked forward to the audience and exclaimed, 'Generous English nation, abandon not Poland.' So also to the Swiss he exclaimed, 'And you, also, I beg that you will not allow poor Poland to die.' On his return from Sydenham the General drove to Mr. Seeley's house, at Prince's Gate. In the evening he dined with the Marquis of Clanricarde, where he was met by the Duke of Wellington, Earls Grey, Malmesbury, and Shaftesbury; Lords Sydney, Stratford de Redcliffe, and Elcho, Sir Robert Peel, M.P., Mr. Whiteside, M.P., Mr. Bernal Osborne, M.P., and Mr. Goschen, M.P. Tuesday morning was consumed in paying visits. In the afternoon Garibaldi held a reception at Mr. Seeley's house at Prince's Gate, and from two until six o'clock crowds of ladies and gentlemen came and went. Not less than 1,000 persons of more or less note in London arrived to pay their respects. In the evening Garibaldi went to Her Majesty's Opera, to witness the performance of Lucrezia Borgia. Mdlle. Titiens, Mdlle. Bettleheim, Signor Giuglini, and Signor Gassier supported the principal parts. At the termination of the opera, the whole force of the operatic company sang the new war-song, 'La Garibaldina,' the music of which is by Signor Arditi. Hereupon the applause was so great, that the General, who, up to that time, had sat in the back of the box, came forward, and was received with a burst of enthusiasm. The chorus of the song was then given again, and the audience joined lustily, to the increase of the noise rather than to the correctness of the music. The words of the refrain are these—

O Garibaldi! nostro salvator!
Te seguiremo al campo dell' onor!
Risorga, Italia il sol di Libertà;
All' armi! all' armi! andiam!

The General went yesterday to the Guildhall, where he was presented with the freedom of the City.

Both Houses of Convocation assembled for the first time this year for the despatch of business on Tuesday. In the Upper House the Bishop of London brought up the report of the Committee on the proposed new order of lay teachers in the Church. The report recommended that every incumbent of a parish should be empowered to recommend one or two of his parishioners, being communicants, to be lay teachers to help him, and that the bishop of each diocese should issue by authority his licence to those persons, the licences to extend to the end of each year, and to be determined three months afterwards, if not renewed. After some discussion the report was received and referred to the Lower House. In the Lower House Canon Selwyn proposed Dr. Jelf as Prolocutor in the room of Dr. Eliot, Dean of Bristol, who had resigned. Dr. Jelf declined the office, and thereupon Canon Wordsworth proposed the Ven. Edward Bickersteth, Archdeacon of Buckingham, who was elected unanimously. Canon Wordsworth presented a petition from the Rev. Dr. Rowland Williams, setting forth that the petitioner 'had heard that Convocation would be asked to proceed to judgment of a certain essay of which he was the author. He, therefore, prayed that before judgment he might be heard. The effect of the prosecution had been to exclude discussion of all the questions on sacred literature which he had raised, and in all the organs of opinion of every shade, personalities, not arguments, had been found. He felt that after hearing him the House would not treat as criminally censurable concessions thought laudable when made by Bishop Middleton, by Archbishops Newcome and Secker, by Lousden and Hengstenberg, and by Calvin himself. The petitioner believed Divine revelation to be a spiritual and not a mechanical process. He had endeavoured to solve new difficulties by ancient principles, and would interpret fresh facts or discoveries by the light of those truths which had been most firmly held by every saint in every age. He deprecated the suppression by any means of those general facts of literature and history which might be explained differently by different divines, but which must be taken into account by all.'

The Bishop of Peterborough died on Monday last, at his Palace, at the age of 84. George Davys graduated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and afterwards became a Fellow of that society. He held the curacies of Littlebury and Chesterford, and afterwards that of Swaffham Prior, in the county of Cambridge. In the last-named parish, as we have good reason for knowing, the recollection of his services is still gratefully remembered. Afterwards he was appointed tutor to the Princess Victoria, and resided at Kensington. He was advanced to the Episcopate in 1839. His Lordship belonged to the Evangelical section of the Church, but was not in any way a partisan. Her Majesty the Queen, from her accession to the throne, neglected no opportunity of proving her esteem and regard for her former tutor.

A deputation, headed by Sir M. Peto, M.P., Mr. Horsfall, M.P., the Hon. A. Kinnaird, M.P., Mr. Somes, M.P., Mr. Abel Smith, M.P., and consisting of about 100 representatives of various associations formed for promoting the due observance of the Lord's Day, had an interview with Lord Palmerston at Cambridge House last week. The memorial presented by them prayed His Lordship to discourage the efforts now being made to open places of public amusement on Sunday, and to afford greater facilities to the labouring class to visit such institutions as the British Museum, the National Gallery, and others of a similar character by causing them to be opened on two or three evenings of the week between the hours of seven and ten.

A lesson not without interest may be learned from a proceeding which took place at the quarterly meeting of the Justices at the Middlesex Sessions last week. It may be remembered that last year a bill passed through Parliament empowering the various Courts of Quarter Sessions to appoint ministers not members of the Church of England to attend prisoners of their persuasion, even without any request from the prisoners to that effect. At the meeting in question, Mr. P. N. Laurie moved that, 'whereas it appeared that there were 639 Roman Catholic prisoners in the gaols under their inspection, it was expedient to provide for the regular ministration of ministers of the Roman Catholic Church, who should receive a reasonable payment under the Act, and that a committee be appointed to arrange all details.' To this resolution Mr. Serjeant Payne moved an amendment to the effect that, 'by the existing law prisoners were entitled, at their own request, to be visited by a minister of their own persuasion; that but few prisoners had made such requests, and that all such had been duly visited; that the Court was of opinion that present arrangements were sufficient, and that any appointment for Roman Catholic priests to attend at the prisons on all occasions, whether their ministrations were required or not, would be unnecessary and improper.' Mr. Payne regarded the proposal before them as an attempt to increase the number of Roman Catholic subjects. Three centuries ago their ancestors had fought for an amended form of religion, and they ought to hold by a Reformation which was founded in good sense. There were about 25,000 prisoners in Middlesex in a year, and of these less than 1,000 were Roman Catholics. They were now asked to appoint three priests to attend on these prisoners. When once the door was opened there was no knowing when it would be closed. If they admitted priests there would be a sealed confession, and what would there be to prevent improper communications being made between the priests and the prisoners. He would quote the teaching of Roman Catholic works of high authority. Thus, in 'Den's Theology,' vol. vi. p. 219, he found this passage: Question, 'Can a case be given in which it is lawful to break the sacramental seal?' Answer, 'It cannot, although the life or safety of a man depended thereon, or even the destruction of the Commonwealth.' So in 'Liguori,' vol. vi. p. 276, 'This seal is an obligation of Divine right, most strict in every case, even where the safety of a whole nation would be at stake.' So again in Den's work, vol. vi. p. 219; Question, 'What answer then ought a confessor to give when questioned concerning a truth which he knows from sacramental confession only?' Answer, 'He ought to answer that he does not know it, and if necessary confirm the same with an oath.' He (Mr. Payne) further objected to priests being allowed to visit the women alone, and put questions in the confessional which might be perfectly unjustifiable. It was said that the strong Protestant feeling of the country was sufficient to check Roman Catholic arrogance. He trusted that it was so, and he hoped that resistance would be made to every attack, however small, from a sense of thankfulness that we no longer lived under the blighting influence of a Roman Catholic 'Priesthood.' The chairman on putting the question to the meeting declared the amendment of Mr. Serjeant Payne carried by a majority of 70 to 24. The result was received with loud applause.

An announcement was made on April 13, in the city that the banking-house of Messrs. Masterman, Peters, Mildred and Co. had been amalgamated with the Agra and United Service Bank. The firm of Messrs. Masterman and Co. was established more than a century ago. The Agra and United Service Bank was established at Agra in 1833, and in London in 1857. It has a capital of 2,000,000*l.*, of which half is paid up. The dividend paid by it last year was at the rate of eighteen per cent. Mr. Edward Masterman, Mr. William Peters, and Mr. Frederick Mildred will be actively associated in the management as directors of the united Bank.

Intelligence has been received that Mr. Francis, the vice-consul at Constantinople, had arrived at Cairo to question the Viceroy, on behalf of the English Government respecting El Toussin and El Monassir, the two famous steam-rams at Liverpool. Mr. Hamel, of Liverpool, had also arrived out to represent the Messrs. Laird.

A telegram was received on Tuesday evening to the effect that the Hamburg and American Company's steamship Bavaria, bound from Hamburg to New York via Southampton, had been captured by a Danish frigate off the mouth of the Weser. The Bavaria had a large number of passengers on board and with her cargo was valued at 120,000*l.* sterling. The Germania, belonging to the same line, has arrived at Southampton from New York. She has landed her passengers, and will tranship her cargo into neutral bottoms, and return from Southampton to New York.

The steamship The City of New York which ran aground on Daunt's rock parted amidships at noon on Tuesday, and broke up with the rising tide. Large portions of the wreck drifted towards Cork harbour with the south-westerly gale.

A shocking calamity has befallen the goodly city of Edinburgh. The whole body of scavengers and carters have struck. They insist on entire relief from night-work and Sunday work. Neither the eloquent entreaties of the Lord Provost nor the solemn pledge of the Convener of the Cleaning Committee has moved the obdurate purifiers of the public streets. The recusants number 150 scavengers and 70 carters. Meanwhile the neighbouring farmers, aided by an irregular force of undisciplined scavengers, are vainly endeavouring to prevent the streets from putting on an Augean appearance.

A marvellous dramatic treat was afforded last week at Drury Lane Theatre; an afternoon performance was given of the 'School for Scandal,' and on no previous occasion has greater histrionic talent been called into use. The profits of the performance were given to the funds of the Dramatic College. Mr. Phelps played Sir Peter Teazle, Mr. Charles Mathews represented Charles Surface, Sir Harry was given by Mr. Paul Bedford, and Sir Benjamin Backbite by Mr. Buckstone. Besides these great artists, Messrs. H. Compton, J. L. Toole, Horace Wigan, and Frank Matthews, together with Mrs. Charles Mathews, Mrs. Billington, Mrs. Stirling, and Miss Henrietta Sims, took part in the piece. The theatre was crowded, and the applause immense.

THE CONTINENT.

The ill-success of the allied flank-movement on the Island of Alsen has blighted all hopes of accomplishing much in that direction; the efforts of the besieging army have therefore been concentrated on the fortifications before them. Reversing the legend of the web of Penelope, the destruction of each day is repaired during the night, by the heroic obstinacy of the defenders. Still, the almost superhuman exertions of the Danish engineers are taking severely on their small and overtasked forces; the pale and weary faces, betraying morning and evening from the twelve hours' work in the trenches, tell a tale of physical labour and mental anxiety which can hardly be appreciated, but but to our cost. In the meantime, the Prussian forces are slowly, wearing their way onward, gaining a few yards nightly.

On the 11th inst., a brisk engagement occurred, the end of which was that the Prussians have established themselves within eighty yards of the redoubts, and connected their entrenchments with a new parallel. The Danish Commander-in-Chief has met with a striking accident: a shell burst near him and cut his horse's girth in such an extent as caused him, if not actually to dismount his rider, yet to knock him about so severely on the saddle that he was confined to his bed for a day or two.

Gravenstein, April 12, 9.30 p.m.

'The assault upon the Danish works at Düppel was delivered at 10 this morning. Redoubts No. 1 to No. 7, together with the communications in the rear, were occupied by the Prussians while the brigade Raven took redoubt No. 8, 9, and 10, and the tête de pont. The bridge was destroyed. Up to the present time, 51 Danish officers and 2,000 privates have been brought in prisoners.'—Reuter's Telegrams.

This of course amounts to a capture of the whole position of Düppel.

On the 16th inst. two transports flying the English flag, entered the bay of Horrup, Island of Alsen. Seven Danish merchantmen were directly in that harbour, having been gallantly cut out of Flensburg harbour by a Danish gunboat on the night of the 9th inst. By orders from Copenhagen the blockade of Pillau and Dantzic is to take place from April 19. Several Danish men-of-war, including two frigates and two corvettes, were cruising off the mouths of the Elbe on the 14th inst. Several captures had been made by them.

The German fleet intended to operate in the Baltic will consist of one liner, one iron-clad, and two wooden frigates, three screw and one paddle-wheel gunboat, belonging to the Austrians; one sailing-ship of the line, paddle-wheel corvette, and two small gunboats of the Prussians. Until this force is assembled, the German commanders have been obliged to make use of the cunning of the serpent for its defence. The Russian Government has already remonstrated on the indiscriminate use made of its flag by the German merchantmen; and we now hear that the free town of Bremen has applied to the Swiss Confederacy for permission to use the Swiss flag on the sea. The permission, has, of course, been refused; though it is doubtful what respect the Danish cruisers would have thought fit to pay to a flag which has never yet appeared on the high seas, and would consequently be a more certain sign of hostile character than even the flags of Prussia and Austria.

On the 18th inst.,' the Hamburg and American Company's mail steamer Bavaria which left Hamburg for New York on the 17th inst., was captured by a Danish frigate off the mouth of the Weser. The Bavaria had a large number of passengers on board, and the value of the ship and cargo is estimated at 120,000*l.* The Germania, belonging to the same company, which was to have sailed from Southampton to Hamburg and so to New York, has in consequence of the capture of her sister vessel transhipped her Hamburg cargo into another vessel, and will sail to New York direct from Southampton.

A curious proclamation has been issued by Field-Marshal von Wrangel, ordering all firearms in Jutland to be given up to the military authorities under pain of trial by court-martial; the only exception made is in favour of such royal Danish gamekeepers 'as are furnished with a certificate that they have engaged to supply the game necessary (sic) for the Allied army.' This is the first time that we hear of haunches of venison or braces of partridges being a necessity for an army on active service. A second part of the same proclamation orders that all the poor in Jutland shall be supplied with a year's fire-wood out of the royal forests. This is a most gratuitous and impertinent interference with the royal property, and one which for its insolence and unblushing 'cajoling' after the plebeian vote is only to be paralleled by the confiscations and grants of property made by the United States authorities in Louisiana. Prussian wiseacres are discussing the important question of the title which Field-Marshal von Wrangel is to receive after the victories to be achieved in Denmark: on the whole they incline to the opinion that he should be called Prince von Düppel, on the analogy of Blucher's title after his French victories.

It is supposed that the 22,000 men to be put on active service by Sweden will be ready by the end of May or the beginning of June. This force is not supposed to represent anything but a 'moral' support given to Denmark; but it is obvious that a moral support so energetically realised will have a more serious and weighty effect than the moral support of protocols.

The Austrian journals have expressed themselves very distinctly on the subject of the Conference: they animadvert on the confused and uncertain action of the Diet with regard to the management of the Duchies as well as to the succession of the Ducal throne, necessitating a vigorous course of conduct on the part of the great German powers. They further remark on the singular lukewarmness with which the matter has been practically taken up in Germany; to all the agitations of the Progressist party and the appeals of sentimental patriots a pitiful half million of florins (50,000*l.*) has been the only response. Under these circumstances, they must not be surprised that the Austro-Prussians should disregard any but the European question, and join the Conference in London on the basis of the treaties of 1852.

The choice of the Federal Diet has fallen almost unanimously on Herr von Beust, the Saxon minister, who will accordingly represent that body in the Conference.

The leading points of the principles on which the two German Powers intend to act in the Conference are, according to the official Abend Post of Vienna, 'the inseparability of the Duchies, their occupying towards Germany the position of protected States, and their administrative and political independence.' Baron von Beust, the representative of the German Diet at the Conference, received on the 16th inst. the deputation from the Holstein estates.

The new Emperor of Mexico quitted Miramar on the 14th inst. for his preliminary visit to Rome. His adieux to his brother-emperor were somewhat cold, as was to be expected, after the very cavalier manner in which the Empress Charlotte (late Archduchess) was treated on her visit to Vienna. No member of the Imperial family escorted her to the station, nor were any steps taken to prevent the discourtesy from appearing the same evening in the journals. The question of the succession is, however, at last settled; the new Emperor has renounced all contingent claim to the throne, stipulating only for the honours of an Archduke of Austria. It is known that the whole affair has been viewed with disfavour by the head of the Hapsburgs, who is perhaps not too well pleased to see Imperial crowns given away by his brother of France, even though the recipient be one of his own family. The mot d'ordre in official circles in Vienna now is, 'Mexico and its Emperor are strangers to Austria and its interests;' and great care is taken to point out that there is not even a personal bond of amity between the two empires. This feeling is partly to be accounted for by the conspicuous absence of all mention of Austria in the speech of the Emperor of Mexico—an absence which is readily to be accounted for when we remember how utterly the Cabinet of Vienna ignored the arrangement from its very beginning.

The Convention between France and Mexico has been published. It states that the French troops are to be reduced as soon as possible to 25,000 men, including the foreign legion. The French troops will evacuate Mexico as the organisation of the national troops proceeds. The foreign legion will remain in the country six years after the recall of the other troops. The expense of the French expedition up to July 1861 is fixed at 270,000,000 francs; after July, Mexico will pay an annual indemnity of 1,000 francs for each French soldier. The French debt will be paid off by annual instalments of 25,000,000 francs.

Another important addition has been made to the mineral wealth of Italy by the discovery of a large coal-mine in the territory of Raffadali, province of Girgenti, in Sicily. So large is its extent that it is expected that it will seriously influence the imports of that valuable material from England. The gas that is naturally formed from this coal is said to give a light far superior to that of the English manufactory.

No further news has been received of the Italian frigate Re Galantuomo, spoken last week in a sinking condition off the American coast. A vessel has cruised over the whole of the neighbourhood without seeing sign of ship or any traces of wreck.

The Botschafter publishes the following: 'Turin, April 10.—The journals are silent on an event of some importance in our political circles. Victor Emmanuel has had a second attack of apoplexy: the health of the King, on which all the hopes of Italy are based, is altogether none of the best.'

The state of Greece is by no means reassuring to those who regard that country as a crucial example of the benefit arising from an 'appeal to the population.' The German correspondents in that country, though certainly one-sided in their views, and biassed in their judgments on the affairs of that kingdom, have nevertheless found a sufficiency of facts to add great weight to their strictures. It must be allowed that the enthusiasm of the people, so ardent while revolution only was its object, has sensibly declined ever since it has turned its attention to civilisation and self-government. Difficulties in the Cabinet, insubordination in the army, and sanguinary quarrels between the Greek and Roman creeds among the people, are heavy burdens for a young nation, and lead to grave doubts whether the addition of the Ionian islands to its territory is not rather what they themselves might call cupor dicupor, an incumbrance rather than a benefit.

The destruction of the fortifications in Corfu is complete; nothing remains standing which can be of any use against modern artillery.

A letter has been addressed to the English journals by a director of the Suez Canal Company, pointing out that there are as many English and Scotch now engaged in the works connected with that undertaking as there are Frenchmen. It is unfortunate, therefore, that dissensions should have arisen between the private English residents in Egypt and the local Government. The latter has had to face all the ordinary difficulties of an Oriental administration, aggravated by the extraordinary though constant pressure of an enormous through traffic, as well as the natural misfortune of an inundation. Where so many disadvantages have to be combated, we ought, if possible, to exceed the scriptural measure of forgiveness, 'seventy times seven.'

A report has been received of the opening of the fresh-water canal from Ismailia to Port Said, adding another instalment to the amount of work completed on the Suez Canal.

The diplomatic relations of the United Principalities with the neighbouring Powers are still in a high state of tension. Russia is now the aggrieved party, on the grounds of the attack made on Greek orthodoxy by the spoliation of the convents and the undue favour shown to Polish refugees by the present Government. It is said that the Russian Minister has received orders to demand his passports in consequence of the refusal of Prince Couza to dismiss his present Ministry. It is pretty well understood, as we have stated in a previous number, that the Ministry exists entirely by the support of the House of Representatives. The Prince may therefore shield himself behind the popular vote. The said House of Representatives has further voted a sum of 88,000,000 for the formation of a camp to command the approaches into Bessarabia.

La Presse of the 16th inst. says: 'It is asserted that the interview between the Emperor and Lord Clarendon was of an essentially reassuring character for the peace of Europe, and that it is not impossible that considerable reductions may be made in the naval estimates of the budget of both countries.'

The Presse of Paris has made some caustic remarks on the inconsistency of English conduct. The Government of this country have decided (?) to work out a result to the Conference by the threadbare and obsolete forms of diplomacy, instead of concurring in the wholesome modern practice of an appeal to the wishes of the people for a solution of the difficultics. The people of England, on the other hand, are receiving, with triumphal honours, Garibaldi, the hero and incarnation of these very principles which the rulers of the people reject. England will, therefore, have no right to complain that the Conference will have become a nullity.

On the 12th inst. a decision was given by the Imperial Courts on an appeal affecting the well-known speculator, M. Mirès. The circumstances of the case are uninteresting, but not so some observations made in the course of the judgment. The Court declared that in any civil action the verdict of a criminal court on the same matter must be respected; and that the judges in the civil court must admit such verdict as the basis of a decision in favour of the acquitted prisoner. These remarks come in with a certain flavour of singularity after the decision given by the civil judge in the case of M. Armand. It will be remembered that that gentleman was fined 20,000 francs as damages, for the commission of an act of which he was acquitted by a criminal court: the judge then declaring that the verdict of the jury, while it negatived the criminality, in no way affected the actual commission of the deed. While our friends beyond the Channel are twitting us with political inconsistency, we may fairly wonder at the versatility with which they skip from one general principle to its opposite in their judicial procedure.

M. Leverrier, a name known both in the scientific and political world, although in truth his science far outshines his politics, has been doing good service to France by attempting to institute a system of private scientific observation. At a great réunion held by him at the Observatoire Impérial, he made some very forcible remarks on the dearth of private energy in France; true, the Government was most bountiful, but there were many details of science which a Government could not and ought not to undertake. Thus, he pointed to a mass of private astronomical observations made by Lalande in the course of the last century; their publication was due, not to the public munificence or private energy of his own countrymen, but to the scientific zeal of an Englishman. (The learned professor's known antipathy to England must have given additional force to this complaint.) He then adverted to the great use which had been made of private observations for the predictions of storms and hurricanes, and to the great saving of life that had been effected by telegraphic intelligence of these predictions. It would be well to consider whether we have in England made sufficient use of the large amount of scientific knowledge scattered about the country. We turn out of one University only an average of thirty first-rate mathematicians yearly, the greater part of whom are speedily merged in the general educated class. Why could not some of these gentlemen employ some spare moments in working out some of the observations taken by our astronomers, and so relieving them from a part at least of the laborious drudgery which falls upon them?

M. Bazier, of the Italian Opera in Paris, is evidently an ill-used man. He is only director of the chief opera-houses in Paris and Madrid, purveying in the former capital for one of the richest and most luxurious nations in the world; and yet, in spite of a position so disadvantageous for the making of money, the Imperial Government have withdrawn from him their subsidy of 4,000*l.*, and granted it to the Lyrique. For once the theatrical journals have consented to an armistice, and have raised a chorus of complaints and remonstrances on the injustice of Government: the school of French music has received a mortal blow; no longer shall its careful precept and splendid example act as a hotbed for French votaries of the joyous science; the portals of the palace of music are closed; the baton of the conductor falls from his nerveless grasp, &c. We have heard something very like this before; only, as the scene of the tribulation was prosaic England, the cause of the woe was equally prosaic, being nothing more than the Repeal of the Corn-Laws. There is certainly a trifling difference between 'Don Giovanni' and daily bread; but the principle of protection is alike for both. We can only say that if the French musical world is dependent on a Government grant of 4,000*l.* for its existence, the sooner it is starved into fiddle-strings the better.

The Cathedral of Lyons, like that of Milan, and like many of our own cathedrals before the time of the Reformation, rejoices in a peculiar liturgy, or 'use,' as it is called in the preface to our Book of Common Prayer. For this liturgy the indiscreet zeal of the Papal See has attempted to substitute that of Rome, in spite of official protests and the remonstrances of its own clergy at Lyons; the attempt has been treated as a violation of the liberties of the Gallican Church and an infringement of the Concordat. Notwithstanding these protests, a Papal brief has gone forth ordering the change to be made; the Government has forbidden the printers to issue a single copy of it. Thus the matter stands at present—the Government, the people, and the body of the clergy on one side; the Pope, Cardinal Bonald, Archbishop of Lyons, and the Ultramontane priesthood on the other.

The Moniteur of the 20th inst. says: 'The Morning Star and the Daily News assert that Earl Clarendon, in the name of the British Government, promised, as a concession to the Emperor, that Garibaldi should shorten his stay in England. This statement is entirely incorrect. No observation was made to Earl Clarendon by the French Government on the subject of Garibaldi.'

PARLIAMENTARY NOTES.

THE MALLORY REPORT FORGERY.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Lord R. Cecil asked the Attorney-General whether he still considered the Mallory Report as 'a document of a character quite unquestionable,' as he had on a former occasion described it. He also wanted to know if the Government would produce Mr. Seward's despatch in reference to that document.

The Attorney-General said that when he referred to that document on a former occasion, and used the word 'unquestionable,' his meaning was simply this—that never having heard any suggestion that the document was not what it professed to be, and knowing that it had been sent to Mr. Adams, and by him to Her Majesty's Government; being ignorant also of the peculiar form in which such documents are presented to the Confederate Congress; and also not being aware at the time that an opinion had been expressed doubting the genuineness of the document, he, in his simplicity, did believe that the document was what it purported to be. Had it been so, emanating from the Confederate Government, it would, undoubtedly, have been, as he had represented it, of unquestionable authority. [We are not aware that any one has ever said or hinted that a document emanating from the Confederate Government was not of unquestionable authority. The simplicity of the learned gentleman is almost pathetic.] His impression was that the despatch of Lord Lyons should be produced.

THE MERSEY STEAM-RAMS.

The Earl of Derby has given notice that on Tuesday next he will call the attention of the House of Lords to the published correspondence between Her Majesty's Government and Messrs. Laird about the seizure of the steam-rams.

UNDER-SECRETARIES OF STATE IN THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.

On Monday night Mr. Disraeli proposed a resolution in reference to a subject which he mentioned on Friday. This affair, which is calculated to embarrass the Government, and may involve rather awkward consequences, admits of a brief explanation. At the beginning of the 18th century, it became evident that the practical value of the rights of the House of Commons depended upon that body being free from Court influence. If, for example, the Sovereign could fill the House with placemen, the power of withholding supplies would be a mere farce; and, practically, the national purse-strings would be under the control of the Crown. To meet this danger, in 1707, a measure was introduced, which eventually became law, and is known as the Act of Queen Anne. It was enacted by this that any person accepting an office of profit under the Crown created after 1705 should not be eligible for election to the House of Commons, or be entitled to sit or vote. At that time (1705), there were three Secretaries and three Under-Secretaries of State, respectively presiding over the Home, Foreign, and Colonial Departments. It should be observed that the law does not take cognisance of the division of offices, and in Bills relating to this subject it is enacted that such and such a number of Secretaries and Under-Secretaries of State shall be privileged to sit in the House of Commons. We may also in this place notice the reply of the Attorney-General to this point of the case. He denied that the Act of Queen Anne had anything to do with the Under-Secretaries. The learned gentleman said:—'The 26th section is to the effect that if any person, being a member of the House of Commons, should accept of any place of profit from the Crown, his election should be deemed void, and there should be a new election, as if in consequence of a vacancy by death, the member in question being, however, capable of re-election. Upon that clause rests the practice of members when taking office in the Government resigning their seats and going down to their constituencies to ask for re-election. Consequently, if an Under-Secretaryship of State is an office of profit under the Crown, then each of the Under-Secretaries who accepted office from the date of the statute of Anne to the present time ought thereupon to have vacated his seat, but not one of them ever did so. I appeal to you, Sir, whether it is not the notorious and universal practice of the House that a member on accepting the office of Under-Secretary of State does not vacate his seat and has not to be reelected? Therefore the uniform practice of the House, which is the best commentary on the meaning of the Act, proclaims distinctly that an Under-Secretaryship of State is not an office of profit under the Crown within the scope of the Act, whether created before or after the passing of the statute. What is the reason of that? It is that an Under-Secretary of State is not appointed by the Crown, but by a Secretary of State. Thus the Act of Anne has no more to do with the matter than any other Act in the statute-book.' But, as we shall perceive, the issue does not at all depend upon this construction of the Attorney-General, except so far as pains and penalties are concerned. In 1742 an Act was passed, providing that deputies and clerks in the offices of the Government, including those of the principal Secretaries of State, 'the Under-Secretaries to any of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State' excepted, should not sit in the House of Commons. Three-quarters of a century after the Act of Queen Anne—that is, in 1782—a Bill introduced by Mr. Burke was passed, by which the office of Colonial Secretary and all the offices dependent on it were abolished, it being supposed that, after the loss of our North American colonies, we should have no employment for a Colonial Secretary. Mr. Burke's Bill contained a proviso that if at any time the office should be revived, it should be considered a new office, and therefore subject to the provisions of the Act of Queen Anne. Thus, then, the number of Secretaries was reduced to two, and a corresponding reduction took place in the number of Under-Secretaries privileged to sit in the House of Commons. After another interval of three-quarters of a century—that is, in 1855—we come to an Act which is too plain to admit of a difference in construing it. When the Crimean war broke out, the Colonial Secretary—we need not observe that the office had been long since revived—had charge of the army abroad in time of war; and this was found so inconvenient, that a new Department was established called the War Department, and a Bill was brought into the House authorising the Secretary and Under-Secretary to sit in the Commons—that is, the Bill permits three of Her Majesty's Secretaries of State and an equal number of Under-Secretaries to sit in the Commons. Next came the change of government in India, which has given rise to the office of Secretary of State for India, and an Act was passed permitting four Secretaries and four Under-Secretaries to sit in the Commons. Such is the law; and yet, since April 1863, there have been five Under-Secretaries of State in the House of Commons, viz., the Under-Secretaries for Foreign Affairs, for the Colonies, for India, for the Home Department, and for the War Department.

Mr. Disraeli introduced the subject in a very able speech. He complained of the number of Secretaries of State that were in the House of Lords. In his opinion, a large majority of the Secretaries, including the heads of the two great departments of public expenditure, should be in the House of Commons. The Constitution has provided for the representation of the Government in the Lords. One Secretary of State must sit in the Upper House, because there are five Secretaries, and only four can sit in the Commons. The Lord Chancellor, the Lord President of the Council, and the Lord Privy Seal, must be peers. The Postmaster-General is prohibited from sitting in the Commons, and is therefore selected from the peers. [This prohibition may operate injuriously to the public service.] The Commander-in-Chief is a peer, and several of the chief offices of the Household are held by peers. Considering the division of business, the House of Lords has, by the Constitution, a full share of Ministerial offices attached to it. The present Government gave too much to the House of Lords, and was represented in the House of Commons by Under-Secretaries. Mr. Disraeli did not deny the ability of these gentlemen; but questions arise 'which no one can properly treat who is not in the counsels of his Sovereign, who is ignorant of the policy really pursued by the Cabinet, and who cannot enter into their engagements, and make those representations which Ministers of the Crown alone can express.' After paying a courteous tribute to the Duke of Newcastle, the late Secretary for the Colonies, Mr. Disraeli said that in considering the distribution of offices between the two Houses, it was discovered that the state of affairs was not only politically injurious, but flagrantly illegal. There were five Under-Secretaries in the House of Commons, whilst only four were entitled to sit and vote. The matter is urgent and important. A popular assembly cannot maintain its authority unless it respects the example and experience of its predecessors, and important laws have been passed by a majority of one. In 1841, a majority of one brought Sir Robert Peel into office. In the present session, the reduction in the estimates for the Yeomanry was carried by one vote. On that occasion the Under-Secretary of State for War spoke and voted for the reduction, and yet he was not entitled to sit in the House or to vote. Mr. Disraeli in conclusion proposed a resolution that 'Notice having been taken by a member of this House that more than four Under-Secretaries of State have been sitting and voting in this House at the same time during the present Session,—Resolved, that the provisions of the 21st and 22nd of Victoria, cap. 106, sec. 4, have been violated, and that the seat of the fifth Under-Secretary of State has been and is thereby vacated.' [This resolution pointed to the Marquis of Hartington, the Under-Secretary for War, whose appointment made the fifth Under-Secretary in the Commons.]

Lord Palmerston said that when the present Government was constituted, four Secretaries of State were in the House of Commons; but in consequence of the elevation of the then so-called Lord John Russell to the peerage, and the death of Sir G. C. Lewis, the Secretaries for Foreign Affairs and for War were removed to the House of Lords. He frankly admitted that the Government had inadvertently violated the law, but the Opposition must share the blame in not sooner finding out the error. [Mr. Disraeli had stated that the Opposition was not entirely free from blame.] By the resignation of the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Bruce), who has accepted the office of Vice-President of the Committee of Privy Council for Education in the place of Mr. Lowe, there are now only four Under-Secretaries in the House. As the law had been violated, some person must be liable for penalties, and the Government proposed a Bill of Indemnity, which would be a more effectual record than a resolution. The Government did not agree with that part of Mr. Disraeli's resolution which asserts that one of the Under-Secretaries has vacated his seat.

The Attorney-General [who delights in special pleading and legal subtleties] contended that the offence was for five Under-Secretaries of State to sit in the House, but that it was not within the province of the House to decide which of them had violated the law and was subject to penalties. He denied that the seat was vacated, because the meaning of the Acts was that a fifth Under-Secretary of State should not sit and vote, but the Legislature contemplated the possibility of a man retaining his status as a member of the House, and 'his being placed under disabilities depended upon varying circumstances of voting and sitting.' Thus Mr. D. O'Connell and Mr. Salomons [and also Baron Rothschild] were members of the House at a time when they could not sit or vote in consequence of not complying with the requisitions of the Oaths Act of Charles II. When a member becomes bankrupt, he remains a member for a year, though he cannot sit or vote unless his debts be paid in full or the commission of bankruptcy be suspended. At the end of a year if his bankruptcy continue, his election becomes void, and a new writ is issued. 'Every reason which induces Parliament to preserve the status of members of this House to persons who hesitate to take the oath, but who may do so at any time, and affords to bankrupts the opportunity of ridding themselves of the incapacity, must surely apply à fortiori to the case of Under-Secretaries.' Therefore he held that there was no warrant for declaring the seat of the member for North Lancashire (the Marquis of Hartington) vacant. The Government was to blame for the oversight, but it was some excuse that the error had escaped the vigilance of the leader of the Opposition and of the Speaker.

Mr. Walpole supported the resolution, and replied to the speech of the Attorney-General. He could not agree with the construction sought to be put upon the Act which gave bankrupt members the privilege of retaining their seats for a year to see if they could pay their creditors or annul their bankruptcy. The point was that as soon as the Speaker declared a bankrupt member ineligible the seat was vacated. Was there any doubt that a fifth Under-Secretary was ineligible to sit and vote?

Sir George Grey proposed a Select Committee, to which Mr. Disraeli consented upon Lord Palmerston promising not to proceed with the Bill of Indemnity until the Select Committee had reported.

RESIGNATION OF MR. LOWE.

On Monday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Lowe explained why he had resigned the office of Vice-President of the Council of Education. On the 12th inst. the following resolution, moved by Lord R. Cecil, was carried against the Government: 'That in the opinion of this House the mutilation of the reports of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, and the exclusion from them of statements and opinions adverse to the educational views entertained by the Committee of Council, while matter favourable to them is admitted, are violations of the understanding under which the appointment of the inspectors was originally sanctioned by Parliament, and tend entirely to destroy the value of their reports.' Mr. Lowe said that Lord R. Cecil had not brought forward any evidence in support of the charge, and he (Mr. Lowe) had met it by an emphatic denial. The House had thought proper, in spite of that denial, to pass the resolution, and it therefore became his duty to resign his office; for such a resolution conveyed a stronger censure than a simple vote of want of confidence. He would now offer an explanation of the circumstances on which he believed Lord R. Cecil relied; and he would on the former occasion have offered the explanation if he had then known of a document that was circulated amongst the members. It is difficult for a man to defend himself against evidence which he has not seen or heard of, and there is probably 'no public department in the country which may not be overturned or discredited if its subordinate officials are base enough to communicate confidential documents.' [We are confident that if Mr. Lowe's successor summarily dismisses such persons from their offices he will be supported in such a proceeding by Conservatives as well as Liberals.] The documents thus communicated were reports of inspectors, in which certain passages were marked in the margin. These marks in the margin were improper, and were contrary to orders. When he assumed office he found the system was to strike out objectionable or improper passages, but he thought the plan was inconvenient, and a Minute was framed by which reports objected to were returned to the inspectors for revision, and if they were not revised to the satisfaction of the Council they were not published. This went on for two years, when he received a letter from an inspector saying that he had looked over the marked passages in a returned report, and could find nothing in them to alter. Then for the first time he (Mr. Lowe), who could not read the reports himself, and had them read to him, found that the practice had been continued of marking certain passages as in the time of his predecessor, and he instantly gave orders that a custom opposed to the new regulation should be discontinued. Mr. Lowe said: 'I gave orders that this kind of thing should never be done again, and pointed out that it was contrary to the whole intention and spirit of the Minute, that it entirely conteracted the object we had in view, and would expose us to all kinds of difficulties. In 1863 the same inspector unfortunately had his report returned to him, and he wrote back to ask that the passages objected to should be marked. I desired a letter to be written in answer to him to say that the Committee of Council could not undertake to mark any passages, that to do so would be contrary to the spirit of the Minute, and that he must himself discover, as well as he could, what there was in them that militated against the Minute under which the report ought to have been framed. And this was my practice in the matter. It was on the strength of these facts that I made the statement I did make in answer to the noble Lord, and I can only reiterate that what I said then was entirely true to the best of my knowledge and belief. One more thing I have to say, and that is, my noble friend and myself had received reports—three of them, I remember—from very important and influential inspectors, in which they spoke in terms of high commendation of the changes introduced under the name of the Revised Code. Those passages were not of such a nature as would have justified us in sending back the report, and they did not appear to us to violate the Minute that we had made. But we were very anxious that they should not appear, and we requested these gentlemen privately, not officially, to be good enough to expunge these passages from their report.'

After Mr. Lowe resumed his seat, there followed a volley of regrets from both sides of the House. Lord R. Cecil was sorry that the explanation was not given on the 12th, for then the resolution would not have been carried, and he was sorry Mr. Lowe had resigned. Lord Palmerston warmly eulogised the ability and character of Mr. Lowe, deplored his loss, and was sorry that neither he nor his colleagues could dissuade him from resigning. Mr. Disraeli regretted that 'so much talent has been lost to the public service.' Mr. Walter was sorry the vote [he voted with the majority] of the 12th had led to Mr. Lowe's resignation. Mr. Foster, who also voted with the majority, regretted that Mr. Lowe 'should have thought that the vote was one which affected his personal honour.'

Altogether, Mr. Lowe must have been greatly consoled for the loss of office by such lavish praise from foes as well as friends.

The same evening, in the House of Lords, Earl Granville, the President of the Council, made a statement in which he avowed his responsibility for what Mr. Lowe had done, and fully approved his conduct. His Lordship highly commended the zeal, ability, and high character of Mr. Lowe.

THE MACKAY GUN.

On Monday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Derby called attention to a gun invented by Mr. Mackay, and which had been lately tried. Till now it had been a leading principle in the construction of cannon that the windage should be diminished to the greatest possible extent. This new gun, however, proceeded on the principle of utilising the windage, and rendering it serviceable for the purposes of the weapon. The projectile used was a smooth cylindrical bolt, and the interior of the gun was furnished with spiral grooves. The gas escaping up these grooves communicated a rotary motion to the bolt similar to that of a rifle-ball. This system, if it could be successfully worked, would, of course, lessen the necessity for extraordinary strength in cannon and for very heavy charges, and would also reduce the amount of the recoil. It was stated that the initial velocity obtained at the trial in question was remarkably high. The gun was manufactured at the well-known establishment of the Mersey Steel and Iron Works. It weighed nine tons, and was fired with a charge of 30 lbs., and a projectile of 167 lbs., at a range of 200 yards. The target, which was 6 ft. square, represented a side of the Agincourt, an iron-plated frigate now being built for the Government. It consisted of a plate of iron, 5½ in. thick, backed by 9 in. of teak, with behind another plate of iron about 1 in. thick, a series of strong bolts, and last of all a thick plank of timber. The bolt struck nearly the centre of the target, shattered the woodwork, and passed through the whole breadth of the target, many yards beyond which it was found, carrying with it a plug of iron which it had drilled out of the plate in its progress. If that statement was correct, the performance was certainly most extraordinary, and it was remarkable that the plug and the bolt were found lying nearly together on the sand, the marks on which showed that the rotary motion had been continued to the last. The bolt was perfectly sound and entire, although the force of the impact had diminished its length and added to its breadth. He should like to know if the Secretary for War had received any report as to this trial.

The Earl De Grey and Ripon said the statements of the Earl of Derby were confirmed in regard to the main features of the gun by the report of an officer sent down to Liverpool to make enquiries. The Government could not yet form any decided opinion, but the matter called for investigation.

THE PENAL SERVITUDE BILL.

The Penal Servitude Acts Amendment Bill passed through Committee on Monday in the House of Commons. On Clause 4, Mr. Hunt moved an amendment to the effect that a holder of a ticket-of-leave should report himself to the police, and not change his locality without giving notice under pain of having his license forthwith revoked. Sir George Grey opposed this amendment, but the Government was beaten by a majority of 28.

FLOGGING FOR RAPE.

The Bill for adding flogging to the present punishments for rape passed through Committee in the House of Lords on Thursday. An amendment proposed by Lord Wensleydale makes flogging compulsory, and not optional with the judge. On Tuesday, Earl Carnarvon moved the insertion of a clause making flogging compulsory when the offence has actually been committed, and optional when only attempted. This amendment was agreed to.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF SHIPS OF WAR.

On Thursday, in the House of Lords, a petition was presented by the Earl of Hardwicke from Mr. Chalmers, who alleges that an invention of his for the construction of iron-plated ships has not been fairly tried, and that the Chief Contractor of the Navy has pirated the main features of his invention.

The Duke of Somerset said the Chalmers target did resist shot better than the Warrior target, except the 68-pounder; but it was more complicated in construction and more costly. It was a mistake to suppose that anything had been copied from Mr. Chalmers. There had been very little advance upon the construction of the Warrior, except that they now got thicker plates and better iron.

THE DUTY ON MALT.

On Thursday, in the House of Commons, Colonel Barttelot moved a resolution: 'That the consideration of the duties upon sugar be postponed until the House shall have had the opportunity of considering the expediency of the reduction of the duty on malt.' After a long discussion, the resolution was rejected by a majority of 248. Mr. Disraeli declared his opinion about the malt duty was not changed; but he held that the House was pledged to first remove the taxes imposed for the Crimean war, including the increased duties on sugar.

LIMITED ENLISTMENT IN THE BRITISH ARMY.

On Friday, in the House of Lords, Earl Lucan, in moving for a return of the reserve force, commented on the working of the Limited Enlistment Act. No less than 10,000 men per annum were entitled to their discharge: and, considering the difficulty of obtaining recruits, and the calls likely to be made for an army 210,000 strong, a great portion of which was in India, this was a very grave matter. After seventeen years' trial, he thought the system ought to be changed, or at least the term of service ought to be extended to fifteen years in the infantry and sixteen years for the cavalry and artillery.

Earl De Grey and Ripon said that it was not likely that more than 4,000, or perhaps 3,000, men would claim their discharge. In ten years—that is, from 1852 to 1862—the death ratio in the army had fallen from 29·7 per 1,000 to 18·4 per 1,000, which was an annual gain of 2,200 men. This was chiefly due to the operation of the Limited Enlistment Act. The difficulty of recruiting arose from the competition of the labour market, and to revert to the old system of enlistment would increase the difficulty.

FREE TRADE AND DIPLOMACY.

Mr. W. E. Forster, on Friday, moved for a Select Committee to enquire into the arrangements between the Foreign Office and the Board of Trade in reference to our trade with foreign nations. The object of this motion was to induce the Government to exert their influence in promoting the adoption of free trade in other countries. After considerable discussion, the motion was agreed to.

DEPARTURE OF GARIBALDI.

When it was announced that General Garibaldi would forthwith depart for Caprera on account of ill health, it was currently reported that the hurried departure was not due to physical but to political causes. It was said that the Earl of Clarendon had received a hint from the Emperor of the French, and that the English Government had intimated to Garibaldi that his presence was inconvenient. The affair was noticed in both Houses of Parliament on Tuesday night. In the Lords, the Earl of Clarendon said, that neither by the Emperor, nor by any member of the Imperial Government, was any allusion made to him as to the cause or the probable duration of Garibaldi's visit. He (Lord Clarendon) had spoken to the Emperor about the reception. 'I said that the ground of the enthusiasm of the people was that Garibaldi had risen from the ranks of his countrymen by the great services that he had rendered to them, and because he was brave, and because he was honest, and that I was convinced he would command a similar reception in whatever part of England he might visit. No one can be more unwilling than I am—because I know the inconvenience of such a course—to allude to any communication that I have received from the Emperor, but I think I am not betraying any confidence when I state that the Emperor said that he entirely understood and fully believed how completely such qualities as Garibaldi had displayed went straight home to the English heart, and commanded their approbation.' The French Government has no more to do with the departure of Garibaldi than the English Government. His Lordship also said: 'I think it will be more satisfactory to your Lordships and the country to know that no concessions have been either made or asked of the Emperor of the French or of the English Government the one from the other. I found when I was in Paris that there existed on the part of the Emperor and his Government the same desire that exists on the part of Her Majesty's Government that, on all important questions which may arise, there should be, as far as possible, a combination of action between the two countries and the two Governments on the various matters that may agitate Europe, without any compromise of dignity on the part of either.'

In the Commons, in reply to Mr. D. Griffith, Lord Palmerston explicitly denied that the English Government had anything to do with the departure of Garibaldi. Respecting the Emperor His Lordship said: 'I am empowered by my noble friend Lord Clarendon, who had some conversations with him upon the reception which General Garibaldi met with in this country, to say that, so far from the Emperor of the French having looked upon this reception with the slightest degree of jealousy—for which there cannot be the smallest foundation, because there was nothing in the reception which was connected with any feeling or any tie bearing on the French Government, but simply an expression of admiration felt by the people of this country for a great and distinguished man—I am authorised by my noble friend to say that in those conversations the Emperor of the French, so far from expressing the slightest umbrage at what had passed, said that he looked with admiration upon the feeling which that reception expressed on the part of the British nation, and that it did them the highest honour.' After testifying from personal observation that the health of Garibaldi was being impaired by his visit, His Lordship said that the General's 'most ardent admirers must feel that in foregoing the pleasure which an opportunity of seeing him affords them, they are contributing to that health, strength, and life which every one who admires him wishes might remain unimpaired for the service of his country.'

THE BOMBARDMENT OF SONDERBORG.

On Tuesday, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Malmesbury asked Earl Russell if he had received any explanation of the bombardment of Sonderborg. Every private letter that arrived tended to aggravate the atrocity of the act. If there had been an arsenal in the place, still the Prussians were bound by the usages of civilised warfare to give 24 hours' notice. The hospitals were the first buildings destroyed, and the sick had to be carried out in the midst of the bombardment. The shells used were not merely such as would set fire to the buildings, but contained materials for the destruction of human life.

Earl Russell said the Prussian Minister told the British Ambassador that he was not aware of the circumstances, and that it was not usual for a neutral Power to enquire as to the proceedings of belligerents. 'He promised, however, that if an official enquiry were made he would give an answer. He (Earl Russell) supposed the answer would be merely that Her Majesty's Government had no right to enquire in regard to the proceedings of the belligerents, and he had not directed any official enquiry to be made in the matter.' [His Lordship seems to be quite prepared for being snubbed.] His Lordship observed: 'As no official explanation has been given of the occurrence, it must remain under the reprobation of civilised nations.'

DENMARK.

On Tuesday, in the House of Commons, Mr. Osborne moved a resolution against using the treaty of 1852 as a basis of negotiations. After a long debate, in the course of which Mr. Disraeli attacked the foreign policy of the Government, but objected to the motion on the eve of the assembling of the Conference, and said that the Opposition would take the first fitting opportunity of asking the House to pronounce judgment on the foreign policy of the Government, Mr. Osborne expressed his willingness to withdraw his motion, and it was disposed of by Mr. Disraeli moving the previous question.

THE COUNTY FRANCHISE.

On Wednesday, 13th inst., Mr. Locke King's Bill for reducing the county franchise to 10*l.* was rejected on the second reading by a majority of 27. In the course of the debate Lord Palmerston said: 'It is plain to every man, I think, who attends at all to the indications of public opinion in this House and in the country, that there does not exist at the present moment in this House or out of it the same interest in such changes as existed some short period since. The fact is that organic changes have been looked to not as a mere end so much as a means. They were looked to as a means of effecting great alterations and improvements in our internal system, our commercial system, our laws, procedure, and other matters. Many of those improvements have been made. Commerce has been freed from its enshacklements, industry has been encouraged by liberty, and many of those alterations and improvements which were to be the result of organic changes have been accomplished by the Legislature as it stands, and therefore there is a less ardent desire for change than existed before those improvements were made. There are also other considerations connected with external affairs which have tended to allay the desire for organic changes, arising from the events which have occurred in other countries, and which are attributable in a great measure to the influence of organic changes in those countries.'

Confederate Official Documents.

OFFICIAL CORRESPONDENCE ON THE MALLORY REPORT FORGERY.

Department of State, Richmond, March 11, 1864.

Sir,—I have the honour to inclose copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in relation to a forgery extensively circulated by the European press, purporting to be a copy of an official report addressed by him to 'T. S. Babcock,' Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Confederate States.

The paper is on its face so palpably a fabrication that one could scarcely have supposed it could dupe the most credulous, even if experience had not already demonstrated the facility and abundance with which 'telegraphic news,' 'Confederate confessions,' 'intercepted letters,' and 'extracts from Richmond papers,' have been manufactured for European consumption. You will notice that the paper is stamped as a forgery in the mere address, not only by the misnomer of our Speaker, but because the reports of the head of the Navy Department are never addressed to the Speaker of the House. The contents of the paper are too absurd for comment.

The Secretary of the Navy has been informed by Commodore Maury that this paper is 'going the rounds of the Continental press as gospel.' It may be well, if you think the matter worth notice, to make public the fact that the paper is a forgery.

I am inclined to think the publication should be made, for no fable concerning us is too absurd for belief, real or pretended, in England or on the continent. A short time ago, European papers were gravely commenting on the 'fact' that our Vice-President, Mr. Stephens (who can at once abandon his constitutional position here as successor to the Presidency, in the event of the death of the Chief Magistrate, and who was at the time sick at his home in Georgia) had arrived in Europe, for the purpose of concluding a treaty with France for the concession of Texas and other sovereign States to that power.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) J. P. Benjamin,
Secretary of State.

Hon. John Slidell, Commissioner, &c., Paris.

March 12, 1864.

P.S. We have just received the debates in the House of Commons, on the 22nd ult., on Mr. Seymour Fitzgerald's motion, and find that Her Majesty's Attorney-General succeeded in defending the conduct of the Ministry, on the subject of Mr. Laird's rams, by quoting, as authentic, this clumsy fabrication, and that his citations from it were received with cheers. This is the more unaccountable, inasmuch as the paper had been characterised as a 'Yankee trick' and a 'hoax' by the unexceptionable authority of Commodore Maury, in a card published by him in the London papers three weeks before the speech of the Attorney-General.

The same mail brings the statement made by Lord Palmerston in the House of Commons on the 25th ult., that the release of the Confederate vessel of war Tuscaloosa, which had been seized by instructions of the British Government in a colonial port, had been ordered, on the ground that 'her detention would not be warranted by international law.' It is to be regretted that the eager desire of the British Government to observe that 'impartial neutrality' which Earl Russell has so happily defined as being 'conduct exceedingly advantageous to the more powerful of the two parties,' had not been restrained until international law had been investigated, before instructions were issued to violate our rights by the seizure of one of our armed vessels in a port where it had sought asylum under the sanction of the Queen's proclamation. This promptness to do 'neutral acts exceedingly advantageous to the stronger side' has had the result in the present case of enabling all of the enemy's vessels that had been threatened by our cruiser to escape, while the British Ministry was engaged in its tardy examination of the law of nations on the subject of a neutral's right to seize the national vessels of the less powerful of the two belligerents.

Confederate States of America, Navy Department,
Richmond, March 10, 1864.

Sir,—I have the honour to hand you herewith a paper, purporting to be an official report made by me to the Hon. Mr. Babcock, Speaker of the House of Representatives. This paltry forgery, widely circulated and generally commented on in England and France, originated in the United States, and bears intrinsic evidence of having been prepared by those having access to the Navy Department of the enemy. The main purpose of it seems to be to present the Government of the Confederate States as engaged in building iron-clads and other ships in England and France; and as it may possibly be regarded as authentic by foreign Governments, I deem it proper to apprise you that it is, from beginning to end, a forgery.

On its appearance in England, Commander M. F. Maury, over his own signature in the Times, denounced it as a 'hoax,' and a leading journal of the United States, in commenting upon his letter, reasserts the authenticity of the report.

I am respectfully, your obedient servant,
(Signed) S. R. Mallory,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. J. P. Benjamin, Secretary of State.

AN ACT TO ORGANISE FORCES TO SERVE DURING THE WAR.

The Congress of the Confederate States of America do enact, That from and after the passage of this act all white men, residents of the Confederate States, between the ages of seventeen and fifty, shall be in the military service of the Confederate States for the war.

Sec. 2. That all the persons aforesaid, between the ages of eighteen and forty-five now in the service, shall be retained, during the present war with the United States, in the same regiments, battalions and companies to which they belong at the passage of this act, with the same organisation and officers, unless regularly transferred or discharged, in accordance with the laws and regulations for the Government of the army: Provided, That companies from one State organised against their consent, expressed at the time, with regiments or battalions from another State, shall have the privilege of being transferred to organisations of troops in the same arm of the service from the States in which the said companies were raised, and soldiers from one State in companies from another State shall be allowed, if they desire it, a transfer to organisations from their own State in the same arm of the service.

Sec. 3. That, at the expiration of six months from the first day of April next, a bounty of one hundred dollars, in a six per cent. Government bond, which the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorised to issue, shall be paid to every non-commissioned officer, musician, and private, who shall then be in the service; or in the event of his death previous to the period of such payment, then to the person or persons who would be entitled by law to receive the arrearages of his pay, but no one shall be entitled to the bounty herein provided who shall at any time during the period of six months next after the said first day of April be absent from his command without leave.

Sec. 4. That no person shall be relieved from the operation of this act by reason of having been heretofore discharged from the army where no disability now exists, nor shall those who have furnished substitutes be any longer exempted by reason thereof: Provided, That no person heretofore exempted on account of religious opinions, and who has paid the tax levied to relieve him from service, shall be required to render military service under this act.

Sec. 5. That all white male residents of the Confederate States, between the ages of seventeen and eighteen and forty-five and fifty years, shall enroll themselves at such times and places, and under such regulations as the President may prescribe, the time allowed not being less than thirty days for those east, and sixty days for those west, of the Mississippi river; and any person who shall fail so to enroll himself, without a reasonable excuse therefor, to be judged of by the President, shall be placed in service in the field for the war in the same manner as though he were between the ages of eighteen and forty-five: Provided, That the persons mentioned in this section shall constitute a reserve for State defence and detail duty, and shall not be required to perform service out of the State in which they reside.

6. That all persons required by the fifth section of this act to enrol themselves may, within thirty days after the passage hereof, east of the Mississippi river, and within sixty days, if west of said river, form themselves into voluntary organisations of companies, battalions, or regiments, and elect their own officers; said organisation to conform to the existing law; and, having so organised, to tender their services as volunteers during the war to the President; and if such organisation shall furnish proper muster-rolls as now required, and deposit a copy thereof with the enrolling officer of the district (which shall be equivalent to enrollment), they may be accepted as minute men for service in such State; but in no event to be taken out of it. Those who do not volunteer and organise shall enroll themselves as before provided, and may by the President be required to assemble at places of rendezvous, and be formed into companies, battalions, and regiments, under regulations to be prescribed by him, and shall have the right to elect their company and regimental officers; and all troops organised under this act for State defence, shall be entitled, while in actual service, to the same pay and allowances as troops now in the field.

Sec. 7. That any person who shall fail to attend at the places of rendezvous as required by the authority of the President, without a sufficient excuse, to be judged of by him, shall be liable to be placed in service in the field for the war, as if he were between the ages of eighteen and forty-five years.

Sec. 8. That hereafter the duties of provost and hospital guards and clerks, of clerks, guards, agents, employés, or labourers in the Commissary's and Quartermaster's Departments, in the Ordnance Department, and clerks and employees of navy agents, as also in the execution of the enrollment acts, and all similar duties, shall be performed by persons who are within the ages of eighteen and forty-five years, and who [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] to have him tried for [illegible] shall be dismissed from the service.

Sec. 10. That all laws granting exemptions from military service [illegible], and the same are hereby repealed, and hereafter none shall be exempted except the following:

I. All who shall be held unfit for military service, under rules to be prescribed by the Secretary of War.

II. The Vice-President of the Confederate States, the members and officers of Congress, and of the several State Legislatures, and such other Confederate and State officers as the President or the Governors of the respective States may certify to be necessary for the proper administration of the Confederate or State Governments, as the case may be.

III. Every minister of religion authorised to preach according to the rules of his church, and who, at the passage of this act, shall be regularly employed in the discharge of his ministerial duties, superintendents and physicians of asylums for the deaf, dumb, and blind, and of the insane; one editor for each newspaper being published at the time of the passage of this act, and such employees as said editor may certify on oath to be indispensable to the publication of such newspaper, the public printer of the Confederate and State Governments, and such journeymen printers as the said public printer shall certify on oath to be indispensable to perform the public printing; one skilled apothecary in each apothecary store, who was doing business as such apothecary on the Tenth day of October, Eighteen hundred and sixty-two, and has continued said business, without intermission, since that period; all physicians over the age of thirty years who now are, and for the last seven years have been, in the actual and regular practice of their profession; but the term physician shall not include dentists; all presidents and teachers of colleges, theological seminaries, academies, and schools, who have been regularly engaged as such for two years next before the passage of this act: Provided, that the benefit of this exemption shall extend to those teachers only whose schools are composed of twenty students or more; all superintendents of public hospitals established by law before the passage of this act, and such physicians and nurses therein as such superintendent shall certify on oath to be indispensable to the proper and efficient management thereof.

IV. There shall be exempt one person as overseer or agriculturist on each farm or plantation upon which there are now, and were upon the 1st day of January last, fifteen able-bodied field hands between the ages of sixteen and fifty, upon the following conditions: 1. This exemption shall only be granted in cases in which there is no white male adult on the farm or plantation not liable to military service, nor unless the person claiming the exemption was, on the 1st day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-four, either the owner and manager or overseer of said plantation; but in no case shall more than one person be exempted for one farm or plantation. 2. Such person shall first execute a bond, payable to the Confederate States of America, in such form, and in such security, and in such penalty, as the Secretary of War may prescribe, conditioned that he will deliver to the Government, at some railroad depôt, or such other place or places as may be designated by the Secretary of War, within twelve months then next ensuing, one hundred pounds of bacon, or, at the election of the Government, its equivalent in pork, and one hundred pounds of nett beef (said beef to be delivered on foot), for each able-bodied slave on the farm or plantation within the above said ages, whether said slaves be worked in the field or not, which said bacon or pork and beef shall be paid for by the Government at the prices fixed by the Commissioners of the State under the impressment act: Provided, That when the person thus exempted shall produce satisfactory evidence that it has been impossible for him, by the exercise of proper diligence, to furnish the amount of meat thus contracted for and leave an adequate supply for the subsistence of those living on said farm or plantation, the Secretary of War shall direct a commutation of the same to the extent of two-thirds thereof in grain or other provisions, to be delivered by such person as aforesaid at equivalent rates. 3. Such person shall further bind himself to sell the marketable surplus of provisions and grain now on hand, and which he may raise from year to year while his exemption continues, to the Government or to the families of soldiers at prices fixed by the Commissioners of the State under the impressment act: Provided, That any person exempted as aforesaid shall be entitled to a credit of twenty-five per cent. on any amount of meat which he may deliver within three months from the passage of this act: Provided further, That persons coming within the provisions of this exemption shall not be deprived thereof by reason of having been enrolled since first day of February, 1864.

In addition to the foregoing exemptions, the Secretary of War, under the direction of the President, may exempt or detail such other persons as he may be satisfied ought to be exempt on account of public necessity, and to secure the production of grain and provisions for the army and the families of soldiers. He may also grant exemptions or details, on such terms as he may prescribe, to such overseers, farmers, or planters as he may be satisfied will be more useful to the country in the pursuits of agriculture than in the military service: Provided, That such exemptions shall cease whenever the farmer, planter, or overseer shall fail diligently to employ, [illegible]

[illegible]

Sec. 11. CONFEDERATE PROSPECTS IN THE SOUTH-WEST.

We condense the following from a long and interesting letter in the Morning Post, dated New Orleans, March 21, 1864:—

Farragut keeps 'pegging away,' as 'Old Abe' would say, at Mobile. The present attack is said to be a mere preliminary affair. Farragut's squadron is to be very largely increased by the addition of some twenty vessels of various classes, including the ironclads Canonicus, Onondaga, Tecumseh, Manhattan, and Atlanta. According to the talk in naval circles here, the Admiral will soon have by far the largest and most effective squadron yet fitted out by the Federal Government, and the fall of Mobile before so powerful an armada is accepted as a foregone conclusion. Something similar, I think, is predicted of Charleston. The regular investment of Mobile by the fleet and the grand attack upon the water defences will take place about June 1. These water defences are as strong and elaborate as art can make them, and are manned and officered by veterans. I notice that Major-General Gilmer, General Beauregard's chief adviser at Charleston, has arrived in Mobile probably to assume command of the fortifications, though this is not stated in any of the Mobile papers. General Gilmer is fully entitled to share with his superior the honours of the defence of Charleston. He was a captain of engineers in the old army, and ranked among the ablest officers in that branch of the service. There is a report that Beauregard is also to be transferred from Charleston to the command of the department of Mississippi which includes West Tennessee, Alabama, and Louisiana. Certain it is that, by unanimous acclaim of friend and foe, President Davis could not do a more popular act or make a better military appointment than by assigning General Beauregard to the command spoken of. A Louisiana officer who has served with distinction in Mississippi expresses the belief that his assignment to that command would be worth 10,000 men to our forces from Mississippi and Louisiana.

General Polk contented himself with keeping Sherman's main column under observation, intending, apparently, to run a race with his antagonist either for Mobile or Selma, according as the latter should elect. But the Federal General, finding that he had a bigger contract on hand than he could execute (so General Sherman is said to have expressed himself), did not choose to go in either direction, but deliberately returned to the Mississippi by the route he came. The retrograde movement was deliberate, because wholly unexpected by Polk, who, even if he anticipated it, was not in position to prevent it.

Fortunately for the Confederate armies of the West, Generals Lee and Forrest, commanding the cavalry in General Polk's department, proved themselves men of entirely different character, though Bedford Forrest is but a volunteer, having never 'set' a squadron in the field before this war; and with no military, and but little of any other education, he has proved himself in the late campaign a cavalry officer of the highest ability. He was ordered to meet and thwart the cavalry column which left Memphis to cooperate with Sherman, and he did so with 2,000 horse and a few hundred Mississippi State troops, hastily levied militia. The enemy's loss was 1,000 in killed, wounded, and prisoners; a large number of horses, arms, stores, and wagons, and six pieces of artillery. So confident was General Smith, the commander of the Federal cavalry, of 'wiping out' the rebel cavalry, that he wrote from Colliersville, Mississippi, Feb. 9, to a friend as follows:—'I expect to start to-morrow or next day, with —— thousand

Moreover, [illegible] the period [illegible] which foreign Powers [illegible] for struggling populations to earn the stamp of nationality is very nearly up. Is it not, therefore, painful, nay, alarming, that, at such a crisis, mediocrity and divided purpose should wield the entire sway? Yet such is the case, and as we dwell upon it, we are almost driven to believe that God not only is not with us, but against us. He has confounded our judgments, divided our counsels, and delivered us into the hands of the feeble, the faint-hearted, and the blind. And why should He be with us, base, grovelling, and corrupted as we are? We are not with Him! We are a godless, conscienceless, religionless people. There is no honour, no virtue, no [illegible], except among the masses, while ninety per cent. of all whose annual income exceeds one thousand dollars are mere lynx-eyed sharpers, who are watching every neighbour with suspicion, and who subordinate every sentiment to self. Debauched by an extravagant prosperity, and spared mercifully from all sacrifices, we have ungratefully forgotten our dependence upon Heaven, and the result is, that, except in the case of the simple, virtuous labouring people, we have practically become a community of atheists. There is no conscience attached to the intelligence and wealth of the community; and knowing, as we are, and of the world, we say unto you, fellow-countrymen, that there can be no lasting government without public virtue, no enduring nationality without a universal sense of God. Handled as our country has been in the field and stupified as it is by the tricksters of the Cabinet, it would seem that we are only to arrive at the stage when we may be permitted to rebuild, by sufferings and sacrifices, and perhaps through a preliminary chaos which it is dreadful to anticipate.'

TO OUR FRIENDS AND SUBSCRIBERS.

OUR friends in the United Kingdom and on the Continent are earnestly requested to forward to us, at their earliest convenience, such information relative to the military movements and condition of affairs in America as they may receive through private letters, either from the United States, or from the Confederate States. They may rely upon the most scrupulous precautions being observed that no names or facts leading to identification will, under any circumstances, be revealed. No communications, however, will be noticed unless authenticated by a responsible name. Southern newspapers, of any date, will be useful and acceptable presents.

Our subscribers in the South will have their papers supplied through HENRY HOTZE, ESQ., the Confederate States' Commercial Agent in London, who has kindly tendered us his services in this respect during the continuance of the blockade.

For the convenience of our distant subscribers, all the receipts for subscriptions signed by any of the official representatives or commissioned officers of the Confederate States, will be recognised at this Office.

Subscription, 26s. per annum; post-paid, 30s.: payable in advance.

All communications on business to be addressed, and Post-office orders made payable, to J. B. HOPKINS, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

THE INDEX may be obtained, and payments for subscriptions or other dues to the Paper made—

At Liverpool, to Mr. HUTTON, 6 Commercial Buildings, 17 Water Street.
At Manchester, F. A. HASLEHAM, Esq. Manchester Southern Club Office, Market Street.
At Paris, to Messrs. PFEIFFER & MELLER, 52 Rue du Château d'Eu, Paris.
At Turin, to SR. FILIPPO MANETTA, 4 Borgo Nuovo.
At St Thomas (West Indies), to C. W. WAITE, Esq.

THE INDEX.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1864.

The Break in the Storm.

FOR many months past there has been no such dearth of military news from America as we have had to record during the last month or six weeks. Like one of those dread pauses which precede a great convulsion of nature—like that lull in the tempest which preludes a wilder outburst of the war of elements—a temporary truce, as it were, holds back the struggling hosts of North and South from mortal conflict, and bids the din of battle cease. For a time only. The most casual observer can hardly fail to perceive that the thunder-clouds are gathering more thickly than ever, and that the crash, when it comes, will be terrific. There are many persons familiar with the resources of both Federals and Confederates who look upon this as the decisive campaign of the war—who say that, whatever be the issue of this year's fighting, it will be the last in which great armies will be brought into the field, and that thenceforth the struggle will degenerate into a kind of desultory guerilla warfare, of which predatory incursions and irregular enterprises will be the chief features. Without endorsing this opinion, we may venture to say that this year, more than in any year which has preceded it, the energy and power of either side will be fully tested, and that, whichever way fortune may turn, the advantage will be very nearly conclusive as to the final issue of the war. And we confess that our hopes never ran higher for the Confederacy. The North must fight under obvious disadvantages this year. Her internal difficulties are already beginning to tell. The Administration is carrying on two wars. It has to subdue the South in order to carry the Presidential election; it must win the Presidential vote in order to beat the South. Thus at one and the same time a powerful army has not only to be held in check, but driven from the field, and a threatening opposition in every village and town and State of the Union has to be overawed and coerced. There is a faint foreshadowing of the days of trial that are to come for the North in the Illinois riots. It suits the Federal Government to deal lightly with this very serious matter. But Illinois is the State which has given proportionately the largest quota of soldiers for the war. President LINCOLN is a citizen of Illinois, and yet in Illinois there is civil war between the supporters and enemies of the Administration, and 5,000 troops are needed to crush a formidable insurrection. Let our readers imagine all the latent disaffection in the North worked upon, stimulated, fanned into flame by unscrupulous electioneering agents; let them suppose a great battle lost, a great national disaster sustained; and then contemplate the probable effect of such a humiliation befalling a people already shamed, disappointed, and disgraced by the imbecility of the Government. Is it possible that defeat in Virginia or Tennessee should not be followed by Copperhead demonstrations in every village and town and State of the Union? Is it not certain that the opposition would assume a bolder tone—that its candidates would become not the mere political opponents but the deadly enemies of the Administration; and that President LINCOLN would need at least as many soldiers to repress discontent at home, as would be required to crush secession in the Confederate States? The North may increase its enormous armies in the field, may strain every nerve to overwhelm by numbers the foe which has so long bid defiance to its arms; but practically it commences this campaign with heavier odds against it than it ever encountered before; and although the onset will be desperate, and the struggle tremendous, there ought to be in every Confederate heart less anxiety about the issue than there was one year, or two years, or three years ago.

General GRANT seems to be aware of the momentous nature of the conflict in which he is about to engage, and is neglecting no means that are available to him to insure success. He is said to have expressed his opinion that all the fighting is to be done in Virginia, that Richmond is the primary object of the war, and everything must be secondary to the capture of the Southern capital. This is not quite a new theory. But how is it to be worked out? Three years ago the road to Richmond was tolerably open. Now, all the engineering talent of the Confederacy has been for months and months employed in perfecting the defences of the capital; in ascertaining the most available points for the concentration of troops, and for giving battle; and in erecting fortifications. MEADE'S last advance found LEE'S army drawn up behind entrenchments at Mine End Creek, which it would have been positive madness to assault; there are twenty such positions on the road to Richmond, whose capabilities of defence have been carefully surveyed and reported on; and finally there are the lines of the town itself, the redoubts, the batteries, and the ironclads, before which even a better drilled and appointed army than that of the North must perforce recoil in dismay. General M'CLELLAN thought 150,000 men too few to give battle to LEE'S forces and capture Richmond in 1862. GRANT is not his superior in strategy, nor does he inspire more confidence in his troops. With what force does he intend to march 'on to Richmond' against LEE'S veterans in their strong entrenched positions? Where is his reserve? Where are his recruits to fill up the great list of casualties that he must expect? It is well known that the North is already in straits about its military and naval forces. It is passing laws to convert soldiers into sailors. It cannot fill up the muster-rolls of its regiments in the field. Germany is nearly closed to it as a recruiting ground. There are influences at work to materially reduce its recruiting resources in Ireland. The native white material is used up, and the intelligent contrabands can only be obtained by successful raids. Whence is the future army of the North to come, if GRANT shares the fate of his predecessors, McDOWELL, and M'CLELLAN, and POPE, and BURNSIDE, and HOOKER? These are considerations which may well make General GRANT cautious about his advance, and which yet render that advance imperative. We are on the eve of great events. The North must strike, and without delay. But the inherent weakness of its cause must paralyse its arm. Neither PRESIDENT nor COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF can face this new conflict without the consciousness that there is a party within their camps, and within their cities, within their very capital, watching their movements with suspense as great, with hopes almost as fervent, with intent almost as hostile, as those which animate the hearts of the Southern people fighting for their freedom.

Mexico and the United States.

'WE have at length,' exclaims the New York Herald of the 6th inst., 'an expression of opinion from the popular branch of Congress which represents, though in its mildest form, the universal public sentiment of our loyal States in reference to LOUIS NAPOLEON'S seizure of Mexico.' 'In this,' says (the same day) the New York Daily News, a paper in every way opposed to the Herald, 'this Congress, if in nothing else, has fairly and honourably represented the American people.' And thus all classes and all shades of opinion unite in ratifying the only unanimous vote that has passed the popular branch of the Federal Congress since the outbreak of the war—the vote pledging the United States to implacable hostility against the Mexican monarchy. The sole objection that has risen from any quarter is that referred to by the Herald, and urged by some of the ultra-radical members of Congress, who nevertheless voted for it, viz. that the 'form' was too 'mild.'

Of course the Herald profits by the occasion to fulminate its usual extravagant denunciations of the French EMPEROR, and threats of dire vengeance on him. The News, more rationally, predicts that France will now be driven to recognise Southern independence, and says the only course of the North 'is to forestall him with the South, and, by negotiating an honourable peace, to unite the two sections in defence of the Monroe doctrine.' It adds: 'We must fight France, and Mexico, and the Confederacy all together, or make common cause with the South against the interlopers' 'The French fleets and armies, combined with those of the Confederacy, would prove too much for the utmost resources of the North.'

We are not disposed to exaggerate the importance of a vote, even though a unanimous one, from that turbulent and impulsive body which on a memorable occasion passed by a large majority resolutions of thanks to the officer who had grossly insulted the British flag. This vote means precisely what the most outspoken advocate of the Federal cause in London, with its usual frankness, says it means, when 'translated into plain, cool, and practical resolution.' 'If the United States,' says the Star of the 18th instant, 'have much of other and difficult business to attend to, they will let the Mexican Empire alone. If the Emperor MAXIMILIAN . . . should prove himself equal to a great emergency, and qualified to be a formidable military chieftain, the United States would probably let him and his Empire alone. But if the United States should have time and favourable opportunity, they will probably find some means of disturbing the career of the new Empire.' The other recognised exponent of Federal interests, the Daily News, writes in the same sense, though not with the ingenuous and unconscious frankness of its humbler colleague; and it even betrays some little spleen at the imprudence of the open declaration of hostilities. 'The world,' it says, 'was in no danger of misunderstanding the feelings with which the citizens of the United States must regard the proceedings of the French in Mexico. Why then proclaim a dissatisfaction which can only be expressed in words?'

For once we find ourselves able to agree with our pro-Federal contemporaries, and like them we do not exaggerate, nor on the other hand do we underestimate, the significance and importance of the vote. The journal last quoted can conceive of no other explanation than that it has been decided at Washington, at least for the present, not to recognise the Mexican Empire. In this again we agree in opinion. A vote such as this is not the mere wanton ebullition of ill-temper or impotent spite. There can be no doubt that it was had in obedience to an irresistible pressure from without, and to calm the public excitement that had been produced by repeated and to some extent substantiated reports of a private understanding having been entered into between the French Government and Mr. SEWARD on the subject of Mexico. The resolution was introduced as a Report of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, by the Chairman of that Committee. Now, in the Federal Legislature, where Cabinet Ministers have no seats, the Chairmen of Committees corresponding to executive Departments are always supposed to represent in some degree the views of the Government, if the Government has a working majority. It seems, therefore, an inevitable conclusion that Mr. SEWARD himself approved, and perhaps initiated, the resolution, with a view of anticipating and preventing one in much stronger terms and more offensive to France. At all events, the Administration is so far inextricably bound by it that it is precluded from any recognition, diplomatic or otherwise, of the young Empire. The resolution must now be submitted to the Senate, and the same reasons which caused its unanimous acceptance by the Lower House will certainly obtain at least a majority in its favour. Mr. SEWARD, who, with all his faults, is by far the most moderate of the public men of his party, would probably be sincerely glad to make, and, so far as it is in his power, to carry out, some such tacit or expressed understanding with France as has been laid to his charge. But if such an arrangement has already been entered into, his excuse for the non-fulfilment of his part of the compact would now be a ready and an unanswerable one. Without the assent of the Senate, no Minister, not even a Consul, can be appointed; and even the Lower House, by simply withholding the necessary appropriations, might, if so disposed, defeat any such appointments. These facts Mr. SEWARD would plead, if called upon to fulfil a promise to send to or receive from the Emperor MAXIMILIAN diplomatic or consular representatives. Upon this supposition Mr. SEWARD has, by one clever dodge, sheltered himself at one and the same time from the storm of popular indignation at home and diplomatic reproaches abroad.

We do not believe that a single one of the French EMPEROR'S plans is traversed by this circumstance. We do not believe that he ever dreamed of the Yankees as possible neighbours to the monarchy reared under his protection, except in the parched plains of the interior desert and the frontier of isolated California. We do not believe that, though he may have been willing to receive assurances of present peace, he ever deceived himself that these assurances would be kept longer than convenient to the Federal Government, or indeed could be kept beyond the terms of office of the men now in power. It was a significant fact, and one which may have much to do with the easy pliancy of Mr. LINCOLN'S Government to the universal clamour, that his most formidable rival in the impending Presidential election has based his chief appeal to the suffrages of the people upon a pledge of irreconcilable and active enmity to the monarchy in Mexico. Both the Emperor NAPOLEON and the Emperor MAXIMILIAN understand too well the situation which they have thus far commanded with singular tact and sagacity, to be taken unawares at this late moment. As long as Mr. Seward could restrain the impatience of the Northern people, it might have suited their convenience to temporise, though in doing so they jeopardised the good will of their only natural allies and cordial friends in the New World. But they will know how to pick up at the proper moment the gauntlet thrown at their feet from Washington; and the New York journal is perhaps right in anticipating that the unanimous vote just passed may hasten, quicker than had been expected, the solution of others besides the Mexican question on the American continent.

A Catalogue of Villanies.

We are not about to recapitulate the misdeeds of Butler, Turchin, McNeil, and the other names that are inseparably associated with Federal warfare and infamy. We shall not refer to Dahlgren's orders to his command, to the systematic destruction of agricultural implements, the permanent laying waste of fertile districts occupied by an invading army, the flooding of territories equalling a kingdom in size, the use of Greek fire against an inhabited town without any military pretext whatever, the fruitless attempt at exciting servile insurrection, the wanton persecution of non-combatants. We will not even glance at the revolting inhumanity practised towards the poor deluded or kidnapped negroes who are rotting away by tens of thousands in the swamps of the Mississippi valley. All these crimes, however indefensible, may be palliated as acts of war, and we do not expect war to be waged in the perfect spirit of Christian love, nor, when waged by Yankees, in the chivalrous spirit of gentlemen. Besides, however much Federal officers and soldiers may suffer in comparison with other civilised nations, or with the usages of our time, they are still some little way behind what is recorded of the Spanish conquest of Mexico and Peru, or the Duke of Alva's government in the Netherlands.

Our theme to-day is not of those greater and more horrid crimes which men commit in the heat of passion and the devilry of hate. We have to treat of more ignoble villanies, such as consign the perpetrators to the galleys, and such as, lacking the crimson lustre of the battle-field, have only the dim shabby colour of the gaol-bird's plumes. The indignation of the English public at the shameless forgery of an official document with the signature of a Minister of State, confessed, after several months of deception, only just in time to anticipate by a few days the exposure from Richmond, will soon lapse into contemptuous disgust. We, who knew the ruling faction of the Northern States by longer experience, were neither deceived nor very much surprised by such clumsy impostures. Moreover, we remembered the wholesale forgery, not many months since, of the list of officers of the Southern Independence Association of London, published by the Daily News, and not retracted until after the reiterated protests of the persons whose names had been abused. So we were somewhat accustomed to the Yankee practice, though on a smaller scale. We had also seen, not two years since, forged Confederate Treasury notes publicly exposed for sale in Fleet Street by avowed Yankee sympathisers, and we know that such notes, warranted as 'perfect facsimiles,' are advertised in the Northern papers, and are plentifully scattered in the track of the Northern armies. But let not an honest and truth-loving public suppose that our catalogue of Northern villanies ends here. Clarence Randolph Young, the pet witness of the Federal Legation, has not yet left the witness-box, despite the scorching rebuke from the bench. Look over the Parliamentary papers on North America during the present session, and you will still find his name, with a trifling alteration of spelling, in all its euphonious amplitude at the bottom of the depositions with which poor Earl Russell's head is pelted from Portland Square. And, judging from these papers, and from facts not yet published, the tribe of Youngs has grown and multiplied, until now it presents an array more numerous and mentally more deformed than Falstaff's recruits. Some of the doings of these gentry would be amusing, if they were not so intolerably annoying to decent people. A short time since, in Liverpool, the residence of a lady whose husband (then absent) is connected with Confederate affairs, was beset by spies, who watched it night and day, and sought ingress under various pretences, until the nuisance at last became so great that the police had to be applied to. In or near Glasgow, an outrage even more flagrant was perpetrated. A Federal official, bearing a commission from the President of the United States, obtained, under pretext of seeking lodgings, access to the chambers of a gentleman supposed to be implicated in the building of some suspected vessel in the Clyde, and upon the data acquired in this ingenious reconnaissance, a search-warrant was actually issued afterwards, though, of course, without producing the expected revelations. There is scarcely an officer or prominent citizen of the Confederate States, resident in England, who is not more or less beset and pestered by this ubiquitous and proteau-shaped espionage. Servant-maids are bribed to purloin letters; landladies are frightened by a mock assumption of inquisitorial authority; wives in the absence of their husbands are imposed upon with fictions. When successful, which they seldom are, these practices are avowed by the Federal agents, or at least the fruits are unblushingly used to swell the 'mass of evidence' transmitted through Mr. Adams to the Foreign Office. That we are not exaggerating the extent of the organisation to which this system of Federal espionage has been carried will be evident to every ordinary reader of the newspapers. It is a notorious fact, repeatedly complained of through the press, that every considerable shipyard in Great Britain is watched by spies. The circumstances of the seizure of the Peterhoff will also be recollected, and how it was partially excused on the ground that she was marked on a list of suspected vessels with suspected owners furnished by a Federal consul to his Government. A short time since it was made a boast of in a Northern newspaper that an officer of a blockade-runner, the Cumberland, had been bribed by the Federal Consul at Havana, or his employé, to bring the ship to a designated spot, where the De Soto lay five days in wait for her.

But these things are puerile compared to what remains to be told. During last autumn or winter the confidential clerk of the eminent French naval contractor, M. Voruz, of Nantes, disappeared, and with him very important and valuable papers relating to the business transactions of the house. As the man enjoyed a highly respectable position and an ample salary, it was clear that no ordinary or small temptation could have induced him to forfeit his prospects and his country, and to risk the galleys. Not long afterwards, Mr. Dayton, the Federal Minister at Paris, in a correspondence which has been recently published, submitted to the French Minister of Foreign Affairs what purported to be copies of papers implicating M. Voruz, and also his correspondent, M. Armand, of Bordeaux, by the evidence of their own signatures, in extensive transactions for building vessels of war for the Confederates. Upon this evidence, Mr. Dayton based a formal demand for the seizure, or at least detention, of certain vessels, and other measures to frustrate the nefarious attempts of the Confederates against the neutrality of France. We have no means of judging of the genuineness of this evidence, and we understand that both Messrs. Voruz and Armand decline, as they have a perfect moral and legal right to do, to pronounce in the matter until the originals are produced, of which these papers profess to be copies. Mr. Dayton's dilemma, however, is no enviable one to a gentleman and the representative of a foreign nation. Either the papers submitted to the French Foreign Office are of a piece with the report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy palmed on Earl Russell, and in that case the simultaneous employment of forged documents for the same purpose with the two Governments would bear somewhat too suspicious a character. Or, on the other hand, if they are genuine, then he confesses himself guilty of subornation of robbery, and liable, but for his diplomatic character, to a criminal prosecution.

Here we leave the subject. Comments are needless on the conduct of a Government whose official representatives perform the functions of spies, and are rewarded and promoted in proportion as they prove themselves adepts in bribery and subornation. If the Confederate States can only triumph over their adversaries by the use of similar means, then their cause is hopeless. Their people lack the cunning, the base propensities, the aptitude for lying, which are indispensable requisites for success in such a mode of warfare. So utterly loathsome and repugnant to their feelings is what the Yankees call 'smartness and cuteness,' that we do not hesitate to say, were they a neutral nation, practices such as these by any belligerents within their jurisdiction would not be tolerated one day after they had been publicly exposed. We are prouder, in this respect, of the people of the South than even for their admitted valour in the field, and their moderation in good or adverse fortune. No extremity of need has ever tempted them into 'pious frauds,' or into consenting to enlist sympathy and help under false pretences. May it always be so, and so sure as truth is mightier than falsehood, so sure will their moral battles be won as gloriously as those of the sword. And let us add also, that if the Southern people have so sternly adhered to the truth, even when to lie seemed almost patriotism, it is because few people have so much to gain, and so little to fear, from 'the whole truth and nothing but the truth.'

Lincoln and Fremont.

In our last number we quoted from the New Nation, a journal started in New York as the organ of the Fremont party, an important political manifesto. Important we mean, as an indication of the condition and prospects of the North, for respecting the issue of the Presidential contest the South is supremely indifferent. The Confederates who are fighting for peace, would exceedingly rejoice at the election of a peace candidate, so that the horrible and useless strife might be forthwith concluded; but if there is to be a 'war-President' it signifies not to them whether Lincoln or Butler, Grant or M'Clellan, Fremont or a negro, be the next tenant of the White House. The Confederates cannot hope to have a more incapable enemy than Mr. Lincoln, and, perhaps, if they had any influence, would exercise it in his favour. On the other hand, none of the Republican Candidates have military ability of a high order; if they had, it would be paralysed by the necessity of sacrificing merit to party jobbery. If Grant was the warrior his supporters represent, making him President is just the way to shelve him. Suppose M'Clellan should be chosen, he cannot restore the legions of men and the vast resources sacrificed by the present imbecile and corrupt administration; and he would be thwarted at every opportunity by the Republicans unless he conciliated the leaders by adopting a Republican policy. But though the South is not interested in the issue, the contest itself is very instructive. The curtain is lifted, and we are permitted to look upon the actual condition of affairs in the United States. If the failure and exhaustion, rottenness and corruption, confessed by the Yankees themselves, had been ascribed to them by their enemies, it would have been hard to believe that the Confederates had not indulged in gross exaggeration. Even now Europe is loath to believe that the Yankees are guilty of the crimes most clearly established against them. The Captain of the Kearsage penned and signed a palpable falsehood, and Earl Russell endeavoured to frame an excuse for it, much to the amusement of the House of Lords. A forged document is foisted upon the British Government, and the Times, with mild credulity, intimates that the authorship is rather uncertain; by which we are asked to suppose that it is possible Mr. Seward did not know the document to be a forgery when he uttered it. Another forgery perpetrated by the Federal Government for a purpose analogous to that for which the 'Mallory Report' forgery was executed, is discovered, but the Times, which is famous in the suppressio veri art, does not make the faintest allusion to it. As in the case of the Mallory Report forgery, the Times will only credit the guilt of the Yankees when Mr. Seward admits it. We trust that ere long the attempt to whitewash the Federal Government will be abandoned, for it is an unthankful task. What can be done by an advocate, however ingenious, when the prisoner at the bar persists in pleading guilty, and drags before the Court superabundant evidence that his plea is true?

All parties and all men in the United States, except his employees and immediate supporters, denounce the conduct of Mr. Lincoln. All the journals, except those in his pay, are bitterly hostile to him. It may be suggested that the unanimity on this point arises from the common desire to share the spoils of office, and that the Chaseites, Maclellanites, Fremontites, Grantites, and all the other 'ites' pitch into Mr. Lincoln, because he is their most formidable competitor. To admit this would be to defend Mr. Lincoln by utterly condemning the whole nation, and would be saying in effect that out of twenty millions of people he is the only honest person. But it is not true that Mr. Lincoln is unjustly charged. Granting for argument's sake that no virtue is left in the Republic, that the New York Daily News, as well as the Herald and the New Nation, is instigated only by the desire for place and pay, we are also obliged to grant that whether the motive of the prosecutors be worthy or unworthy, the bill of indictment against Mr. Lincoln is fully proven.

The New Nation comments upon Mr. Lincoln's incapacity and dishonesty. Non-success is not always the result of individual incapacity, but three years of such failures as the United States have passed through indelibly brand the Government with imbecility. We admit that Mr. Lincoln is not to be blamed because he has not accomplished an impossible task—the subjugation of the South; but that he has done so little with resources so great that it taxed Yankee ingenuity to exaggerate them, is wonderful and discreditable. After three years of warfare, the Federals are as far from Richmond as ever, and are still anxious about the safety of Washington. After holding New Orleans for two years, neither that city nor the State is Unionised. Charleston, Mobile, and Wilmington still defy the enemy. So far from the Confederate army being broken, it was never before so large or more eager to meet the foe. Everywhere grand expeditions have been checked and defeated, and in place of signal victories the Federals have had to record devastation and robberies by fleeing and demoralised soldiers, and reconnaisances very costly and entirely worthless. What can be more complete than the naval failure? What has the United States navy done during the war? It has saved beaten armies from surrender, and it has blockaded British ports, insulted the British flag, and maltreated British seamen. But beyond these deeds there is only a record of disaster and imbecility. All the naval laurels of the war have been won by the nascent navy of the South; and in every encounter, whether at sea or against forts, the Yankee fleet has been beaten. Unmolested by Federal men-of-war, the little band of Confederate cruisers have patrolled the seas and inflicted severe injury on Yankee commerce. The Foreign Policy of Mr. Lincoln is also a conspicuous failure. At the outbreak of the war the sympathies of the world were with the United States. That this should change was inevitable because the sympathy was not merited; but it did not follow that it should happen, as it has happened, that after three years all respectable and virtuous men should look upon the United States as a country disgraced by a Government to whom falsehood, fraud, and forgery are habitual.

Nor is there any excuse for Mr. Lincoln. Never was any potentate so lavishly supplied with means. He has called for two millions and a quarter of men, and, according to his own statement, over a million and three-quarters have enlisted. His armies have been lavishly equipped from the markets of Europe, and, let us add, his soldiers have fought and died with a courage worthy of a better master than the jester, who amid the horrors of the battle-field ordered an officer to sing a comic song. As for money, Mr. Lincoln was better off than any monarch has ever been at the commencement of hostilities. The friends of the Confederacy thought that a financial crisis would soon cool the Northern fever; but they forgot that Mr. Lincoln—thanks to the economy and probity of Southern statesmen—was unhampered with debt, and that he had to draw on the totally unfettered resources of an exceedingly prosperous trading and agricultural nation of twenty millions. Under the clever management of Mr. Chase, the Federal Government has been able to spend more in three years than this country did during the long continental struggle. And besides giving men and money, the people of the United States gave up their liberty, so that popular rights might not impede the military operations of the Executive. These enormous means have been expended with astounding prodigality. In three years, despite recruiting in Ireland and Germany, the Federal armies are languishing for the want of reinforcements, and Mr. Lincoln cannot fill his ranks by bounties, and is afraid to resort to drafting. In three years the wealth of the country has been so mortgaged that the most sanguine, whilst hoping that national bankruptcy may be postponed, do not think it can be altogether averted. Invested with despotic power, with the charters of liberty crushed beneath his feet, Mr. Lincoln, even in the midst of a foreign war, has not preserved the country from anarchy.

But Mr. Lincoln's administration has been as remarkable for dishonesty as for imbecility. A genuine thoroughbred Yankee is rather proud of being called 'smart,' that is of being sharp to take unfair, though not illegal advantage of unsuspecting customers; and to charge him with falsehood does not in the least ruffle his temper. He has, however, no sympathy with unsuccessful roguery, and hence expresses unmingled contempt for him derisively nicknamed Honest Abe. Some men seek for a bad end by honest means, and others try to promote a lawful purpose by censurable measures. Mr. Lincoln has sought to obtain an improper object by the most objectionable agencies. We do not at this moment condemn him for the crime of entering upon an unnecessary and therefore wicked war, nor shall we enlarge upon the atrocity of waging war for the sake of retaining political power. Unhappily, Mr. Lincoln is only one amongst very many who have thought dominion cheaply purchased by a sea of human blood and the desolation of a country; but he is singular in his determined adherence to wrong-doing in every step, important and unimportant. Having decided for war, what availed the shameful deceit practised upon the Southern commissioners in Washington? A frank declaration of hostilities would have less offended the South, and promoted greater enthusiasm in the North, but from first to last everything that has been done has been done crookedly. A bare list of Mr. Lincoln's misrepresentations about the war would outrun our space; but we submit, without fear of contradiction, that no statement about the war made by Mr. Lincoln, or any report emanating from his Cabinet, has been free from shameful exaggeration and gross falsehood. Look at the negro question. How he fenced and trifled with it! To keep some terms with the Democrats he snubbed the negro, and recommended him to leave the country. To win favour with the ultra-Abolitionists he issued his so-called Emancipation Proclamation, which declared that 'loyal' citizens were to be rewarded by keeping their slaves, and disloyal citizens were to be punished by the loss of their slaves. The real object of this edict was to stir up a servile war. Lately Mr. Lincoln has done rather a 'smart' stroke of business with the negro. Some of his Democratic supporters were asking what was to be done with a negro population that would not work, as was the case with the 'freedmen' in the command of General Banks. Mr. Lincoln answered the complaint by remitting the 'freedmen' to forced labour; and as, in years gone by, their forefathers admired and upheld the slave trade because it was profitable, so now the Abolitionists wink at General Banks's system of forced labour, because the profits are to go into Yankee pockets. But we do not believe in the policy of low cunning. Sensible men would have been less disgusted, and the cause of Abolition in greater repute, if Mr. Lincoln had been loyal to his party and his principles. Nor is this less true of the Lincoln foreign policy. Mr. Seward is not more, indeed is not so responsible as his chief, for the diplomacy that has made the Government of the United States contemptible in the eyes of Europe. The Governments of England and France have not been kept from intervention by the multitude of false promises and assurances that the 'rebellion' would be crushed in sixty or ninety days. The indignities to which the British Ministry has been subjected may have gratified the pride of Mr. Seward, and suggested a few jokes to Mr. Lincoln; but the Federal Government would have stood better abroad if its conduct had been truthful and honourable, according to civilised customs and manners.

Certainly Mr. Lincoln has succeeded in uprooting constitutional government and freedom in the United States, and, as a natural sequence, he will not, unless upon compulsion, lay down his power. There are only two ways in which he can be re-elected. The one is by the suffrages of the people; but he knows full well that, in a fair fight, he has no chance. So the master of legions resolves to renew his lease of office by other agencies than free voting. Still he resorts to unnecessary chicanery. Mr. Seward proclaimed a bold policy by asserting that Mr. Lincoln was elected to rule over thirty-four States for four years, and that he must do so. But this was too direct a course for the West Country attorney, and he hits upon the scheme of manufacturing bogus States, and in pursuance thereof ordered the disastrous Florida expedition. Surely the Fremont party are justified in saying to Mr. Lincoln, through their organ, the New Nation:—

> You have told the country that both the rebellion and slavery were dead; you have told the people that the forces of the rebels were reduced by desertions, and that they could not be recruited, fed, or clothed; and yet you are forced to act upon the defensive, being threatened at all points.
> The whole truth is this: you are leading the nation quietly to its destruction by deceiving the people as to the dangers which threaten it.
> You have dishonoured us abroad by shameless misrepresentations as to our true condition.
> Corruption has entered into every department of your administration. Your honesty is of a strange description. It consists in nearly ruining the country and in disregarding its interests, in order to make sure of power for four years longer.

This is a melancholy picture of the condition of the country; but no party in the United States except the 'loyal contractors' party will say it is too highly coloured, and no one in Europe except the retainers of Mr. Lincoln will assert that it is a false representation. So far from being conspicuous for integrity, 'honest Abe' is pre-eminently dishonest. We suppose no one will imagine we have any desire to promote the cause of Mr. Fremont. He is quite as capable as Mr. Lincoln, he is an ultra-abolitionist, he is pledged to continue the war, he is the advocate of the Monroe doctrine, and would seize the first opportunity for making war in Canada, and for attacking the Empire of Mexico. Yet if we were a citizen of the United States, and had to choose between Lincoln and Fremont, we should rather vote for the latter. His administration might not be more efficient or less corrupt, but it could not be less efficient or more corrupt, and he would probably eschew the disgusting vice of canting hypocrisy.

Parliament.

Thus far, matters have gone much more smoothly than, before Easter, the Government or its warmest supporters ventured to expect. This may have been owing, in some degree, to a rumour which found expression in the Economist, to the effect that Lord Palmerston, if unmolested, would not dissolve till the end of the session of 1865; whereas, if defeated, he would of course make an immediate appeal to the country. Party spirit must be very strong when it overcomes the instinctive reluctance of Parliament to commit suicide; and the intimation that docility might postpone the dreaded hour of dissolution for another year had no doubt a good deal to do with the change which has come over the spirit of the Opposition. Again, it was announced that the promised Conference would actually meet to consider the affairs of Slesvig and Holstein, and no one wishes to take out of Lord Russell's hands the duty of settling the disputes he has so mischievously inflamed, or to relieve him from the full responsibility of an almost inevitable failure. This feeling had no doubt some share in pacifying the excited spirit of the Conservative party. A still more potent sedative was the resignation of Mr. Stansfeld, a step honourable to himself, and beneficial, as we think, to both political parties. Thanks to his blunders, and the still worse blunder of Mr. Layard, the presence of the Civil Lord of the Admiralty had become a source of embarrassment and peril to the Government. It rendered all but impossible the renewal of intimate relations with France; and it assumed the appearance of a challenge to the Opposition, and a defiance of the strongly marked sentiment of the House of Commons. Mr. Stansfeld sacrificed himself to the necessities of public policy and party convenience, resigned his office, and made his final explanation and defence from the second bench below the gangway. The Opposition leaders were all absent; and their absence bore the semblance of discourtesy, and seemed to imply an ungenerous unwillingness to accept the atonement and pronounce the personal acquittal of a political opponent. They owed Mr. Stansfeld something, for he had saved them from committing a blunder. Had they defeated the Administration and gone to the country on the issue of Mr. Stansfeld's guilt or innocence, they would have given a very formidable advantage to their antagonists, and might have incurred an unpopularity as great as that which attached to Lord Palmerston's Conspiracy Bill. If, therefore, Mr. Stansfeld's resignation saved the Ministry from trouble and defeat, it also saved the Opposition from a damaging and dangerous victory. In itself it is not to be regretted. Mr. Stansfeld, as a member of the Administration, had allowed letters intended for Mazzini to pass through his hands—to be sent to his house in a feigned name—and the loss of office was not too severe a penalty for an indiscretion so serious.

The second night of the session witnessed a debate in the House of Lords which placed Lord Russell in a sufficiently ludicrous position. First, in answer to a question from Lord Donoughmore, the Foreign Secretary had to profess his belief that the captain of the Kearsage had, without knowing or intending it, carried off several Irishmen from Cork; that these Irishmen had been, against the will and express command of the captain, stripped, examined by the surgeon, attested, enlisted, clothed in the Federal uniform; and that it was not by the captain's will, or with his knowledge, that when these Irishmen were relanded at Cork they went ashore in the uniform of the Federal army, to proclaim to their countrymen the generosity of the North and the advantages to be found in its service. This amiable credulity, this generous belief in the purity of human nature, this touching confidence in the loyalty of a foreign officer, this chivalrous faith in the word of a Yankee, might in better days have won honour for Lord Russell; in this degenerate age it simply exposes him to ridicule and sarcasm.

Lord Clanricarde followed, with a series of charges affecting the neutrality of the British Government, and tending to show that our conduct throughout had been actuated by an unfriendly feeling towards the South, and an unworthy eagerness to gratify and conciliate the North. He pointed out by what chain of circumstances, by what long series of affronts and slights, the Confederate Government had been compelled to dismiss our Consuls within its jurisdiction. He showed how, through those officers, the British Government had ostentatiously manifested its disregard of the Confederate authorities and its adherence to the cause of the United States; and, instead of acknowledging the claim of the latter to empire over the South only as a claim to be substantiated or defeated by the fortune of war, had taken every occasion to treat the Government of the Union as the de facto Government in the seceded States, and to ignore, not officially only, but by every possible display of disrespect, the Government which those States had established at Richmond. First, Mr. Bunch was withdrawn from Charleston. There was no charge against him. He had done his work exceedingly well; he had not committed his Government by any lack of caution; he was on extremely good terms with the authorities with whom he had to deal and the people among whom he lived. Why was he recalled? Simply because the Government of the United States, with whom he had no longer anything to do, which had ceased to possess the shadow of de facto authority in South Carolina, which was at open war with that State, had pretended to withdraw his exequatur. Here we had the Federal Government assuming to exercise sovereign powers in South Carolina; and Lord Russell at once acknowledging that claim, and in deference to it withdrawing from his post a Consul whose only fault, even in the eyes of the enemy, was that he had carried on his functions in time of war—had communicated with the Confederate authorities, as it was his duty to do. This was an outrageous impertinence to the South, and a violation in spirit, if not in letter, of neutral impartiality. Lord Russell's next proceeding was to recall Mr. Magee, Consul at Mobile, because he had transmitted, by a British man-of-war, with the knowledge and consent of the officer commanding the blockading squadron, money due from the State of Alabama to the British holders of her bonds. The act of Mr. Magee seems to have been strictly lawful, and his withdrawal betokened an unfriendly spirit towards the South. But worse; his removal was not the spontaneous act of Lord Russell. It took place at the demand of Lord Lyons, our Ambassador at Washington, who complained that Mr. Magee had disobeyed his orders. What business had Lord Lyons to give orders to Consul Magee? Lord Lyons is not accredited to the Confederate States. He is our Ambassador at Washington; his business is to conduct our diplomatic transactions with the Federal Government, which is at present waging war upon the South; and his interference with the Southern Consulate, and his pretensions to exercise the authority of an Ambassador in a country to which he was not accredited, ought to have been severely rebuked by his superior. But Lord Russell never seems to have perceived the gross indecency of allowing the Ambassador accredited to one belligerent Power to direct the Consuls whose duties lay within the territories of the other; and Lord Lyons was allowed to appoint a Mr. Cridland as successor to Mr. Magee, thus actually taking upon himself the full authority of an Ambassador to a Government in de facto possession, and asserting by implication the sovereignty of the Federal Government over the State of Alabama. Even this would have passed unnoticed by the forbearing Government at Richmond, had not Mr. Cridland given one account of his mission to the Secretary of State, and another to the authorities at Mobile—an inconsistency which necessitated his dismissal. Finally, to crown this long series of insults, a Consul thought fit—according, as he declared, to orders from home—to direct soi-disant British subjects enlisted in the Confederate armies to throw down their arms when brought into the presence of the enemy. Then, and not till then, did the Confederate Government determine that it could no longer submit to be insulted and defied by officials who had, in fact, no locus standi within its jurisdiction. The Consuls who were friendly to it had been recalled because they were friendly, at the instance of a hostile Power. Those who remained were at the disposal of an envoy accredited to, and eager to maintain relations of good will with, the public enemy, and one of them had formally denied the authority of the Confederate Government even over its soldiers in the field. That Government, therefore, dismissed the subordinates of the Washington Embassy from the Southern States. Such were the circumstances which led to the dismissal of our Consuls. After recapitulating these facts with great force and clearness, Lord Clanricarde questioned the right of Lord Russell to complain that the Confederate Government had deprived British subjects of consular protection. Lord Russell pleaded guilty to every item in the charge. He had withdrawn Mr. Bunch at the demand of the United States; he had dismissed Mr. Magee at the desire of Lord Lyons; he had allowed Lord Lyons to appoint an acting successor. He confessed, in a word, that our Consuls in the South had been subject to our Embassy in the North; and he offered no apology for keeping them in that subjection. He confessed that, under the circumstances, the Confederate Government was entitled to dismiss the Consuls, but he thought it would have been more friendly if they had in the first place addressed a remonstrance to him—to him, who had refused to see their representative, and neglected to answer his letters! Really, Lord Russell is endowed in no common measure with the art of oblivion!

His cup of humiliation was crowned by the enforced confession that the Report of the Confederate Secretary of the Navy, of which he and the Attorney-General had made such unscrupulous use, proved to be a Federal forgery; that he had received from Mr. Adams a slip cut from a New York journal, avowedly resting on no other authority than that of the editor; that he had greedily accepted this excerpt from the New York Times as a genuine Confederate State paper; that he had denounced vengeance against a friendly Government on the strength of this precious document; that he had promised to remonstrate upon it; and that after all it stood confessed a simple and transparent fabrication. What was Mr. Stansfeld's error to this? To accept a Confederate State paper on the word of a Yankee editor, implies either the very dotage of credulity, or the wilful blindness of unscrupulous partisanship. Never before had a Minister to make such a confession; and as Lord Russell left the House, he must have felt that he had effectually, in clear and legible characters, 'written himself down an'—exceedingly incompetent Foreign Secretary.

The great event of the month has been the Budget, or rather the Budget Speech. The former is considered, on the whole, exceedingly satisfactory. A surplus of two millions and a half enables Mr. Gladstone to make a very large reduction in the duty on sugar—the most universal of luxuries—which, if not intercepted by the growers, will be an invaluable boon to the working-man. The reduction of the income-tax by another penny is universally acceptable; and though the diminution in the duty on fire insurances is grudgingly and reluctantly made, it gives hopes of a further and more satisfactory step in this direction. The Budget Speech was an apotheosis of free trade, which since 1842 has trebled the amount of our exports and imports, and maintained the revenue in spite of the repeated reduction and abolition of productive taxes. If not one of Mr. Gladstone's finest efforts, it was worthy of the theme and of the occasion; and though it contained an imprudent reference to the condition of the paper trade, and a still more impolitic menace of the reintroduction of last year's proposal for the taxation of charities, it was heard with attention and applause by a crowded house. Subsequently, an attempt was made to put the claims of malt in competition with those of sugar. It is undeniable that the malt tax is a very bad one. It is a duty on a raw material; it depresses the industry of the agriculturist; it fetters that of the brewer; it tends to promote the adulteration of our national beverage. But it produces £6,000,000 a year, so that it cannot be spared; while to divide it would be to cheapen the labourer's quart of beer by a smaller sum than the smallest coin, so that he would gain no reduction in price, and no increase of consumption would take place to repair the loss sustained by the Exchequer. Besides, beer is at all events a fitter subject of taxation than sugar. Mr. Disraeli, knowing that the Exchequer cannot spare the malt-duty, for once forgot the claims of party, and came to the rescue of the public interest. The result was seen in an overwhelming majority against the proposal to substitute a reduction of the malt tax for a diminution of the sugar duties; and the Budget was saved.

The Government has sustained one important defeat in the person of Mr. Lowe, the Minister of Education. Schools which receive aid from the public purse are inspected by officers appointed for the purpose; and it is the duty of these inspectors—gentlemen of the highest character and education—to report on the progress of education in their respective districts, and on the working of the established system. Their reports are addressed to the Education Office, but are intended for the information and edification of Parliament. Now Mr. Lowe is at feud with the educationists in Parliament, with the supporters of schools in the country, with the inspectors, and indeed with everybody interested in the education of the people. He had thought proper to announce in Parliament his opinion that the report of the inspectors ought to contain no matter unfavourable to his views; and he has been in the habit of suppressing reports which did not conform to his standard. On Tuesday week, Lord Robert Cecil called attention to this practice in terms which implied that the reports were actually garbled in the Education Office. Mr. Lowe denied the fact in the strongest terms; but the vote passed notwithstanding, and Mr. Lowe thereupon resigned office. On Monday he explained a circumstance which had seemed to impugn his veracity, and which had had something to do with the vote of the House. Obnoxious passages in the Reports had been marked, not by Mr. Lowe for the purpose of excision, but by a clerk to call Mr. Lowe's attention. The reports being sent back with such marks to the inspectors, they of course conceived that they were to strike out the passages marked; and hence the charge of 'garbling' preferred against the Department. This practice had long escaped Mr. Lowe, as he was unable to read the reports himself; but when it was brought to his notice, he put an end to it. This explanation cleared Mr. Lowe of the suspicion attached to him by the vote of the House; but it did not impugn the justice of that vote, as touching the practice of sending back for correction or suppressing altogether reports obnoxious to the Committee of Council, which practice the House intended to condemn.

On the same occasion Mr. Disraeli called the attention of the House to a curious violation of the law. From the earliest days of Parliamentary government, precautions have been taken to prevent the inundation of the House of Commons with placemen; and so lately as 1858 a law was passed, in contemplation of the appointment of a fifth Secretary of State, which enacted that no more than four Secretaries or four Under-Secretaries of State might sit at one time in the House of Commons. But for some time past five Under-Secretaries have sat there. Lord Palmerston acknowledged the error, and after some discussion it was agreed to appoint a Committee to enquire into the consequences of this illegality. In the meantime, a Bill of Indemnity is to be prepared.

Denmark has received the benefit of a warm expression of sympathy from the House of Lords. Lord Grey made plain, beyond the possibility of further defence, the incoherence, inconsistency, and radical unsoundness of the Ministerial policy. But then Lord Grey has a policy of his own. Though a strong advocate of peace, he would in this case have gone to war; he would have given material support to Denmark; and from this standpoint he criticises the timid, irresolute, wavering conduct of Lord Russell with terrible effect. But the leaders of Opposition lack the moral courage of Lord Grey. They dare not say that it was our duty to fight, for fear that the idea of war should prove unpopular, and thus all their criticism of Lord Russell's course is met by the effective retort: 'Well, what would you have done?' The effect of such debates is to convince Europe that England is degenerate; that in future nothing will provoke her to fight; and the mischief which such an impression, fostered by the moral cowardice of our statesmen, may eventually do is not easily to be calculated.

LETTER FROM NEW YORK.

New York: April 6, 1864.

THE MILITARY MOVEMENTS—THE BURNING OF PADUCAH—THE MILITARY CENSORSHIP OF THE PRESS—CONVERTED DEMOCRATS—MILITARY INCAPACITY AND POLITICAL SUBSERVIENCY—ROSECRANS, BUTLER, AND BURNSIDE—HOW AN UNCONVERTED DEMOCRAT IS TREATED—MR. LINCOLN'S POWER AND THE USE HE IS MAKING OF IT—THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST—PROSPECTS OF MR. LINCOLN—DISCONTENT AND RIOTING IN THE WEST—IMMINENT PERIL OF CIVIL WAR—THE FINANCIAL DIFFICULTY.

There have been few war events since I wrote you last week. In Virginia, heavy storms have made the roads utterly impassable. The military camps are scarcely habitable. Virginia mud, after such rains, is of a consistency that will take weeks of good sunshine to make practicable for army movements. The projected campaigns, whatever they may be, are thrown over for at least three weeks.

The latest accounts from Tennessee and Kentucky show the Confederate cavalry to be in large force, and very active, along the whole line. They swarm along the whole length of the railroads, from near Paducah on the Ohio river, through Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi, down to the Louisiana border; and eastward, hover about Chattanooga and Knoxville, keeping the Federals in constant alarm for their communications and supply trains. A part of Forrest's cavalry recently captured Paducah, on the Ohio river, a base of supplies for the Federals; and, though driven away by the gunboats, destroyed and carried off a great amount of Federal stores.

On the other hand, the Confederates have met with a loss in the fall of Fort de Russey, on the Red River; and the capture of Alexandria and Natchitoches. Until we get Confederate accounts, we shall not know the real extent of the injury to the planters, nor the prospects of preventing a further advance. The other portion of the same expedition, which was advancing into Western Louisiana by the way of the Teche, has had a miscarriage, and been turned back, as the Confederates say, with considerable loss.

In the affair at Paducah, when the Southern troops had taken the place, and were destroying or carrying off the Government stock of supplies, the Yankee gunboats came down and shelled the town, during which it was fired, and a large portion of it was burned down. The bulletins to the Northern press announced, in flaming letters, that the rebels had 'sacked and burned Paducah'—the sacking being a large figure of speech, and the burning done by their own shot. More than one journal made it the theme for passionate tirades against the barbarities of the rebels. The story will, however, remain, and be repeated as a set-off, in Yankee histories, to the well-authenticated details of the wanton burnings of scores of undefended villages by Yankee armies in all parts of the pillaged South.

The Yankees are determined to have the writing of the history of this war for themselves, not only in the daily lies of the bulletin, but by suppressing the circulation, even among themselves, of any accounts but their own. Of this General Rosecrans, who was late in command of the army of the Cumberland, from which he was removed after his defeat at Chicamauga, and sent to the Missouri Department, has just given a notable example. He has issued orders prohibiting the circulation of Pollard's 'History of the War,' a Southern publication written at Richmond, and other works and histories written from Southern sources of intelligence, and has seized the stock on hand. It is disloyalty there to read anything that is not written at the North, and moreover not in favour of the whole policy of the Administration; for the same General has issued another order prohibiting the circulation, within his Department, of the Metropolitan Record, a Roman Catholic weekly paper of New York, for certain editorial articles therein impugning the justice of the war upon the South. These acts of military tyranny are merely noticed in the newspapers among items of public news which do not provoke a comment as being anything extraordinary.

The conduct and the treatment by the President of this man Rosecrans, and of one or two other generals, will serve to illustrate the political management of this war by the Administration.

General Rosecrans was a Democrat, and shared fully in the doctrines of that party in respect to the limited powers of the Federal Government and the original powers retained by the States. When first put in command in Tennessee, he was watched with jealousy from Washington, as not well affected to the Administration; and even when his military career was going on most successfully, he was assailed, and opportunities were sought to get rid of him. He was badly beaten at Chicamauga, and immediately afterwards the friends of the Administration assailed him bitterly in his military capacity, and for personal misconduct of the most gross and disgraceful character. This assault suddenly stopped, and he was, without trial or enquiry for the loss at Chicamauga, transferred to an important command. Immediately afterwards he became one of the most active and rabid advocates of the extreme policy, and the willing instrument of the worst excesses of the Administration. He made public speeches, in which he advocated the raising of the conscripted slave of the South, by virtue of wearing the United States uniform, to political equality with the white man as a voter. He stops the circulation in his Department of books and papers that discuss public questions and narrate facts differently from his standard; and he has, moreover, undertaken to regulate the churches by military code. In his Department no preacher can enter a pulpit, and no congregation of any religious denomination can hold a meeting for ecclesiastical purposes, without previously satisfying the Commanding General that they are 'loyal' according to his pattern of unquestioning submissiveness. It is by this excess of zeal that a renegade Democrat finds pardon with the Administration for fatal military blunders and gross personal delinquencies; Rosecrans, too, is a Catholic, and political cunning had further uses for him on that score.

Butler bought his immunity in the same way. He, too, was a Democrat of the strictest sect, and adhered to the South after the split at the Charleston Convention in 1860. Long after he entered the army, he professed the same opinions, and declared his repugnance to any prosecution of the war, in the interests of Abolitionism, as against the constitutional rights of the Southern States. He failed as a general at Big Bethel, as he has done everywhere as a soldier, and was sent to the Gulf of Mexico under a cloud, and without the expectation that he would do anything there. New Orleans was not looked for to fall so soon, or the command would not have been given to Butler. When Commodore Farragut had taken the city with his gunboats, and Butler following after occupied it with his troops, he continued to profess to leading citizens there, whom he sent for to consult, that he came as a deliverer, not merely from the tyranny of Secessionism, but against Abolitionism. He seems to have fancied the war over with the fall of New Orleans, and the rescued South restored to the Union to be a great counter to be played with, in an after game of ambition, by one who could stand up and prove that he had been always her friend. In this tone he talked to such men as Mr. Soulé, with whom he had acted intimately in old party relations. I hope Mr. Soulé has preserved memoranda of these conversations as contributions to history. The substance was well known at the time to many who like Mr. Soulé were incredulous of all Northern faith, and stubbornly resolved never to be cheated again. The South being unyielding, and Lincoln growing strong, Butler rapidly conformed, and, by becoming the subservient follower of the Administration, earned the privilege of converting his Government of Louisiana into an Oriental satrapy, for such cruelty, extortion, and plunder as have made his name infamous throughout Christendom. Mr. (now Senator) Reverdy Johnson, an agent of the Government sent out to enquire into affairs in his Department, made a report against his administration which should have subjected him to trial, and on conviction to dismissal in disgrace from the service. Unionists made representations as to his outrages and pillagings, and implored the Government to interfere for the sake of its own character and its cause. But he was left undisturbed until the complaints of foreign Governments against his maltreatment of their subjects constrained his new-made patrons to displace him for a season, only to transfer him, after a short delay, without censure or even investigation, to another responsible employment, where he has renewed the same career. This man has never shown the slightest military capacity, nor done the smallest military service; and his administrative capacity consists in doing, with a brutal energy, the ferocious will of those to whom he sold his political faith, and pledged his political services, for immunity in crime.

Burnside is another of the same sort—a Democrat bought over by office. A wretched failure as a general, execrated for his horrible blunders which drove the Union army into that useless slaughter at Fredericksburg, he made his peace by disgracefully taking upon himself responsibilities that he did not deserve, in order to screen the War Department. Displaced for a brief period, he was restored to service in the west, where, in a few weeks, he made himself, by his cruelties and arbitrary orders and lawlessness, a peer for Butler and Rosecrans—in being also the most servile among the most abject tools of the Administration.

When this manner of dealing with generals, who compound for the loss of battles, and the disgrace which their personal misdeeds cast on the reputation of the country, by forswearing their political faith and doing partisan service to the Administration, is contrasted with the persecutions to which the ablest officers who hold fast to their integrity are exposed, the base motives are easily discerned. General M'Clellan, if not the vast military genius he is claimed to be by many of his admirers, is a head and shoulders above all the other Union generals. I do not except Grant, the idol of the present hour; and the event of this campaign will show I am right in respect to him. During two campaigns, although thwarted and hampered by the President and the War Office at Washington, M'Clellan built up a military reputation which grows more solid the more it is tested by the scrutiny of impartial history. He failed in no instance where the blame of failure to do what was possible cannot be traced to faults not his. He was a Democrat, and, mistaken as he unquestionably is in supporting such a war at all, he would not depart, in carrying it on, from the principles upon which Democrats at the beginning persuaded themselves to assent to it—for the restoration of a union of equal States. He stood, and still stands, aloof from the whole Lincoln scheme of confiscation, forced negro emancipation, State subjugation, and State extinction, and the savage practices of devastation and pillage by which it is prosecuted. Therefore he was displaced from his command, and driven into retirement, where he has been followed by bitter revilings and incessant detractions; and Congress has been beset for months with projects of new laws for the army, of which the President may make use to get rid of General M'Clellan altogether, by dropping his name from the army list.

When Butler, and Rosecrans, and Burnside—I note them as examples of a numerous class of similar renegadoes—are rewarded for their adhesion by amnesty from the hugest blunders and grossest offences, and clothed with honours and great appointments, and M'Clellan is proscribed and hunted out with vindictive animosity, the political source of the discrimination is not to be mistaken. The army is a machine in the hands of the President to be used for the perpetuation of power in the hands of his party, and is manipulated so as to make that use effective.

It has been discovered, by many who were lavish in their support of this whole system of measures to keep the party in power, that the President has been industriously employing them to maintain himself in power as well as them, and in spite of them. Mr. Lincoln has so employed the subserviency which they have exacted from all others towards him, and the powers with which they invested him to bind the army and the whole immense body of army followers, and office-holders, and contractors, and all who support the war from interest, and so given him the benefit of the sympathy of those who support it with passion, that a large body of them begin to see with alarm that he is aiming at the reappointment of himself, by patronage and the army, for another term, and to apprehend that there are no means by which he can be foiled.

I have already described to you some of the internal struggles of the Republican party to get rid of Mr. Lincoln as a candidate. The opposition continues to be very strong, and, especially among the adherents of General Fremont, very loud and denunciatory. The whole body of German Radicals is rampant in proclaiming their determination not to vote for Mr. Lincoln under any circumstances, but I doubt whether their leader himself is quite so implacable. The efforts of Mr. Lincoln's adversaries are just now centred in the attempt to procure the postponement of the nominating Convention from June 7 to a later day in August, or even to September, in order, as is said, to wait for the results of the summer campaign, but, as Mr. Lincoln's friends suggest, in order to tamper with the Convention, and consolidate all opposing interests in the party against the President.

There is no present prospect that the postponement will be allowed. It is within the control of the Republican National Committee at Washington, and that is in the hands of Mr. Lincoln's supporters and of Mr. Lincoln himself. The present indications are that Mr. Lincoln will certainly be renominated then and there; and I see no reasonable ground for supposing that he will not be very generally supported by the party, or that he can be defeated by anything but some serious civil convulsion, or some war disaster which shall finally break down the Northern hope of ever subjugating the Southern States, and roll back upon the party in power a sudden flood of popular wrath as the authors of the national ruin. The idea that a Democratic, Conservative, or Opposition candidate, by whatever name called, can be peacefully elected so long as there is a hope left in the North of overcoming the resistance of the South by arms, is the fancy of a moonstruck politician. Mr. Lincoln can only be displaced by some one more purely radical than he; and between him, his rivals, and a Democratic war candidate, there is so little to choose, and the results of success, in the present attitude of parties, promise so little of good, that no effective rally can be made against the party in power. The spring elections just over show this. The Democrats last year outvoted the Republicans in New Hampshire, and made a close run for victory in Connecticut. Last month they were badly beaten in New Hampshire, and this week again in Connecticut. The Republicans, however disposed to wrangle with each other for the lead among themselves, come together at the polls, and their opponents are dispirited and disunited. These defeats are apologised for in the party press on the ground that the true vote of the States was overwhelmed by the direct action of the Government in sending home picked or pledged voters from the regiments belonging to these States in service; and very good evidence has been published showing the fact of the use of the soldiers, and it is also certain that a great portion of the opposition, seeing the hopelessness of the case, and not sanguine of much good even from success, were dispirited, and ceased to make exertion. But these facts describe the future as well as they do the past. It is but a faint hope with which to disguise despair which affects to expect that these agencies will be less unscrupulously used and less effective at a Presidential election, where the continuance of the power to do these things, and to control the whole force and all the means of the nation, will be staked. There is really no hope of a change of men or a change of policy in the event of a peaceful election for President. The change is to come by a convulsion, and things are tending with irresistible force to a social, political, and financial convulsion, in which the machinery of Administration will be irretrievably shattered, and the whole fabric of Government be dislocated.

There is a very dangerous state of feeling growing up in the West. It prevails extensively in nearly all the States there, but mostly in Southern Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. The population is divided sharply, not into opposing parties merely, but into hostile factions, which have almost ceased to hold social intercourse together, and glare upon each other as enemies. There is a great deal of suffering to aggravate this feeling against the Administration as the author of many of the calamities of which they complain. The origin of the war is the grievance of some; but with most the mismanagement which has protracted it and made peace impossible, which exhausts them of the labour to till their farms, and, having deprived them of their Southern markets, loads their diminished crops with ruinous costs of transportation to the favoured Eastern ports, and takes away half its value in the depreciation of the currency, which threatens them with intolerable taxation, without any of the compensations which the domineering States on the seaboard get in manufacturing monopolies, huge Government contracts, and unlimited public expenditures. But, above all, the fury of the Opposition is excited by the tyrannical manner with which the opponents of Administration are treated by its military commanders of high and low degree, and the acts of outrage and violence they are subjected to without redress from the partisans of power in the army and out of it. Scarcely a week passes without some outbreak of personal violence upon citizens for any degree of complaint against the policy of the Government, or for suspicion of being disaffected to the full support of the Administration. The local papers, rarely quoted here, contain variously coloured accounts of the conflicts which this state of things provokes; but not the half is told, for scarcely a week passes without some newspaper office being mobbed, or actually torn down, for giving currency to these adverse opinions. Bands of returned soldiers and roving parties of soldiers in service are mostly the agents in these acts. The 'loyal' press takes up their defence by suppressing or distorting the facts, or justifies them as deserved by 'copperheads,' and the military authorities directly authorise, or covertly protect, the delinquents. The consequence has been that society is disorganised. Laws being contemned on one side are no longer relied on or respected on the other; men organise to take their own defence into their own hands; and it has become notorious, although no Eastern journals of any party will dare avow it, that there is a general arming going on on both sides, and that large bodies of men drill together, not for the purposes of public war, but as against each other. The conflict at Charleston, in Coles County, Illinois, a few days ago, which is carefully slurred over by the press, is only an example of what happens frequently and is not mentioned at all, and illustrates the excited temper of the people. It included a Republican design to mob a judge who was odious to the partisans of the Administration, an attempt to break up a meeting called to hear the address of a Democratic candidate for Congress against the policy of the Government, and the prominent rioters were United States soldiers. They were resisted by armed men, and in the tumult several persons were killed. The sheriff of the county interfered to quell the disturbance, and was for his reward gazetted throughout the Union as the leader of a 'copperhead' rebellion. The same state of feeling, aggravated by the same provocations, is heard of, by private advices, in almost every part of the Western States, and is growing into a fierce determination to overthrow the powers that be, at the first opportunity, and by any available means, even if it should compel the abandonment of the war. It is a very dangerous element for the excitable times of a Presidential election, in which there is every probability that the new provocation will be thrown in of a President imposed upon the country by a vote which will be vehemently charged to be fraudulent, either dictated through the army, or consummated by cheating devices in the manufacture of electoral votes by the military orders of the Executive. In that direction lies the imminent peril of civil war in the North.

Another proximate danger is the commercial and financial revulsion that must come before many months; how soon it is in vain to prophesy, for it may be here before the words go out and come back again, and may be deferred until the failure of another Treasury expedient or two to check the decline of the public credit, and the financial explosion of the gigantic paper expansion, on which the public expenditures have been hitherto so wastefully supported. The debt increases frightfully fast; the expenditures swell with the undiminished necessities of war and the enormous enhancement of prices; the loans put on the market to meet the current deficiencies for immediate uses, that have reached to more than $250,000,000, have failed; the shabby attempt to reduce the premium on gold by 'bearing' in Wall Street has failed ridiculously; and there is no present resource but in the issue of more unredeemable paper, and hence more enhancement of prices. The Secretary calls for $250,000,000 more of direct taxation, and Congress hesitates and holds back, afraid to tax, and afraid of instant financial ruin if it do not tax: and the whole community, rioting in the abundance of paper money, is running mad in luxury and the wildest speculations, as if anything were preferable to holding on to the Government currency. It is a question of time only when these combined causes will produce that crash of fortune and credit, and precipitate those internal but inevitable convulsions with which the Nemesis of nations will punish this people for the gigantic wickedness of this war against liberty and self-government.

New York: March 30, 1864.

THE SANITARY FAIR—RECKLESS EXTRAVAGANCE THE GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURE—THE PUBLIC DEBT ITS RAPID GROWTH NO PROSPECT OF A REDUCTION IN THE EXPENDITURE—INDIFFERENCE OF THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS OF MR. CHASE—CONGRESS SHRINKS FROM TAXATION—THE PROSPECT OF REPUDIATION—PEACE WILL NOT BRING RELIEF, BUT WILL BE THE SIGNAL FOR AGITATION.

The Easter holidays have come, and feasting and revelling are going on throughout the land as they were in the palace of Belshazzar when the finger came to write the sentence of doom on the wall. There was, indeed, but slight intermission for the privations of Lent. The solemn fast had its own gorgeous pretensions. Pomp and vanity knelt in silks and jewels in the morning, and flaunted all day in a whirl of excitement for the getting up of the grand gala of the continent—a Sanitary Fair, in which New York aims to astonish the rest of the country by the magnificence of the display and the lavish amount of contributions to a Sanitary Fund for the use of the sick and wounded soldiers of the Union armies. There is an ambition to raise a very large sum, and it will succeed. The people—men and women, and especially the women—are in a delirium of excitement. Multitudes have grown so suddenly rich on the war, the flood of paper money from the Treasury has so swollen the nominal value of every man's property, that he fancies himself rich; and even the lurking distrust that all this may be unreal, and a sudden change may come, so encourages the free expenditure of money in which men have not much confidence, that the rage to spend and to appear to spend has seized on all classes who have the similitude of anything. This fair will undoubtedly show the effects of this epidemic prodigality and ostentatiousness far beyond the real sympathy for the subjects for whom it is professedly got up. There will be a great sum raised, but there is an undercurrent of suppressed enquiry how it is to be used; and hereafter there will be many a squabble among those who are most conspicuous in raising it, to make themselves conspicuous in calling for an account of how it is expended. A large portion of it will undoubtedly go to the profit of those who handle the money, and in supporting in ease a large corps of officers, agents, and retainers, before the filtered residuum reaches the camp and the hospital. It will be found to be the most wasteful expedient possible for the raising of means for a charity; and when the corruptions and vanities which are inherent in the plan are taken into the account, it will, I think, be found that it would have been cheaper, as it certainly would be more proper and effective, for the Government, which has the charge of conducting the war, to have taken on itself the duty and the responsibility of providing sufficiently for its own soldiers.

But the ostentation, excitements, and extravagances of this fair are only symptoms of a universal disease. There are serious pretences and self-deluding excuses for most of them; but the disease is in all parts of the system. The Government is expending, by its own computation, all its revenues, and more than $2,000,000 a day besides. Its debts swell so rapidly, that, with all its power of suppression, it is obliged to confess that within the current six months it has added $170,000,000 to its ascertained debt more than it estimated for at the opening of Congress. It is expending at the rate of $1,000,000,000 a year, and has made no other provision for four-fifths of it than using inconvertible paper and raising forced loans by making it a legal tender. Redundant paper carries prices up enormously, and thus adds, with every increase, new millons to the cost of the war and to the accumulating debt. The degradation of the currency makes money so plentiful that it begets fictitious prosperity. The deluded populace run riot in extravagances of every sort, fine houses, fine furniture, fine horses and carriages, rich dresses, and jewellery, and laces, and costly entertainments, until the friends of the Government have begun to be alarmed at the frightful recklessness, and its journals, which have been the loudest eulogists of the financial plans which begot this frenzy, and the destructive policy which gave excuses for the plans, are joining a chorus of reprobation of this wanton waste, and pleading for caution, prudence, and economy as public duties which may be needed to save the nation in a coming emergency. But they plead in vain. The deluded will believe, and the sordid will not heed. The multitude are frenzied with the dreams of unbounded wealth; and the more shrewd, who know what the inevitable end will be, plunge boldly into the same whirlpool, confiding in their strength or their luck to get out in time, and to bring out with them enough to provide for themselves against the coming catastrophe.

How long can the public credit sustain itself in this course? Whoever can answer this question will enable us to see the beginning of the end of this war.

By the recent Treasury statement, the debt of the Government, funded, and payable at various periods beyond five years, was, in round numbers, $700,000,000. Its liabilities for temporary loans, short borrowings, unpaid requisitions, certificates of debt, and its currency issued, approached to $880,000,000. The whole of this sum is to be carried by the Treasury, at the same time that the expenditures are going on at a rate which the Secretary himself was unable to estimate. It has outrun his calculations by half a million a day for six months; and is going on, by his own figures, at the rate of more than $2,000,000 a day above all the revenue of the Government.

There is no assignable limit to the growth of this debt. It has outrun the imagination as it outran the control of the Secretary by tens of millions of dollars a month. The 'recognised' debt is but a portion of what the final amount will figure up. When all outstanding and contingent claims for the advances and debts of States and corporations and individuals, and for indemnities and compensations, and bounties and pensions, are put in and settled, the sum will be swelled by hundreds of millions. Nor is there any assignable period when these expenditures and this expansion of debt will stop. There is no imaginable date at which a return to the state of peace, or of the rate of expenditure in time of peace, is to be hoped for. No estimate of the most speedy and complete military success leaves the Government in a condition to reduce the volume of the debt which will have been incurred, or even to maintain, with any revenue-system which has been projected, the burden of interest, and provide for the garrisoning and holding of the Southern States, and keeping the population in military subjection. The South continues to show such power and resources, such a formidable military front, and such unbroken purpose of resistance, that even a pause in the huge cost of moving armies of invasion is not within a rational contemplation of the future of any given year.

While the debt and higher prices are moving on with accelerated pace, there is at Washington an indifference, accounted for only by suspicions of premeditated bad faith, or by the despair of being able to check them or hold them in control. With nine hundred millions of floating liabilities and deferred debts, and comparatively no revenues, the only resource of the Treasury is in the continual issue of unredeemed promises, and converting them from one class of debt into another until the redundancy and the discredit have reached that point where a Government dollar has come to be worth less than sixty cents in specie. The premium on gold in Government currency has been within the week as high as 70 per cent. The United States Treasury note was at a discount of over 41 per cent. The Secretary, armed with the power conferred on him to speculate on Government reserves of gold, has been trying to bring down this premium; and that, with outside causes, has affected it to the extent of three or four per cent. It may for a time go down further. But the expedients are damaging to the public credit, and will infallibly react. By one of them he offers to supply importers, for the payment of Custom-house duties, with gold certificates, to be used for that purpose only, at one-quarter per cent. below the current market price of the day. In simpler words, he will agree to receive from importers his own paper in lieu of the lawful gold, at a slight premium over the rate of its depreciation in the market. He thus officially recognises the Government issues to be debased, and deals with them like any private dealer who trades on the suspicion of his own insolvency. When gold was, as one time yesterday, at a premium, between 66 and 67 per cent., the Secretary of the Treasury recognises the Government dollar to be worth only 60 cents. This presumes that the Government has the gold for which it gives certificates, and desires to keep it; but it is plain that it will be but one step further—and a natural if not a necessary one—to issue the certificate for duties without the gold, and make the Treasury deal altogether in paper at its current value.

While this is going on, and the Government credit has sunk to this degree of abasement in its desperate needs for money, Congress has done positively nothing, and matured nothing for its own action to confront the future with. It has, indeed, passed a Gold Bill, which is the Secretary's authority to fight Wall Street with broker's weapons, and scuffle with gold gamblers over their few percentages. It is discussing an elaborately contrived new machine, in a gigantic system of national banks, for reconverting the funded debt into currency; and it is amusing the public by talking of the reduction of the volume of the currency by taxing the State banks out of existence, that the place occupied by their notes may be filled with the new Federalised issues. But it has shrunk, and still shrinks, from the task of meeting the issue in the only way in which even an alleviation is to be found, by bold, thorough, immediate, and heavy taxation.

While the legislators shrink, the huge task grows more and more beyond their strength; and the unspoken belief is gaining ground that no possible revenue system can be devised, which the people will bear, sufficient to provide the means to defray the necessary expenses of the costly government which the war entails, and the burden of the debt when its gigantic proportions shall be fully ascertained. There is something in the apathy with which Congress looks on this threatening aspect of public affairs which is well calculated to weaken public credit still further, by the apprehension that recklessness of public expenditure, and indifference about providing for payment may be signs of a growing despair of ever being able to pay in full, if in the convulsions of the future it may not be made impossible to pay at all.

It can hardly be said that such a design is actually conceived, or that there is a matured purpose yet developed to help it forward. But this amazing indifference in Government circles is one ominous sign of an unhealthy state of opinion, and another is the frequency and patience with which in financial circles the possibility of repudiation, and various plans for 'equitable adjustment,' are listened to. It is only a few weeks since Mr. Stebbins, a member of Congress from the Richmond district (Staten Island, in New York Bay), who is a leading banker in Wall Street and President of the Board of Brokers, made a speech in the House of Representatives, and was listened to with favour, and applauded by the public press, in which he descanted on the grandeur of the resources and prospects of the United States, and actually cited as proofs of their indestructible capacity, that they might postpone or get rid of this debt, and rise with augmented power, and reestablish a firmer credit.

But the real danger of repudiation, the unexpressed alarm for which is part of the discredit of the Government currency, lies beyond the management of Government financiers and statesmen.

This is a country of universal suffrage, and that suffrage will control everything, unless overborne by bayonets for a while, and in that attempt the same thing comes round, a little later, but just as surely. This debt can only be paid by taxation—enormous, continued, perpetual taxation. In other times and wars, when hostilities are over, there comes an alleviation of burdens. Here, peace, however and whenever it comes, will be only a day for readjustment of details for an indefinite duration of war taxes. If it were the best cause in which sword was ever drawn, and had been conducted with unimpeachable integrity and with unanimous popular approval, the time would not fail to come when the toiling masses on whom the burdens fall would become restive under a grinding taxation to which they see no limit or end. If now, when the passions are all excited—when loyalty is identified with sacrifices, and national disgrace and personal humiliation are held to be the true penalties if we hold back whatever is demanded—the Congress is afraid to try the virtue of the people by a system of full taxation, what will happen when the fever-fit is over, and, amidst the wreck of national prosperity, with a broken constitution and national dismemberment, popular resentment shall charge these calamities to those men and their retainers, who alone will come out of the dreadful trial without the smell of blood on their own garments, but radiant in a prosperity made out of the public miseries, and when the ambitious politician and party demagogue shall arise and teach the people that they who have engrossed for themselves and their posterity the right to gather without return the proceeds of the labour of the poor man and his children are his enemies and oppressors, whom it is righteous to strip of the unjust spoil? It requires no power of divination to foresee the early formation of a party with such objects, nor to predict its fortune. The proofs are written unmistakably in the history of the past three years, that there is no principle of good faith for their engagements with others or of obligation to their own creeds, nor sense of Christian duty, nor law of humanity, which will restrain the majority of the Northern people from following out any plan to which their passions or their cupidity invite them. Whenever the pressure of this war ceases, by voluntary surrender of its objects, or by internal exhaustion and revolt against its further continuance, there will assuredly be, if not before, a wide and deep agitation for the repudiation of the debt, and such a spread of the feeling that it will either convert or conquer all other parties.

If you could hear and know, what it is impossible to convey to you, all that is said on this topic even now among the labouring classes here, and by men of higher position and definite aspirations in the west, you would believe that it only needs some political shock at home—the collision of parties over a fraudulent Presidential election, or the breakdown of the Administration by some serious military disaster—to stir up a popular rage to throw off the men of the east and the burdens with which they have overloaded the west.

LETTER FROM NEW ORLEANS.

New Orleans, Louisiana: March 26, 1864.

THE BANISHMENT OF MR. JAMES D. DENEGRE — THE PROBABLE CAUSES OF THIS ORDER—THE 'COTTON SHARKS'—SUSPENSION OF COTTON CULTIVATION WITHIN THE FEDERAL LINES—CONFEDERATE RAIDS—THE NEGRO WILL NOT WORK — ORDER OF GENERAL REYNOLDS RESPECTING 'SUPERFLUOUS OR INSUBORDINATE' COLOURED PERSONS—THE NEGRO'S IDEA OF FREEDOM —THE RESULTS OF FEDERAL EMANCIPATION — THE MILITARY EXPEDITION AT A STANDSTILL—STATE OF AFFAIRS AT MATAMORAS.

James D. Denegre, Esq., the President of the Citizens' Bank, has been ordered to leave the city and go into the Confederate lines. The order was peremptory, but assigned no reason for his banishment. Friends of Mr. Denegre appealed to General Banks to withdraw the order, or at least permit Mr. Denegre to go to Havana, Nassau, or any other foreign city; but the General refused all concessions, declining even to state the nature of the charges against Mr. Denegre. That gentleman is himself as much at a loss as his friends to know the why or the wherefore of his banishment. It cannot be because of his active sympathy with the Confederate cause, for in that he has been tried and found wanting. Immediately upon the fall of Forts Jackson and St. Phillipe, the banks of this city began packing up their specie preparatory to sending it within the Confederate lines before the arrival of Butler and his army of plunderers. Mr. Denegre is said to have advised this measure very strongly, urging it upon his brother bank presidents as prudent and patriotic. But he did not appear to view it in that light for his own bank. For when Butler arrived, and the seizure of specie was begun, it was discovered that the Citizens' Bank had not sent its specie across the Confederate lines, though every other city bank had done so. Mr. Denegre had the specie of his bank concealed in the building formerly occupied by the old Bank of Orleans, but the report that he had sent it into the Confederacy was very industriously propagated. Subsequently, when Butler began to tax his devilish ingenuity in devising schemes of coercion and robbery, the seizure of individual and special deposits was attributed to the agency or suggestion of Mr. Denegre. Whether this accusation was just or not, it is certain that the Citizens' Bank and its officers were regarded as no friends of the Confederate cause, and from having been the fiscal agency of the Confederate States Government, it suddenly became the recipient of Butler's favour and protection. To be sure, it is not very difficult to secure the favour and protection of so venal a wretch as Butler; but it is incredible that any gentleman could lend himself to the furtherance of his tyrannical, sordid, and malignant schemes. In saving its specie, the Citizens' Bank lost the respect and friendship of the Confederates, both Government and people. And now it is thought that Mr. Denegre will meet with a very cold reception within the Confederate lines. In the absence of any assigned reason, various conjectures are made as to the cause of his banishment. Some think it was for the publication of the following card in one of the city papers:—

'New Orleans, March 5, 1864.

'Editors Picayune—I find my name mentioned in the public prints as having assisted in the inaugural ceremonies of yesterday. Although an invited guest, I did not attend nor participate therein. But I am still more surprised to find that the old Veterans of 1815, J. B. Planché and Alfred Hennan, were present—the former being dead three years, and the latter absent since last spring.

'James D. Denegre.'

Two other gentlemen, Messrs. A. M. Buchanan and Eugene Rousseau, published cards to the same effect, but they have not been banished. Perhaps their turn is yet to come. Another conjecture is his formidable opposition to the National Banking Scheme. Mr. Denegre is a very able financier, President of a powerful and influential bank, and his arguments against Mr. Chase's pet scheme, which he has unreservedly condemned, have necessarily much influence in the community. It is also said that the representations of a rival bank president, one on very close terms with General Banks, have been mainly instrumental in effecting M. Denegre's banishment.

The lessees of 'Government plantations,' and those venturesome speculators the cotton sharks, are coming to grief at the hands of the guerillas. Rumour has it that some thirty cotton sharks were captured and hung recently a short distance from the Federal lines outside Baton Rouge. Of course the hanging part of the story is a malignant falsehood, in keeping with the hue and cry of savage warfare which the Yankees have raised against the South. I am, however, informed by a gentleman from that place that within the current month some twenty of these cotton speculators have been captured by the Confederate cavalry in the vicinity of Baton Rouge. Many of them were friends of my informant, and all of them had large sums of money on their persons.

The cultivation of the 'Government plantations' in that section and in the vicinity of Natchez, Miss., and on the Louisiana side of the river, from Donaldsonville to the mouth of the Red River, has been partially suspended, owing to the persistent raids of the Confederate cavalry.

It was only the other day, as a correspondent of a city paper informs us, that 'the Confederates, numbering some 300 cavalry, under the respective commands of Captain Bryan, Captain Henry Gentles and Captain Bob Prynne (all late residents of Baton Rouge), ambushed a squad of the Fourth Wisconsin cavalry, under Lieutenant Williams, whom they killed, and wounded one or two others. The object of the raid was to pick up men and mules (horses would not be objected to), and we believe they were tolerably successful. They even came in open daylight under the very nose of the videttes, and took mules and teams from General Bernard's plantation, now occupied by Goodale & Co., situated close to the city limits.' In the so-called Natchez district the plantations have also been pretty thoroughly 'cleaned out,' as the Yankees term it. With such a state of affairs in and around Baton Rouge, the 'first governor of the free State of Louisiana' shows his prudence in preferring New Orleans to the capital as a place of residence. But guerillas are not the only trouble the squatter planters have to contend with. Even with the military power at their beck and call they cannot get the negro to work, as I have more than once affirmed, and as is officially admitted in the subjoined order:—

Head-quarters Defences of New Orleans.

New Orleans, March 24, 1864.

General Order, No. 12.

All coloured persons, of either sex, who are unemployed, or who have no visible means of support, will be taken in charge by Colonel G. H. Hanks, Superintendent of Negro labour, who will make provision for their employment and pay, in accordance with existing Department orders on the subject of labour.

Citizens are requested to report all cases of vagrant coloured people to Colonel Hanks, at No. 138, Julia Street.

That no private servant may be interfered with in executing this order, parties who employ coloured people will give to each a certificate of employment, which certificate will exhibit the name and residence of the employer.

Citizens having coloured people in their employ, who are superfluous or insubordinate, will be promptly relieved of them by reporting the fact to Colonel Hanks.

By command of Major-General Reynolds.

John Levering.

Major and Assistant-Adjutant-General.

This order was made public yesterday, but the military authorities have been enforcing it for several weeks past, with but little success, however.

Having been declared a freed man, the negro insists upon the enjoyment of his freedom as he understands it—freedom from labour, the freedom of the vagabond, and liberty to gratify all the gross instincts of his brutal nature. This does not, however, consort with the economic notions of those who proclaim him 'a man and a brother.' The celebrated General Orders of February 3 failed to impress the 'freed man' with either the necessity or dignity of labour. Neither does the Educational Order of the 22nd inst., with its visions of innumerable parish school-houses, circulating libraries, and smart Yankee 'school-marms,' induce these intelligent contrabands to return to the sugar and cotton fields. Perhaps if the school-marms of the Louisiana contrabands prove such 'frail sisters' as those at Port Royal, P.C., this Educational Order may tend to the elevation of the negro in this Department. At all events the freedom shriekers are in a dilemma, and now call upon the citizens of New Orleans to seize and deliver up to them these fugitives from labour; for General Reynolds' order means nothing if it does not mean that. They have despoiled those citizens of their exclusive and legal right to the labour of those fugitives. They proclaimed their labour free. But the proclamation has proved a mockery of freedom, a delusion and a snare for the hapless negro, a living lie, as Mr. Elliot of Massachusetts termed it, and yet a very deadly lie, as experienced in the freed men's camps along the Mississippi.

Though Fort de Russey was captured on the 14th inst., and Alexandria occupied on the following day, the Federal army up to the 21st had not advanced beyond Bayou Rapides, about twenty-one miles from Alexandria. On the date last mentioned there was an engagement on Bayou Rapides, in which the Federals claim to have captured some prisoners and a few guns. The Federals seem to hesitate about pushing forward in force farther up the river, and the Confederate cavalry are reported to be hovering still around Alexandria. On the 17th they made a successful raid upon a Federal wagon train. It is rumoured that General Grant has ordered the recall of the expedition.

There is little or no cotton to be 'gobbled' up in that region; and to advance to the Texas boundary, and give battle to the united forces of Taylor, Magruder, and Price, is regarded as a movement full of danger to the Federal army. The withdrawal of the main body of the Federal forces from the Texas coast, which was begun some weeks ago, still goes on. Indianola was evacuated on the 13th inst.; and though no enemy is said to have hurried the movement, yet it was not unattended with the loss of life. In crossing one of the bayous, twenty-two men of the 69th Indiana, two of the 7th Michigan Battery, and eight of a negro regiment were drowned. The Union families of the town, all of whom are Germans, went with their Yankee protectors.

That Yankee officer who wrote from Brownsville that a fleet of French frigates was off the mouth of the Rio Grande, told about as much truth as his superior officers generally tell in their bulletins from the battle-field. Up to the 13th inst., the date of our latest advices from Matamoros, no French fleet had arrived off the Rio Grande. Advices from Havana state that two war-steamers from France were daily expected there on their way to Matamoros. A land force was also spoken of in cooperation with the fleet. Meantime, Cortina, the bandit and horse-thief, who still holds sway in Matamoros, levies his contributions upon the inhabitants, preparatory, as he says, to a movement against the invaders. Those who know Cortina believe that he is simply feathering his nest, and has no design of making 'a movement against the invaders.' He is for sale to the highest bidder. All the cotton in Matamoros was being transported to the Boca del Rio with all haste, in order to get it on shipboard before the arrival of the French.

PARIS TOPICS.

PARIS: April 19.

SUNDAY'S Moniteur gives us the terms of the convention with the Emperor Maximilian, by which it appears that not 6,000, but 8,000 French troops are to be left at his disposal after the final withdrawal of the army of occupation, for which no time is fixed. On the previous day the same official paper had published the series of financial devices by which the new Sovereign inaugurates his reign. The good wishes with which the French accompany him have almost become enthusiasm since the appearance in yesterday's Moniteur of the letter from the Emperor to M. Fould, suggesting the suppression of the tax called the 'second décime' in the registration of property. This was exigible on all sales and successions of real property, and fell very heavily upon the small proprietors, who are so numerous in France. It is a sacrifice of more than half a million sterling to the Treasury, and is presented to the landowners as the first-fruits of the arrangement of the Mexican difficulty. This practical result goes to the hearts of the people. The Opinion does not fail to growl out its disappointment, or rather its disapprobation of the whole proceeding. It, the Northern journal par excellence of all the newspapers of Europe, begins by saying that the war of the North against the South may still last a year or two, for it no longer counts with Seward by days. But it will end some day, and the Opinion has such a gift of faith that it does not doubt that the end will be the victory of the North. Then France will find herself like a poacher in the midst of a posse of gamekeepers, caught in the act of infringing the sacred doctrine of Monroe. The formidable armies of Peru and of the other South American republics will make common cause with the Re-United States, and then woe will betide the French flag. These vaticinations have little effect, and they will only damage their authors if the report which circulates in Paris be confirmed, and the Washington Congress has really committed itself to resolutions insulting to the Mexican throne and its founder.

Lord Clarendon's short visit here, though less noisily, has not been less really, triumphant than General Garibaldi's progress in England. And it is quite as exceptional a proceeding. His Lordship superseded the ambassador without bringing any credentials, and treated directly with the Emperor independently of M. Drouyn de Lhuys. Thousand conjectures have been rife as to the subjects he had to treat; for it is not supposed that his negotiations were confined to the Danish question: but one thing only is certain, the re-establishment of cordial relations with France. The general peace of Europe seems by this assured for another year. The critical period which is always dreaded by those subject to the war-fever, the opening of spring, has passed without any premonitory symptoms. All Paris is wild with delight: the funds of every kind have run up to prosperity prices without any appearance of stopping there, politics are discarded, and the Bourse quotations are the only interesting reading. There is a rise in every species of security—the 3 per cents. have improved 2 per cent. since the beginning of the month, and the holders of crédit mobilier are 250 francs richer than they were a week ago. This is in great part due to Lord Clarendon's visit; in some degree to the termination of the long struggle between the crédit mobilier and the new Société générale, which has ended in both drawing prizes.

M. Mires, the man of many lawsuits, has just obtained, in the highest tribunal here, a judgment which quashes all of those which have been pronounced against him. By this his character is cleared of all imputation of unfair dealing, and his fortune is exonerated from all the claims of the customers of his bank. By this decision the judgment of the court of Douai is confirmed in all its consequences, and the decree of the Court of Cassation, solicited by the legal authorities which left Mr. Mires under the stigma of fraud, notwithstanding his previous acquittal, is invalidated. The law's uncertainties are nowhere so uncertain or in their effect so cruel as in questions arising from the commercial code of France. This is intelligible, for the legislator dealt with a state of things in which greater changes have been brought about in the last fifty years than in 500 years before.

I extract from the Constitutionnel a paragraph which may not have reached England, and which is too characteristic of a small German court not to be registered for the benefit of those who do not know them. 'His Highness the Duke of Mecklenburg Schwerin having received the cross of the Red Eagle from the King of Prussia for his brilliant conduct in several engagements in the Danish war, His Highness has resolved to bestow upon His Highness' own self the cross of military distinction which he has founded.'

The fall of Düppel calls forth in all this evening's papers expressions of the deepest regret. 'Danish heroism is vanquished. The garrison of Duppel has succumbed to an army three or four times as numerous as it was, and Berlin rejoices over the easy triumph as if it were a great victory.' What influence will this exercise on the Conference? The Conference of London opens under sad auspices in the eyes of those who have always doubted the efficacy of the English proposal. Lord Palmerston's policy of hesitation has again received a check. This policy, so vaunted on the other side of the Channel, has not even succeeded in preventing the bloody day of April 28, which wrings from the Danes their last strategic position in Slesvig.' 'We cannot suppose that the powers who take part in the Conference can form to-day a different judgment from what they did a week ago on the rights of Denmark and their own duties. The times are gone when the law of might permitted the sword of a conqueror to weigh down the balance in which were placed the destinies of a people. Though beaten at Düppel, Denmark has lost, in the eyes of Europe, none of her rights; her very defeat gives her a new claim on the powers which signed the Treaty of 1852.' In the same tone all the other papers comment on this morning's news. Rumours to the effect that the Conference will be enlarged to embrace the functions of a general Congress are beginning to gain credit in Paris; and although I hear no fact cited in proof of this, so generally accredited a report has probably some foundation. In connection with this there are rumours that the naval estimates in the present budget are to be considerably reduced, as a first step to a general disarmament.

I remark that the telegrams printed in all the papers here reproduce the condemnation pronounced by the Post and Times, of the practice of diplomatic forgery so largely indulged in by Northern Statesmen. The Opinion alone has suppressed these unpleasant comments. Instead of this, it publishes the despatch from the Sun, with the refusal of Congress to recognise the Mexican Empire.

It is announced this evening that the performance of three translations from Shakspeare, 'Hamlet,' 'The Midsummer Night's Dream,' and the 'Merry Wives of Windsor,' which had been announced for the 23rd at the Porte St. Martin, has been forbidden by authority.

CONFEDERATE CAUSE IN LANCASHIRE.

MANCHESTER: April 20, 1864.

DURING the past week or ten days several important meetings have been held, under the auspices of the Southern Independence Association, for the purpose of eliciting by argument and discussion an expression of popular opinion upon the American war. In each case the result has been a decided victory for the Confederate side; and in more instances than one the 'opposition' was in so small a minority that the resolutions met with scarcely any resistance, and were carried with acclamation, waving of hats, and other such tokens of triumph. One of the most animated and influentially attended of these meetings was held on Wednesday evening last in the hall of the Church of England Institute, Burnley, upon the occasion of Mr. T. B. Kershaw delivering his second lecture in that town. The platform was occupied by some of the leading inhabitants, and the body of the hall was well filled by an attentive and enthusiastic audience. The lecture alone occupied nearly two hours in the delivery, to say nothing of the debate that followed, or of the motions with which the meeting wound up. A very brief abstract of the lecturer's arguments must suffice in this place. As he entered Burnley, he said, he cast an eye over what he might style their 'tallest elements,' their chimneys. He saw that, with very few exceptions, they were smokeless. He knew very well what that betokened: either that their mills were stopped altogether, or were running short time. Take it as they liked, the American war had grievously affected, and would continue to affect, the value of their labour. For upwards of three years this war had raged with unabated fury, and the latest intelligence brought from the wretched theatre of its devastation was, 'the spring campaign of 1864 had opened.' They had already heard of Sherman's raid on the Mississippi; of the raid of Thomas; of the raid of Kilpatrick; and, generally of the so-called onward movements of the North. But what had been the results? Sherman compelled to retire, Thomas defeated, Kilpatrick foiled. In point of fact, at no period since the commencement of the war was the South in a better condition to continue it. There could be no mistrust as to the issue. When they found a people carrying on a struggle in that heroic spirit of patriotism and self-sacrifice which had characterised the action of the South throughout this terrible war, they may be sure there must needs be some potent reasons urging them to so fearful an alternative. It betokened the sternest resolve to achieve the priceless blessings of liberty and independence—a resolve that the South should belong to the South—a resolve to entertain no thought of other argument than the sword until that object was fully won. The lecturer then proceeded to show cause why the South seceded from the Union, and demonstrated that it was high time they should do so. He pointed out that it was to the South the North owed the material greatness upon which it based its monstrous arrogance and tyrannical power. This portion of the lecturer's argument was received with marked favour, and he was highly complimented for the intimate acquaintance he showed with the minutest details of the financial history of the Federal Union. Upon the question of separation, he said that if the South had remained in the Union, all political power would have been in the hands of the North, and that, too, not for a term of years or a period of office, but beyond recovery and for all time. He would put the necessity of secession in this way. Here was a firm—the North and South. Ever since the establishment of the concern the South had been the losing partner, and the chances grew less and less from day to day that this would ever be otherwise. The constant flow of immigration into the Northern States would not only prevent the possibility of redress, but would more and more intensify the political injustice of the situation, so that separation and independence would become a necessity, and that necessity, which was also a 'right,' had now also to be fought out by the sword. The lecturer concluded by drawing a most favourable picture of the advantages that would result from the independence of the South as regards the trade with this country. Referring to the capabilities of the South, he showed from statistics embracing every article of produce, that the South was in this respect far superior to the North, and therefore no heed should be given to the reiterated falsehoods of the Northern press in America or England, as to the South being compelled to surrender by reason of supplies failing its armies. The tyranny and treachery of the North, the treatment of negroes in the war, and the wanton havoc and desolation caused by Federal marauders, were shown up in a strong light, and condemned with a severity and force which frequently excited the enthusiastic cheers of the audience.

A similar meeting, and as decidedly 'Southern' in tone and spirit as the one of which I have given a brief abstract, was held on Thursday evening, at the New Hall, Farnworth. On this occasion also the lecturer was accompanied on the platform by many of the principal local residents, including clergymen of different denominations, many officers of Lancashire volunteers, members of municipal bodies, and chief representatives of the trade and commerce of the town. The chairman, John Greenhalgh, Esq., of the Farnworth Board of Guardians, said that on ordinary occasions the office of Chairman was more a matter of ornament than use; but upon an occasion like the present, when controversial questions were about to be discussed, and when the people were about to ask for an expression of their opinion upon affairs involving their dearest interests, he would have to bespeak the assistance and indulgence of that assembly to enable him to discharge his duties. For his own part, he was, in the proper acceptation of the term, 'neutral' upon the question of the great strife between North and South. But fair play was a jewel, and seeing so much had been said by American Englishmen in support of the bloodthirsty and internecine war, which, for more than three years had been raging on that continent, destroying its people, wasting its resources, plunging it into debt, and inflicting the most calamitous injuries upon other countries, he confidently bespoke for Mr. Kershaw a calm and patient hearing, so that he might speak to wise men, judging what they heard. The lecturer, who was received with the most cordial expressions of approval, and was repeatedly cheered in his statements and arguments, then proceeded to review the American question in his most forcible manner, and called upon the meeting to endorse the conclusion which all right-minded men had arrived at, viz., that for all that had taken place the North was responsible, and on their heads the blame would rest when a true history of this awful crisis should be written. A long discussion followed, and was kept up with great animation until nearly midnight. The opposition was led by a Mr. Charles Mason, formerly of Manchester, and more recently of the State of Illinois, America, who said he was astounded at the view taken by Mr. Kershaw, declared the object of the war was slavery, but oddly agreed with the lecturer that the increase of the population of the North 'had also something to do with it.' The meeting broke up with cheers for Mr. Kershaw, the chairman, and the 'South.'

The Southern movement has also reached the Potteries, and arrangements are in progress for establishing branch associations in those localities. On last Tuesday evening a most successful meeting was held in the Lyceum, in Stafford, under the presidency of Mr. Farrand, a resident in the town, and author of some popular works on the 'spirit of Christianity.' Here, also, as at Burnley and Farnworth, an animated debate took place, and the proceedings terminated with resolutions of the same favourable character.

Several other meetings, though less important as regards localities and numbers than those I have just noted, have been held since I last wrote, and there appears to be no reason to expect that in large as well as small centres of population, the friends of the South will cease to agitate with vigour.

SECRET POLICE IN NEW YORK.—The New York World publishes a long and minute account of the secret police system maintained by the Federal Government in that city. It employs 500 officers, besides an immense number of subordinate spies, male and female, and, like the Inquisition, has its own prisons where victims are incarcerated, tortured, and sometimes disappear, leaving no trace. This system, worthy of the worst days of Rome and Naples, costs the Government $50,000 a month.—Times.

YANKEE OFFICERS AND MISCEGENATION.—By a special order of General Banks, four captains and two lieutenants of the 'Fourth Regiment, Corps d'Afrique,' are dishonourably dismissed the service of the United States, for various disgraceful proceedings demoralising to their command, notably one specified in the order, 'having forced an entrance into the quarter occupied by the coloured laundresses.' Lieutenant-Colonel Benedict, of the same regiment had previously been dismissed on similar charges; and the Colonel, named Drew, is under close arrest, awaiting his trial by court-martial.

AFFAIRS FINANCIAL & COMMERCIAL.

THE MONEY AND DISCOUNT MARKETS.

Wednesday Evening.

It is very evident we are again approaching a period of stringency. The Bank directors without any premonitory notice raised the rate of discount on Saturday last to seven per cent., and it is thought that the court may see fit to take further action in the course of a short period. Loans for Russia and Mexico to the extent of 6,000,000*l.* in the one case, and 8,000,000*l.* to 12,000,000*l.* in the other, are sufficient to create uneasiness after the late excess of public companies. It is only surprising that we have stood our ground so well as long as we have, and that there has not already occurred a general break-down. Perhaps the advance in the minimum terms of discount will save such a calamity by inspiring caution and inducing many to limit their outstanding engagements. If not, this state of things cannot be supported. A change will come sooner or later, and then there will be a terrible reckoning to encounter. No foreign drain has yet been experienced, but the process of the absorption of capital is going on so rapidly that it is difficult to say where it will end. At the Bank, and out of doors, seven per cent. is freely charged, but the pressure is not so severe as it was. As a singular anomaly the supply of money at the Stock Exchange is large, and there the terms do not exceed 4 to 4½ per cent. for loans from day to day. The late fine weather will encourage confidence if the warmth shall continue.

THE NEW MEXICAN LOAN.

The official proposals for the new Anglo-French 6 per cent. Mexican Loan have just been issued. The amount in sterling is 7,790,000*l.*, representing a nominal capital of 12,385,000*l.*, and is to be issued in bonds to bearers of 1,000*l.*, 500*l.*, 200*l.*, 100*l.*, and 50*l.* each, with others of smaller amounts for the Continental markets. The issue to the public will be at the price of 63, and will be required to be paid as follows:—5*l.* on application, 5*l.* on allotment, and 10*l.* each on the 15th June, the 15th August, the 15th October, the 15th December, and on the 15th February, 1865. The dividends will be payable on the 1st April and the 1st October, and as the instalments extend to February next year the actual price will be about 61⅜. Of the total amount to be negotiated 8,000,000*l.* will be on account of the Mexican Government, and the remaining 4,365,000*l.* on account of the French Government, by whom these bonds have been accepted in payment of expenses incurred in Mexico. An amount equal to two years' dividends will be retained in hand, and a sinking fund of 1 per cent. is to commence on the 1st April, 1869. The loan is introduced in London by Messrs. Glyn & Co. and the International Financial Society, and in Paris by the Crédit Mobilier and the Crédit Foncier.

CONFEDERATE COTTON LOAN.

The market continues exceedingly steady, with only small transactions. 54½ to 55½ is the closing quotation.

AMERICAN SECURITIES.

The dealings in American Government and Railway Securities appear to be gradually declining under the adverse accounts which have been received by all the late mails from America. There is no disposition whatever on the part of the brokers to deal in this class of securities, and unless a change in favour of the Federal troops is speedily announced, the dealings are likely to be almost nil. To-day not a single transaction has taken place, and the only dealings recorded during the week have been in Atlantic and Great Western Railway, Pennsylvania section, 76, 76½, and 76. Illinois Central, $100 shares, $90 paid, 14½, 14, and 15; ditto all paid, 74, 73¾, and 73½; and Panama Railway, second mortgage, 104½.

Liverpool: Wednesday, April 20.—A good business has been transacted in cotton again this week, but not to so great an extent as the week previous. The arrivals have been rather considerable, particularly from India and China, and, on the whole, prices continue well supported. American descriptions have been more enquired after, and a slight advance in quotations has consequently been obtained. The sales this week have amounted to 44,000 bales, of which 14,000 have been taken on speculation and for export. The total sales this year, down to the present time, have been 622,750 bales, whilst to the same period last year they were 554,010 bales. There have been imported this year 602,237 bales; and to the same period in 1863, 349,422 bales. The exports this year have been 99,551 bales, whilst to the corresponding period last year they were 99,316 bales. There have been taken for consumption this year 417,900 bales; and to the same period in 1863, 291,700 bales. The quantity taken on speculation this year has been 94,120 bales; and to the like period last year, 139,590 bales. At the present time the computed stocks are 366,010 bales; last year they were 350,900 bales. The latest official quotations were: American descriptions, 24*d.* to 27*d.*; Pernambuco, 25½*d.* to 27¼*d.*; Maranhams, 27¾*d.* to 27⅞*d.*; Egyptians, 26¼*d.* to 29*d.*; Smyrna, 22¾*d.* to 26*d.*; Surats, 11*d.* to 23*d.*; China, 17½*d.* to 18¾*d.*; and Japan, 20*d.*

The Manchester markets have been pretty steady for all descriptions of goods, particularly for the better class of yarns, in which there has been more doing, at rather improved prices. For shipping yarns of the commoner qualities, there has not been a great deal doing, but for the finer and better descriptions, there has been more doing, at extreme prices. The cloth market remains dull, but the advices from India have caused a rather better feeling, and manufacturers are holding out for firmer prices, with evidently less disposition to submit to the reduced terms offered by buyers. At the same time buyers show but little inclination to operate, unless at reduced rates, and then only on a small scale. Amongst some of the smaller houses, a fair business of a miscellaneous character has been transacted, but that has been confined to limited and retail quantities. The large arrivals of cotton this week at Liverpool have influenced speculators in holding back, whilst amongst bonâ-fide dealers it is believed that but few orders are held at all pressing for execution.

There are at this time many thousands of Confederate prisoners of war confined in the various forts and camps of the Northern States. A large proportion of them are wounded or sick, and all are in a state of destitution, the accounts of which, as given in private letters and in the newspapers, present a picture of human suffering, which has scarcely a parallel in modern times. The merest necessaries of life are wanting, and frequently the wounded prisoner has no raiment save that which is stark and stiffened with his clotted blood. Horrible as war is in all its features, assuredly it has no greater horrors than the long agony of the poor captive who, when the feverish excitement of the contest is over, is left to the bitter charity of strangers and foes, without one friendly hand to soothe the pains of body or friendly voice to whisper hope and comfort to his despairing mind. These men, cut off from the assistance of their kindred or the protection of their Government, have peculiar claims on the patriotism of their countrymen in Europe, and upon Christian benevolence everywhere. They did not recklessly or from choice embrace the profession of arms, but in exchanging the comforts, and often the luxuries, of home for the toils and hardships of a soldier's life, they obeyed a stern sense of duty and the call of their country in its extremest need. An unusual proportion, also, of those that fill the ranks of the Confederate armies belong to the higher walks of life, upon whom privations, such as are endured by prisoners in the hands of the North, fall with increased severity.

The Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund is intended to mitigate some of these sufferings which cannot altogether be relieved. Within little more than a twelvemonth, nearly £3,000 have been collected and expended in relief. The managers of the Fund are assisted in their efforts by self-devoted ladies in the principal Northern cities, who visit the sufferers and give them such aid as the means at their disposal render possible. Of late the Federal Government has granted permission that this Samaritan work may be done openly. It is earnestly hoped that all Southerners residing in Europe will support the Fund to the extent of their ability, and its objects may recommend themselves to all, irrespective of country or political convictions, who sympathise with the sufferings of their fellow-men.

Contributions will be received by J. H. Ashbridge, Treasurer, Walmer Buildings, Water Street, Liverpool; or in London, by Henry Hotze, Esq., 17 Savile Row, W.; in Paris, by H. O. Brewer, Esq., 6 Rue Circulaire; and Daniel Hubbard, Esq., 24 Rue Lord Byron.

BUST OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The only Bust extant of the President of the Confederate States, modelled by Volk, at Richmond, and the most faithful Likeness of this eminent Statesman, has been kindly lent by the owner for reproduction for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund of Liverpool. In conformity with the intentions of the donor, the Bust has been registered under the Designs Act, and a number of casts (quarter size), limited to 500, are offered to the public at the following rates:—

Plaster	5*s.* 0*d.*	Carriage free to all parts of the United Kingdom.
Ditto Enameled	7*s.* 6*d.*
A l'Ivoire (composition of Wax and Plaster)	10*s.* 6*d.*

The Bust may be seen at the studio of James Redfern, Esq., 29 Clipstone Street, Fitzroy Square, W., who will also receive orders to execute it in marble; and at the Index Office, 13 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, E.C.

The proceeds of the sale of the 500 casts being for the benefit of the Southern Prisoners' Relief Fund, all orders must be addressed, and money orders made payable, to Mr. Henry Hotze, 17 Savile Row, W.

CHIEFLY TO MINISTER TO THE SPIRITUAL NEED OF OUR NOBLE DEFENDERS,

Is the Representative of all Denominations of Christians, who, through it, lay their Offerings of Piety upon the Altar of Patriotism, and lead the Soldiers of the Country to become the Soldiers of the Cross.

ITS HEADQUARTERS ARE PETERSBURG, VA.,

With Depositories in other Cities, and a numerous Corps of Colporteurs, occupied in Distributing Tracts to our Soldiers in the Army and in the Hospitals.

Organised July 18, 1861, the Society has, from that time to the present, been supplying each Army of the Confederacy with religious reading. About Thirty Millions of pages of Tracts have been distributed amongst our brave soldiers. The seed has not been sown in vain. Numerous letters from Chaplains, Officers, and Privates testify to the great good which has been accomplished, and show that the Society has been instrumental, to a considerable extent, in producing and sustaining the wonderful Revival with which God is now blessing our armies.

'THE ARMY AND NAVY MESSENGER,'

the Society's organ, is the most popular paper in the Army. It has been recommended by General Lee, and by many other eminent Officers, who have contributed to its support. It is, preeminently, the Soldiers' and Sailors' Paper, especially designed to interest and profit them, amongst whom it is gratuitously distributed.

When it is considered that the choicest portion of the country is found in the Army, which will, of necessity, give character to the Confederacy, and control its destiny for years to come, the importance of sustaining this Institution, which seeks to consecrate to Christ this mighty influence, cannot be over-estimated.

The expenditure of means it involves is very great, and we respectfully solicit donations for the Society and for the Messenger, from all, everywhere, who have at heart the religious welfare of our Soldiers, and the advancement of the Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Please send your Contributions to Messrs. Fraser, Trenholm, & Co. Liverpool, who will forward them to

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL STONEWALL JACKSON.

THE ONLY AUTHENTIC AND FAITHFUL LIKENESS YET PUBLISHED.

MESSRS. W. WALKER & SONS, 64 Margaret Street, Cavendish Square, London, W., beg to inform the Public that they have lately been furnished by the Hon. J. M. Mason, of the Confederate States, with the only Original Likeness of the late lamented General Thomas Jefferson Jackson, photographed from life a week before the General received his fatal wound. From this Likeness (enlarged by Photography) Messrs. Walker have executed a SPLENDID LIFE-SIZE PORTRAIT, beautifully finished in Chalks by Mr. Walker, Senior, the Historical Stiple and Mezzotint Engraver. This Portrait remains emphatically as The Likeness of the illustrious General. It has been seen and highly approved by many Southern Gentlemen who knew the General personally.

Messrs. Walker now intend publishing immediately (by Private Subscription) Two Sizes of Photographs taken from the Original Life-Size, and highly finished in Sepia. Both of these Portraits will be mounted on India Paper, and will bear underneath a facsimile of the Genuine Autograph of General Jackson, taken from an Autograph letter received by a friend in London a few days before the news arrived of the General's death.

PRICES TO SUBSCRIBERS, TO BE PAID FOR ON DELIVERY.

PLAIN GILT MOULDING FRAMES FOR ABOVE.

LARGE SIZE . . . 10*s.* 6*d.* | SECOND SIZE . . . 7*s.* 6*d.*

A few copies enlarged from the Original, and highly finished in Chalks by Mr. Walker, Senior, will be executed by order only, and, on account of the labour and time necessarily bestowed upon each by Mr. Walker himself, can only be supplied at 10*l.* 10*s.* each.

By an arrangement entered into by the Messrs. Walker with Mr. Mason, Half of the Nett Profit of the publication of the above will be handed over to Mr. Henry Hotze, Commercial Agent of the Confederate States of America in London, to be applied to the relief of the Southern prisoners confined in the Federal American States.

The Original Drawing and the above Portraits from it can be seen by applying at Messrs. W. Walker & Sons' Studio,

AMERICA.

GENERAL MEADE, still in command of the army of the Potomac, on the 12th had moved his head-quarters to Culpepper, six miles beyond Brandy Station. A destructive storm had interrupted communication between Washington and the army of the Potomac, and delayed operations. General Grant, it is reported, is to advance upon Richmond across the Rapidan; General Smith takes the old route of M'Clellan, up the Peninsula; while General Burnside, whose forces have been collected at Anapolis, is to advance upon the Confederate capital by way of Goldsborough, North Carolina. General Grant will have over 60 miles to march south, General Smith about 50 west, and General Burnside about 200 northerly.

THE news of military movements, to the 14th inst., is meagre and unimportant. We hear of a formidable massing of forces in Virginia, of a hurrying of men and supplies towards Nashville and Chattanooga, but of no advance. Heavy rains and deep mud paralysed army operations in Virginia. General Lee is reported to be receiving large reinforcements, including cavalry and mounted infantry, and to be strengthening his defences on the Rapidan, so as to be able to hold General Meade or General Grant in check with a portion of his forces, while he attacks General Smith's column advancing from Fortress Monroe. The Government papers are boasting, as usual, of the tremendous results to be achieved; but Wall Street gives little indication of confidence.

We have nothing from Charleston. The attack on Mobile appears to be entirely abandoned. The report of the loss of the powerful Confederate ram Tennessee at that place is contradicted. The New Orleans papers give flourishing accounts of the success of the Red River expedition—in stealing cotton; but there are rumours that even this success is not as great as reported, and fears that the Confederate policy of enticing the Federal troops as far as possible from their base of operations had led or would lead to some disaster. The accounts from Western Kentucky and Tennessee are conflicting. General Forrest had been largely reinforced; he had scattered his forces; he was summoning forts on the Mississippi to surrender, and about to attack Memphis; he was moving into central Kentucky; he had sent his officers to stir up insurrections in Ohio and Indiana.

BY the arrival of the Hibernia at Greencastle, on the 20th, we have New York telegrams to the 16th. The Confederates, under General Forrest, carried Fort Pillow by assault, on the 13th, after a desperate struggle, in which 400, out of the Federal garrison of 600, were killed or wounded. The capture of this important fort, which is a short distance above Memphis, again closes the Mississippi, and may have an important influence on operations in the south-west. The Confederates were reported to have again occupied Paducah, on the Ohio, and removed large quantities of stores, and to be preparing to attack Memphis, which was not supposed to be able to offer a formidable resistance. The taking of Memphis would cut off one of the bases of the Federal army in Tennessee. The draught ordered for April 15, has been again postponed. Mr. Chase arrived in New York on the 14th, and gold, which had risen to 189, fell to 174. On the 16th there was a panic in the Share Market, with gold at 171¼.

THE speech of Mr. Long, member of the Federal Congress from Cincinnati, Ohio, with the proceedings to which it gave occasion in the House of Representatives, may be said to mark an epoch in the war. Mr. Long, though little known in American politics, is a gentleman of character and position, and his speech, given elsewhere from the report of the New York Daily News, will repay perusal. The scene that followed the speech of Mr. Long was of an extraordinary character. The speaker of the House, Mr. Colfax, of Indiana, left the chair, and moved the expulsion of Mr. Long for treason. Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Schenck, of Ohio, late general commanding at Baltimore, supported the resolution. It was opposed by Mr. Cox, Mr. Voorhees, Mr. Harris, of Maryland, and Mr. Fernando Wood, of New York. The two latter avowed that Mr. Long's opinions were their own, and that if he were expelled they must be also; Mr. Harris saying amid great excitement, 'The South ask you to leave them in peace; but no, you say you will bring them into subjection. That is not done yet, and God Almighty grant it never may be. I hope that you will never subjugate the South.' On this a resolution was offered for the expulsion of Mr. Harris, which failed to obtain the constitutional two-thirds majority, the votes being, yeas, 81, nays, 58. A vote of censure on Mr. Harris was, however, passed. Two days after, the resolution to expel Mr. Long was withdrawn, and a vote of censure passed 80 to 70.

THE Confederate commanders on the Mississippi are introducing new methods of warfare, if not new principles of military science. In several instances, cavalry troops have attacked, and in some cases captured, Federal gunboats, fairly earning the title of horse marines. We hear now that General Forrest, since his capture of Paducah and unsuccessful attack upon the fort near that town, has summoned two Federal forts on the Mississippi—Fort Halleck, near Columbus, Kentucky, and Fort Pillow, above Memphis, in Tennessee. As it is not likely he would attempt to take two strong forts by cavalry charges, or even an assault with mounted infantry, he has probably been reinforced by artillery, and Fort Pillow, as we learn by the latest telegrams, has been captured.

'GOLD 70' was the text of a pungent satire on the Federal Government and the war, copied last week from the New York Round Table into several English papers. Since then we learn that gold has risen, in a panic on the 14th inst., to 89, and exchange on London to 1904; and this while Lieutenant-General Grant was marshalling his forces, stopping furloughs, ordering non-combatants to the rear, and making energetic preparations for one more advance on Richmond. In the midst of these immense preparations, with the Government papers full of assurances of victory, with no great disaster to cause a panic, so far as news has been allowed to reach us, gold rises 20 per cent., or, more honestly expressed, Government paper sinks to a little more than half its nominal value. With violent fluctuations it receded to 176½.

THE Union party of the Federal States is startled every little while by some revelation of stupendous absurdity, or disaster, or villany, chargeable upon the Washington Government. One of the latest exposures is that of the authorisation of an extensive trade between Federal speculators and the Confederate authorities in the Trans-Mississippi department, in which military supplies and munitions of war have been exchanged for cotton—in other words, Mr. Lincoln has been engaged in supplying the Confederate army with the means of fighting his own soldiers. Until lately, anthracite or smokeless coal has been sent to Canada for the blockade-runners; New York merchants, full of zeal for the Union, have sent the Confederates all kinds of supplies, viâ Halifax, Bermuda, and the Bahamas; but it now appears that the Washington Government itself has been engaged, in a more direct manner, in transactions of a similar character. Loyalty is a noble sentiment, but what Northern speculators want is cotton.
